"My brother and I survived thanks to her," said Myers. Her mother hid with the children, her mother and a sister in the village of Champlost where the people sheltered them. But her mother decided to return to Paris in the summer of 1940 just as the city was in chaos.

Myers, who immigrated to Montreal in 1947 and later became a translator, returned to Champlost 10 years ago to honour four residents as Righteous Among the Nations for hiding her family.

Among the other 11 new titles is the French translation of Montrealer Arthur Ney's memoir L'Heure W. As a young teen, Ney was caught up in both the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising and the Warsaw Uprising. ■

Lily Kim tries to keep kosher

Also around a decade ago, after hearing a talk by Holocaust scholar Doris Bergen, who now teaches history at the University of Toronto, Kim decided to do another master's degree. Seeking to study the Holocaust specifically, she focused on Dietrich Bonhoeffer, the German Lutheran pastor and theologian who was executed for his staunch resistance to the Third Reich.

"I was interested in resistance to Hitler," Kim explained. "Most who did resist were professing Christians."

Asked how she feels about the touchy view that the Holocaust was carried out in the main by practising Christians, she said, "I agree." But she qualified that by adding: "It was by people who called themselves Christians."

Recent anti-Israel boycotts and sanctions by Protestant churches make her "sad," she said.

Though raised in a Baptist tradition, Kim said she tries to keep kosher, lights Sabbath candles on Friday nights, and observes Jewish holidays. She even attempts to read the Bible in Hebrew. Her family has been supportive.

Between the two religions, "I take away the best of both." ■

In east Jerusalem, Jews and Arabs hunker down

BEN SALES
JTA, JERUSALEM

To get to the Jewish compound in the eastern Jerusalem neighbourhood of Silwan, residents arrange in advance for an armoured van to pick them up at a spot adjacent to the walls of the Old City.

With a metal grate over its windshield and an armed guard sitting beside an armed driver, the van rumbles for seven minutes along steep, bumpy roads lined with Arabic graffiti. It stops next to a police van, across from a six-storey building towering over the street. An Israeli flag hangs from a window.

An armed guard stands at the door; a second sits inside. In an adjacent room, a group of Israel Border Police officers relax as they eat their lunch. When the children who live there want to play, they ascend to the roof, where there's a small playground surrounded on three sides by a metal cage.

The building is the largest structure in what its residents call Yemenite Village, a collection of buildings that is home to religious Jews who have lived in this part of Silwan since 2004. The enclave began with just a few families, but will expand to 22 in the coming months. Providing private security for them and residents of other nearby Jewish enclaves costs the Israeli government up to $16 million (US) a year, according to Daniel Luria, the director of Ateret Cohanim, an organization devoted to strengthening the Jewish presence in Arab areas of Jerusalem.

The number of Jews living in Arab neighbourhoods of Jerusalem's Old City and its environs has increased by 40 per cent since 2009, according to Ir Amim, an organization that advocates for Silwan's Arab residents. Some 2,800 Jews now live in the area, which residents refer to as the Holy Basin, a fraction of the nearly 200,000 Jews who live in eastern Jerusalem as a whole, almost all of them in Jewish areas built after the 1967 war that form a ring around the city's Arab neighbourhoods.

As the Jewish population in eastern Jerusalem has grown, so have tensions with its Arab neighbours. Both sides complain about frequent harassment from the other, from stone-throwing and Molotov cocktails to police abuse. Neither side feels safe walking the streets, and both insist they're not going anywhere – no matter how bad the violence gets.

"It'll be like this all of our life," said Kassem Nader, an Arab cab driver. "It will go up, go down, there will never be peace. We got to a place where you can't walk the street."

The Jews inside the Holy Basin consider it an inseparable part of Israel's capital and see no problem living there. Yishai Fleisher, who was born in Israel and raised in New Jersey, moved in 2011 with his family from the West Bank settlement of Beit El to Ma'ale Hazeitim, a Jewish settlement inside the Arab neighbourhood of Ras al-Amud, adjacent to the Mount of Olives.

"We think we're living in the ancestral homeland and we think we are protecting Jerusalem from being overrun," said Fleisher, a columnist and radio host who appears regularly on Al Jazeera. "One could conceive of us as settlers living dangerously amongst Arabs, or one could see us the way we see ourselves – as Jewish people coming back to our ancestral homeland, living in the most natural place that we could be."

Down the street from the Yemenite Village, Abdullah Abu Nab, a handyman and father of five whose family has lived on this street for generations, looks weary. The heavy Israeli security presence, placed there to prevent terrorism and protect the Jewish residents, has created an atmosphere of fear, he said. Israeli security forces have stopped his children from playing in the street, and Abu Nab says Arab kids have been punched by police.

In the past, "you would hardly feel them, see them," Abu Nab said. "Now there are more soldiers than neighbours. Now every day is crazy."

Arab residents complain that they are neglected by the authorities even as millions are spent to protect their Jewish neighbours. Although it's only blocks away from Jewish western Jerusalem, the city's Arab half looks different. Many of its dirty, narrow streets lack sidewalks, signage or proper paving. Trash collection is spotty, with piles of garbage gathering outside homes. According to a report by Ir Amim, as of 2012, 75 per cent of Jerusalem's approximately 300,000 Arabs live below the poverty line.

East Jerusalem has been experiencing frequent unrest since last summer, when Jewish extremists murdered an Arab teenager, Mohammad Abu Khdeir, in retaliation for the murder of three Jewish-Israeli teens. Since then there have been intermittent riots and what Jewish residents describe as constant stone-throwing at their apartments.

In response, Israel has closed off exits from Arab neighbourhoods and placed checkpoints on their roads. One checkpoint, a row of cinderblocks manned by a Border Police unit, sits just yards from Fleischer's apartment complex.

Individual residents also take their own precautions. Fleisher, Luria and others carry guns, and many have rock-proofed their windows. But Fleisher and his wife, Malkah, insist their life is mostly normal. Their biggest problem of late, they said, has been traffic jams from the road closures. Their eldest daughter now finishes school a half-hour earlier on Fridays because of the congestion, and makes sure to go to the bathroom before the ride home.

"We get information about how to travel, how to come back home, live as much as possible a normal life here," Fleisher said. "The change here hasn't felt as dramatic because we are from the get-go more prepared."

Arab Jerusalemites have many of the same complaints. Nader said drives that used to take 10 minutes now take two hours. His block is dotted with checkpoints, and a soldier recently held him at gunpoint and demanded to see identification. He worries that when his two young adult sons leave the house, they'll be mistaken for terrorists and shot. Save for work, he hasn't gone out in a week.

"They'll shoot someone who walks in the street," he said. "The situation is scary. They began with knives, [and] it's scary for everyone."

Neither side expects conditions to improve soon. Jews and Arabs both express a desire for normal relations, but both also seem resigned to the possibility that violence will continue for years or decades.

"We're cousins, man, we're sons of Abraham," Nader said. "The young generation doesn't want to get close. It wants to build a fence in the neighbourhoods instead of getting to know each other." ■

Israel returns bodies of Palestinian attackers

LINDA GRADSTEIN
JERUSALEM

Thousands of Palestinian mourners filled the streets of the villages of Sair and Surif near the West Bank town of Hebron, which has become the focal point of Palestinian attacks on Israeli soldiers in the past month. The bodies of Raed Jaradat, 22, and Mahmoud Ghneimat, 20, were released to the Palestinian Authority on the morning of Nov. 1 and the funeral was held that afternoon.

Jaradat was shot last week after he stabbed and injured a 19-year-old Israeli soldier. The circumstances surrounding Ghneimat's death, however, are less clear. Israeli officials said he had attempted a stabbing attack, but nobody was wounded, and Palestinians denied the version.

The bodies of both men were carried in a full military procession out of the hospital. Palestinian officials said Israel promised to return the bodies of five other attackers the same day, but said Israeli officials reneged on the promise. Israeli officials privately said that the Palestinians had reneged on promises not to hold mass public funerals.

On Oct. 30, Israeli officials returned the bodies of five attackers, all between the ages of 15 and 17, who were buried in an emotional joint funeral. About 20 Palestinians have been killed in the Hebron area since the beginning of October, almost all of them shot dead during attempted or actual attacks on Israeli soldiers. After the funerals, protesters threw rocks at Israeli soldiers.

Last month, Israel announced that it would not turn over the bodies of Palestinians killed attacking Israelis. Former foreign minister Avigdor Lieberman, head of the Yisrael Beytenu party, sharply attacked the government's decision to change its mind.

"This is a wrong step, meant to appease the terrorists, and it is akin to paying a ransom to those who threaten Israel. It is a shameful surrender to the Palestinians' threats, one that will not only fail to bring about quiet, but will bring about an increase in terrorism."

Palestinians however say that the decision to release the bodies is meant to calm the situation in Hebron and could have the desired effect.

"From a religious point of view, it is imperative to bury the dead," Mohammed Abu Aktesh, responsible for all visitors to the Al-Aqsa Mosque, told The Media Line. "It gives respect to the dead and to their families. If they are not buried near their families it is a tragedy for them."

> Holding the bodies goes against international law and morality
> Ami Ayalon

According to Islam, burial must take place as quickly as possible in a Muslim cemetery, after the body is washed and wrapped in shrouds.

From the viewpoint of Jewish law, the question of whether to release bodies is not a religious question, but a political one.

"There is no ownership of a dead body whether it is the body of a Jew or a Muslim," Rabbi Herzl Hefter, head of the Harel Beit Midrash in Jerusalem, said. "You can't treat the bodies of terrorists with disrespect, and you should bury them, but there is no Jewish law that says the bodies have to be returned for burial. That is a foreign policy decision and the state is sovereign here."

Former senior Israeli intelligence officials say there is no proof that holding onto the bodies helps stop attacks on Israelis.

"We closely investigated this when I was in charge of the Shin Bet (the Israeli intelligence service) and we came to the conclusion that holding onto the bodies does not give us any advantages or intelligence assets," Ami Ayalon, who was the head of the Shin Bet from 1996 – 2000 ,and advocates an Israeli withdrawal from most of the West Bank told The Media Line. "Holding the bodies goes against international law and morality."

The Islamist Hamas in the Gaza Strip is believed to be currently holding two Israelis – an Ethiopian named Avera Mengistu and a Bedouin who has not been named. Both men were believed to be captured after they willingly entered Gaza, and Israel has said it will not release any bodies or live prisoners in exchange for them. In addition, Hamas is holding the remains of two Israeli soldiers killed in the summer of 2014 during the fighting between Israel and Hamas. ■

OPINION

Dear President Abbas: Stop trying to kill us

David Horovitz

President Abbas, if you truly care about your people, you need to tell them to stop stabbing us.

They've killed about a dozen Israelis in the last month or so, and maybe three times that number of Palestinians have died in the attempt – suicidal stabbers, kamikaze knifers.

You've not condemned them. In fact, you've encouraged them – while simultaneously peddling the double speak that we've been killing them in cold blood. You've publicly declared that "every drop of blood that has been spilled for Jerusalem" is clean and pure and blessed. You've reassured each new prospective killer that "every martyr will reach Paradise, and everyone wounded will be rewarded by Allah."

You obviously don't care about our people, who have had the temerity to build a thriving Jewish state in our historic homeland, and who you lie about and incite against. But since your people understandably seek their own independence, and to be freed from our rule, you need to tell them that trying to kill us one at a time with knives and screwdrivers and whatever else comes to hand is as counterproductive and doomed as the long series of previous efforts to massacre and terrorize us into leaving – the conventional wars, and the suicide bombings, and the rockets, and the car-rammings, and the relentless effort to demonize and delegitimize and isolate us internationally.

The path to the statehood and independence you seek is actually relatively straightforward. It was wide open in 1947 – all your predecessors had to do for a first-ever Palestine was accept a revived Israel. Instead, they opted for war and futile, bloody, tragic self-sabotage. Today, it's a case of convincing Israel that it is safe for us to partner with you. Convincing us, to paraphrase president Bill Clinton at the Rabin rally on Oct. 31, that the risks of peace are less severe than the risks of walking away.

Step one in that process of persuasion: Stop trying to kill us. Stop the stabbings. Stop the encouragement of the stabbings. Stop.

Here's the thing: much of the world has been convinced that we're the Goliath to your David. That super-strong Israel, a regional superpower, should be eminently capable of taking those U.S. president-recommended risks for the cause of your people's statehood and our own legitimacy and tranquility.

Even viewed in the narrow context of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, however, that's a short-sighted assessment. We all saw Hamas partially incapacitate this country for 50 days last summer – and that was a Hamas restricted to Gaza and arming itself through the cracks of our security blockade. A West Bank-controlled Hamas would fully paralyze Israel.

And if you look at the Goliath-David equation in the wider context – in the context of tiny Israel on the western edge of the vicious, shifting, unpredictable and weapons-filled Middle East – then it's a frankly ridiculous misrepresentation. Israel is not about to render itself still more vulnerable to extremism on three sides, and with only the sea on the fourth. Better press coverage and warm messages of support from the international community are somewhat inadequate compensation for national suicide.

The irony, President Abbas, is that most of us want to partner your people to statehood. We don't want to rule over you. We know it's a dreadful way for you to live. And imposing it corrodes us. We feel a resonant historical link to biblical Judea and Samaria, but most of us would much rather have a smaller Israel which boasts a Jewish majority and full equality than a larger Israel, encompassing the West Bank, that loses its Jewish character, its democracy, or both.

Yet just like your duplicitous predecessor, you're making it impossible for us to attempt that partnership.

You may think you're making headway with the UN efforts and the international court bids and all the other legal and diplomatic and media pressure to try to impose your state upon us without negotiating viable modalities, but you're not. Unfortunately, quite the reverse.

> The irony, President Abbas, is that most of us want to partner your people to statehood

We tried the Oslo process, and were rewarded with terrorism. We tried unilateralism, and were rewarded with rockets and tunnels. So now we're hanging tough – protecting ourselves as best we can, insistently maintaining that security blockade on Gaza, and insistently maintaining the military presence in the West Bank without which we would right now doubtless be facing another onslaught of suicide bombers.

It's not that we adore and embrace the world-view of our endlessly serving prime minister. We don't, most of us, grimly accept his bleak reported assertion to the Knesset's Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee last week that "Israel will have to live by the sword forever." We certainly will live by the sword for as long as we must, but we'd much rather not. We'd much rather not send our children to the front lines to protect us for generation after generation. We feel, many of us, that there is more we could do to help begin to create a climate in which peace-making is less risky, to help begin the lengthy process of reconciliation and tolerance that, maybe, one day, could enable us to peacefully share this bloodied land. But unlike well-intentioned American leaders of past and present, we do not have the luxury of blinding ourselves to the consequences of taking ill-judged and premature risks in that supreme cause of peace-making.

For all your despicable false accusations against us, your advanced years, and your weakness, you, President Abbas, still have more power than most anybody else to help advance the gradual process of moderation that is crucial to realizing your own people's aspiration for statehood. You are best placed to tell your people that the Jews have legitimacy here too. That the disputed land must be shared. That Jerusalem is holy to all monotheistic religions. That despite your rhetorical attempted land grab, the Old City – where Al-Aqsa sits, and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre sits, and the Temple Mount and Western Wall sit – is not yours and yours alone.

They won't like to hear it. Fed a relentless diet of lies for generations, they won't easily believe it. They won't like you for telling them. But that's sometimes what leadership is about – taking your constituents, even against their will, in a better direction for their own best interests.

You should tell your people the inconvenient truth about the Jews and their history in these parts. Far from encouraging them to stab us, you should tell them that the sooner they stop, the sooner we can start the long process of building trust – the necessary prerequisite to compromise and Palestinian independence.

Sadly, I don't for a second think you're going to do this. I fear you're going to be remembered, just like your unlamented predecessor, as a Palestinian leader who failed his people because he lacked the guts to tell them the hard, inconvenient facts. And in so doing, pushed off their independence, and forced us to live by the sword, for who knows how many more years.

No, President Abbas, God does not reward those who spill the blood of innocents. There are no killing fields on the path to Paradise. If you care about your people, you should be telling them to preserve lives, not take them. Our lives and theirs.

And really, in what kind of a crazy world was it necessary for me to write this? ■

Thousands gather in Tel Aviv to remember slain prime minister Yitzhak Rabin

JTA

An estimated 100,000 people remembered prime minister Yitzhak Rabin at a Tel Aviv rally marking the 20th anniversary of his assassination that featured speeches by U.S. President Barack Obama and former president Bill Clinton.

On Oct. 31, at the plaza bearing Rabin's name, Clinton praised Rabin's willingness to take risks for peace and exhorted the crowd to finish his work. Clinton guided Israeli-Palestinian negotiations when Rabin was prime minister that led to the Oslo Accords in 1993.

"The next step will be determined by whether you decide that Yitzhak Rabin was right," Clinton said. "That you have to share the future with your neighbours. That you have to stand for peace. That the risks of peace are not as severe as the risks of walking away from it."

Rabin was assassinated Nov. 4, 1995 following a pro-peace rally at the same plaza. His assassin, Jewish extremist Yigal Amir, opposed Rabin's goal of Israeli-Palestinian peace.

In a video message, Obama called Rabin a leader who "understood the dangers Israel faces, but he also said the Palestinians are not to be ruled over forever by force.

"Yitzhak speaks to us still," Obama said. "Let us demonstrate that we oppose violence and extremism of any kind, and let us exhaust every opening for the peace we know is just and possible."

Israeli President Reuven Rivlin called on Israelis to mend their internal social rifts. "Israel's democracy has not ceased to realize its strength and resilience," he said. ■

Rabbinical Council of America bans ordination and hiring of women

JTA
NEW YORK

The Rabbinical Council of America (RCA), the main modern Orthodox rabbinical group, formally adopted a policy prohibiting the ordination or hiring of women rabbis.

The policy announced Oct. 30 by the RCA came after a direct vote of its membership.

The resolution states: "RCA members with positions in Orthodox institutions may not ordain women into the Orthodox rabbinate, regardless of the title used; or hire or ratify the hiring of a woman into a rabbinic position at an Orthodox institution; or allow a title implying rabbinic ordination to be used by a teacher of Limudei Kodesh in an Orthodox institution.

"This resolution does not concern or address non-rabbinic positions such as Yoatzot Halachah(advisers on Jewish law), community scholars, Yeshiva University's Graduate Program for Women in Advanced Talmudic Study, and non-rabbinic school teachers," the resolution concludes. "So long as no rabbinic or ordained title such as "Maharat" is used in these positions, and so long as there is no implication of ordination or a rabbinic status, this resolution is inapplicable."

Maharat is an acronym meaning female spiritual, legal and Torah leader. It is a designation granted by Yeshivat Maharat, an institution for women in Riverdale, N.Y. founded by Rabbi Avi Weiss.

In 2010, following the establishment of Yeshivat Maharat, the RCA issued a resolution on women's communal roles stating that the RCA "reaffirms its commitment to women's Torah education and scholarship at the highest levels, and to the assumption of appropriate leadership roles within the Jewish community. We strongly maintain that any innovations that impact the community as a whole should be done only with the broad support of the Orthodox rabbinate and a firm grounding in the eternal mesorah (tradition) of the Jewish people."

A follow-up 2013 resolution on Yeshivat Maharat, as it ordained its first cohort of maharats, said: "Due to our aforesaid commitment to sacred continuity, however, we cannot accept either the ordination of women or the recognition of women as members of the Orthodox rabbinate, regardless of the title. The RCA views this event as a violation of our mesorah and regrets that the leadership of the school has chosen a path that contradicts the norms of our community."■

Jerusalem, from a different point of view

Hanan Rubin

Sirens always make me pause. I fall silent and count one off, praying that there won't be another. Because two sirens, as we used to say, are not women in labour.

Somehow, the rise of conflict in Jerusalem always comes along with the rising temperatures. But after the meetings, the touring politicians, the dramatic headlines, there comes the first rain, and everything calms down. Then the countdown begins for next summer.

Some, though, aren't content with just counting the days. Jeremy made aliyah from Washington D.C. six years ago. A reserve paratrooper, he rides his bike to work, each time reassuring his mother, thousands of miles away, that he wasn't anywhere near the most recent attack. Recently, he joined a crowd of 5,000 to watch rapper Matisyahu perform beneath the Old City walls. "Jerusalem If I Forget You gets a whole new meaning these days," he tweets.

Michal is a mother of four. After putting her children to bed, she goes downtown, where she volunteers for a group seeking out dialogue with angst-filled youths bent on revenge. To her ever-concerned sister, she vows never to leave Jerusalem, with its crisp, cool air and still-low crime rates. It's her husband who drops off the kids at school the following morning, where they are taught about the complexities of living in a mixed city, where you have to defend yourself with one hand and reach out to your would-be enemies with the other.

Ibrahim is a Hebrew University law student, and a resident of Ras el-Amud, a Palestinian suburb shaken by recent events. Intimidating glares by Hamas supporters notwithstanding, he goes online every day, trying to convince people to stop the cycle of violence.

Then there's Batia. She is an ultra-Orthodox woman. Every day she walks to work at City Hall. Despite having recently bought a canister of tear gas as a precaution, she prefers to put her faith in God, and in the ubiquitous policemen.

Jerusalem keeps going not through pompous statements, but through the hard work and devotion of its people. When things started getting really bad, I put out a call for an emergency meeting of Jerusalem civil society organizations. Within three hours, representatives from 33 organizations sat around a conference table at City Hall. It came as no surprise; even during "normal" times, the number of people willing to sign up for civilian "reserve duty" is astounding.

There are teenagers handing out Israeli flags. Elderly people handing out small gifts to security personnel. Psychologists supporting youths in distress and activists helping out local businesses. These ordinary citizens allow the city to keep on living its life: thousands of students going back to school, the basketball team fighting to retain its championship title, and Buzz Aldrin joining 2,000 people at the International Astronautical Congress.

This drive to take responsibility and think out of the box is precisely what is needed to resolve the complexity of current events. We have to crack down on violence, while empowering moderate leaders; fight incitement on both sides and defend the right of every person for freedom of worship; and make sure East and West Jerusalem get their share in infrastructure investments.

It's time for this fresh perspective to rise from the bottom up. We are tired of instant solutions quickly denounced by this side or the other. We are tired of those who take turns making political gains out of our hardship. Jerusalem is a different place, and requires a different point of view: the one we, young people of Jerusalem, discovered 10 years ago, when everyone else said the city was lost.

And from this point of view, there is a lot of good to see. And even more to do. ■

Actor delves into her own family history

A scene from Avaricious

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Actor Michelle Polak has had a busy couple of years. She's currently delving deep into her own history to learn more about her family's past while also working on Avaricious, a new play by Toronto's Theatre Gargantua.

"Theatre Gargantua develops work over a two-year-cycle," says Polak. It all started when director Jacquie Thomas asked a group of artists to start mulling on the word gluttony, or avarice.

Eventually, after long hours spent in both the Toronto Reference Library and the rehearsal hall, that wordplay turned into Avaricious, a new piece of theatre written by Michael Spence, along with the cast and playwright Kat Sandler. It will get its world premiere on Nov. 4 at Theatre Passe Muraille.

The story centres on an enterprising billionaire and his legion of adult orphans who must survive an impending flood. Polak plays a middle-aged orphan named Rupa.

"The essence of my character is survival," says Polak. "It's all about her needing to survive, and she's caught in a very difficult situation because should she step out of the lines and judge the billionaire, she can be replaced."

Michelle Polak

Polak notes that in a larger sense, Avaricious looks at the idea of an economic and environmental tipping point as well as the disparity between rich and poor.

She relates to these themes, both in her personal life and professional life as she's now developing her own play outside of her work with Theatre Gargantua.

"The play is about identity and displacement," she says. "And this summer I started researching my family bloodline because I look physically Sephardi." She's tracked that Sephardi-looking side of her family back to 1732; they were Dutch and Ashkenazi. Her paternal grandfather eventually came to Canada after surviving Auschwitz.

She wants to find out why her surname's Polak considering her Dutch ancestry. "I'm completely obsessed," she says. "My kids are making fun of me."

Her search began in earnest when she reached out to a cousin in Israel. This led her to a man in Amsterdam who shared various Dutch Jewish genealogy sites with her. "In two days, I went from not knowing anything to having a place to research. And 48 hours later, a family tree starts to sprout," she says.

Determined to go further, she's sent her DNA off to testing company 23and-Me and has even persuaded her brother to send his to the National Geographic Society.

Yet, all of this seems to have a deeper meaning; Polak is beginning to reconnect with her roots.

"God and I had a falling out when I was 10 years old in after-school Hebrew school because I asked my teacher, who was probably somebody's bubbie, 'Why did God kill the babies in the Holocaust?' And she couldn't answer me."

For the first time since the 1980s, Polak attended High Holiday services this year. She fasted on Yom Kippur and even commemorated her great-grandmother's yahrzeit, who she learned about through her research.

"It's been a really interesting journey as a lesbian, as a feminist to kind of try and find my place now," she says.

"I think the thing I'm trying to figure out is what does it mean to be Jewish today, in this time, in this age?" she asks. "How do I get my head around the fact that I once thought that if I was a lesbian, I had no place in Judaism?"

She's since brought her many questions to Rabbi Aviva Goldberg from Toronto's Shir Lebeynu congregation as she continues to forge her road of self-discovery. And it's one she'll incorporate into her original work. "There's no way Judaism can't be part of this play now," she says.

Yet, she hopes it'll be relevant for a pluralistic group of people. And she wants the same for Avaricious. "I just crave theatre that has impact, so I hope it [Avaricious] does," she says. "I hope people leave the theatre different and might even consider their own place in the world." ■

Avaricious opens at the Theatre Passe Murraille Mainspace on Nov. 4 and runs until Nov. 21. For tickets visit www.artsboxoffice.ca

Can technology save Jewish romance?

Chaimie and Leizer

After months of Jewish dating site JDate.com suing its "hip" new competitor JSwipe, the suit was ultimately settled, with the older J buying the younger. Their union has kept dating on the mind. Well, that, and also our complete failure to land ourselves lifemates. That keeps it pretty fresh in the old noodle.

Look, matchmaking is difficult. Yente's profession should be lauded. There are just so many personality components to match. If technology and the Net are now a critical part of mating, well, why not? We already use apps to hail cabs, curate photos and locate the nearest toilet (seriously, there are multiple options in the app store).

But is it good for the Jews?

The dating site ChristianMingle.com was started by a Jew (not to be confused with ChristianYingl.com, a dating site we want absolutely nothing to do with). Noel Biderman, CEO of Ashley Madison, is Jewish as well. Clearly, there is a business to be had here, such that the Chosen People have chosen the "choosing" industry.

So what's love gotta do with it? A lot, Tina, a lot. These apps are only as good as their results – marriages, relationships, good dating stories and horrible (read: fantastic) dating stories. Even casual relationships. Even business casual relationships (i.e. trysts while wearing khakis).

But at the end of the soirée, the question remains: does this stuff work in the fleish? In many cases, it falls flat. At least for us. We like our subscription services more on the side of Netflix (and chill) than JDate (and wait). Perhaps if we really want dating to work in the Jewish community for those of different tastes, we need to go more "niche." (Or at least "niche" geferlach).

For example, how about Ashkenardi.com, a dating website dedicated to linking Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews? It could not only bring the Jewish community together (and somehow bring Ashkenazi men together with Sephardi women wayyy out of their league), but also help cancel out genetic noise to make sure that the next generation is healthy, happy and mostly gefilte-free.

Maybe we need a JHate.com, devoted exclusively to self-hating Jews. Find your bashert and comfort in your perfectly equal hate for yourselves and each other.

But maybe dating is more than just m4w, w4m, m4m, w4w and j4j (Jews for Jesus). We live in an era of voyeuristic obsessions with child photographs on social media. Perhaps it's time for someone to invent Kindr: swipe through examples of children you want your kids to look like. After all, why judge a mate by their looks when you can judge them by their taste in what their own ideal child should look like?

Finally, to save Biderman from the Ashley Madison shandeh, we suggest a new dating service called Asher Mandelbaum, all about Jewish affairs. It's not what you think: we're talking weddings, bar mitzvahs and brisses. This could solve the age-old problem – when you're hungry or in the mood for a drink or company, there are no affairs. When you're invited to an affair, you're not hungry or in the mood for a drink or company. Let's stop the madness and use the Net to set people with appetites up with events with excess inventory. #its2015people, #Iwroteacheckfor180forthisdrek? #makeithappen.

We look forward to innovation in the Jewish social entrepreneurship space to tackle this proverbial Yidlife crisis. In the meantime, the best we can do is hope that Yente finds us a find, matches us a match. And perhaps the merger of JDate and JSwipe provides us one of the great lessons to be applied to all prospective spouses – if you can't successfully sue them, join them.

Ultimately, we realize that successful dating comes from putting yourself out there. As such, we would like put out a CTY (Call-To-Yentes) and a RFP (Request-For-Pictures) to the grander Canadian Jewish community to find our basherts. Email: bashert@yidlifecrisis.com. ■

Flagship CBC Radio show celebrates 25 years

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

CBC's Radio One's flagship literary show Writers & Company celebrated its 25th anniversary last month. The longest-running single-host literary show on CBC Radio, it presents nearly hour-long interviews with top-tier authors from around the world.

The show, hosted by Eleanor Wachtel, is thriving, boasting a radio, online and podcast listenership of some 450,000 to 500,000 people for each weekly episode.

Writers & Company got off to a strong start in its first season when Wachtel interviewed Mordecai Richler, Carol Shields, A. S. Byatt, Victoria Glendinning, Derek Walcott, Amos Oz, Nadine Gordimer, J. M. Coetzee, Eduardo Galeano and Ngugi Wa Thiongo, to name just a few.

Over the years, Writers & Company has featured more than a dozen Nobel Prize-winning authors. Last month, Wachtel interviewed Orhan Pamuk, Turkey's bestselling writer, who won the literature prize in 2006. Booker Prize-winning author Kazuo Ishiguro has called Wachtel "one of the very finest interviewers of authors I've come across anywhere in the world."

When asked about some of her memorable interviews, Wachtel mentioned the late Oliver Sacks, describing the neurologist and author as "lovable, generous and intriguing." She also said that "it was pretty thrilling" to interview the reclusive Philip Roth in his apartment and to speak to Susan Sontag and Joan Didion, two authors whose writing she's admired and has been reading since university days.

"It sounds just like my wish list being fulfilled, but in a funny way, I wasn't even conscious I had a wish list until I had the opportunity to speak to these people," Wachtel said. She said since writers work in words and words are their medium, they are generally articulate and forthcoming.

"You can engage in a discussion and open up the work, so that the listener who hasn't necessarily heard of the work or the author is able to relate to the ideas and stories," she added. Each author interview requires hours of preparation, she said, comparing it to "having a major paper to write and cramming for a final all at the same time." Wachtel and her producer read the author's newest book, they often read earlier books, and they read about the person.

"I have to have all the details in front of my mind at the time I interview someone," she said.

On the influence of technology on reading, Wachtel said that "one of the biggest changes are the delivery systems, whether people read ebooks or they read hard copies." But what remains constant is the appetite for stories in various forms, she said.

"Yes, there's competition – movies and television – and different ways to watch those things, but there's still an appetite for stories and the intimacy of stories that only a book can provide."

Wachtel, who graduated from McGill University in 1969 with a BA in English literature, has received a slew of honorary degrees, and she was named to the Order of Canada in 2005. Writers & Company won a Silver Prize at the 2011 New York Festivals for world's best radio programs.

Reflecting on her career so far, Wachtel said she's been fortunate to have a job that combines her "personal interests and passions with a career out in the world and one that has been so richly rewarded by the world." ■

Histories alternate, avoided and actual

NORMAN RAVVIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In 1961, Philip Roth wrote: "The American writer in the middle of the 20th century has his hands full in trying to understand, describe and then make credible much of American reality. It stupefies, it sickens, it infuriates and finally it is even a kind of embarrassment to one's own meagre imagination. The actuality is continually outdoing our talents, and the culture tosses up figures almost daily that are the envy of any novelist."

Canadians generally think of themselves as being at remove from the action in interesting times, but not so of late. With new leaders, this country will move in new economic directions, cultivate different social policy and new ideas about what constitutes a national community. The Conservative Party of Canada judged any number of these issues wrongly in its efforts to gain re-election.

Quebecers have been buffeted by such shifts in political leadership and social policy since the dark months under Pauline Marois, when her separatist party contemplated new ways to engineer human souls: spearheading the Parti Québécois' platform was a prohibition on "ostentatious" expressions of religious faith by employees of public institutions. Even the contemplation of such policies brought about a sure and quick outcome, as Quebecers began singling each other out. As in France, the head-covering became a point of violent disagreement, and policies touted as being in favour of social consensus revealed their explosive, divisive force.

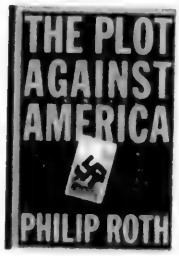
As it turns out, a book in Roth's oeuvre – by no means his best known – serves as an ingenious response to such events. This is his 2004 novel The Plot Against America, which offers a canny, even prophetic fictional tableau based on the 1940 U.S. election, which was won by Franklin Delano Roosevelt's Democrats.

The Plot Against America finds Roth writing in a minor genre – that of alternate history. Conventional contributors to this genre are rarely canny or prophetic, but shoot instead for what might be called the extreme, or even the insane. What, they ask, if Adolf Hitler won the war? Or, what if American planes were flown into the towers of Dubai? These are extravagant imaginings, not so different from science fiction scenarios in their effort to work out alternate realities. Roth's book is firmly settled in American public and private history of the 1940s.

It opens at the moment when Roosevelt managed, by securing the majority of urban votes, to win an unprecedented third mandate. But in Roth's fictional revision of that time, F.D.R. is bested, in the face of American isolationism and populism, by the Republican ticket led by the transatlantic flyer Charles Lindbergh.

Lindbergh's fame resulted from his 1927 flight, but also from the "trial of the century" that followed the kidnap and murder of his infant son. Roth roots his imaginings of a nativist Lindbergh leadership in the historical record itself. Lindbergh's attendance at the 1936 Berlin Olympics led him to conclude that Hitler was "undoubtedly a great man," while his wife, the writer Anne Morrow Lindbergh, concurred that American views of Hitler were based on "very strong (naturally) Jewish propaganda in the Jewish-owned papers."

Through the early years of the war, Lindbergh gave prominent speeches in favour of anti-interventionism. His wife's bestselling non-fiction book A Confession of Faith promoted similar ideas. It's possible that the kernel that propelled Roth's counter-history is a May 1941 America First Rally at Madison Square Garden, where a crowd of 25,000 cheered Lindbergh as "Our next president."



The Plot Against America
by Philip Roth

Houghton Mifflin

Writing early in this century, Roth could not have foreseen the zealotry of American electioneering of 2015 (certainly, his eye was not on the possibility of a Canadian government whose business might include a "barbaric practices" hotline. In The Plot Against America, Canada is the place American Jews consider moving to as life in Newark seems increasingly threatening). But his fiction is prescient, mixing deep historical knowledge with prophetic writing that imagines the rise of proto-fascism in American life.

Roth's genius with character and language dramatizes these ideas rather than drawing him toward polemics. The family at the centre of his fiction is reminiscent of the up-and-coming, well-assimilated New Jerseyans portrayed in his other fiction, wedded as they are to his own background in Newark. On a post-election driving trip to Washington, D.C., the over-proud American-Jewish father finds himself silenced in restaurants and before the Lincoln Memorial as a "loudmouth Jew." Tarring and feathering hovers as the next step in his public diminishment as a cast-off citizen.

A book for thinking about the Canadian abandonment of a select group of its citizens is Michael Kluckner's recent graphic novel Toshiko. Kluckner has made his reputation as a careful historian of Vancouver and the B.C. landscape, through his wonderful watercolours of what he has dubbed "vanishing Vancouver." In Toshiko, narrative is pushed along by Kluckner's light-handed drawings of the B.C. interior, where Canadian Japanese were "relocated" during World War II after being dispossessed of their homes, businesses and fishing boats, and their birthright in Canadian society.

Toshiko
by Michael Kluckner.

Midtown Press

Roth imagines a similar policy, under a Lindbergh presidency, of sending Jews from the cities to rural outposts. Cynically called "Homestead 42," it relies on major corporations to pinpoint employees who "would benefit enormously by becoming something more than" part of a Jewish family "too frightened ever to leave the ghetto." From Newark, the narrator's family is to be sent to Kentucky.

Kluckner's approach, like Roth's, investigates history by way of a compelling narrative. Toshiko focuses on the lives of Canadians who find themselves uprooted and sent to the B.C. interior, and on those whom they meet when they get there. Toshiko also finds its way to 1940s Vancouver, a place of squatter huts on the beaches, of young men heading off to war, where a young Japanese woman without a residency permit is apprehended, her partner accused of "harbouring a Japanese."

Toshiko is history well told, while Roth's challenge is to tell history while pushing its borders into fiction. It's a good time to read both books, which remind us of the 1940s and bring the present moment into sharper focus. ■

Fartzee Shmartzee promotes healthy eating

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Adam Michael Segal said the idea for his first children's book came to him in his dreams.

"It happened almost as a series of dreams. The idea popped in my head and I think I had health on my mind because I had been working for a health-care government agency as a writer for 10 years and also because I was unhealthy at the time. I really wanted to be healthy, and those ideas kept popping into my head," he said.

Fartzee Shmartzee's Fabulous Food Fest, featuring an animated character that champions the benefits of healthy eating, was written in 2014, when Segal was at home on disability because of a chronic pain issue.

"Over a period of several weeks, I'd wake up with these ideas for the character, for the plot. It came to me in pieces. When I woke up, I'd make sure to write down whatever popped into my head, and then I'd craft and expand the idea," he said.

"I wanted to create a character for kids that would be promoting good health. For me, what I see often, is that a lot of the cartoon characters that are used by food companies do the opposite. They actually promote unhealthy foods. Over time, that builds kids' preferences for these unhealthy foods. I was trying to do the opposite. I was trying to engage them in good nutrition and eating healthy," said Segal, who has two children, aged seven and five.

Soon after Segal wrote the manuscript, he reconnected with a childhood friend, Daniel Abramovici, who happens to be an animator with 20th Century Fox, and he commissioned him to illustrate the book.

After getting a lot of positive feedback from people who read the manuscript, Segal looked into getting the book published, and decided to self-publish, which, he said, gave him more freedom to decide how the final product would look.

"I wanted the story to be funny. That was very important because I know that kids learn a lot better if they're laughing. I also wanted it to have important messages. Some of those messages are about promoting healthy eating, but I also wanted it to have other social messages, like giving back to the community. Somehow, I knew the story would have some element of social responsibility," he said.

Adam Michael Segal with his book

"Another thing that was important to me also was that kids would identify with the story that had an animated character who was kind of teaching his parents a lesson. I liked that concept and I thought it would be effective for kids. That's why in the story, it's the protagonist, a child, who is having an influence on his own family to make healthier food choices."

In addition to promoting the book, Segal is also working on developing a teaching tool kit that would be curriculum-based and would use the book as a teaching resource.

Segal also has ambitions to produce an app related to the book.

"The app idea is based on the principle in the book, which is to reward kids for eating healthy foods. If you think of the way that people keep track of how many steps people take in a day, it would be like that, but it would be kids keeping track of healthy foods they eat."

He said he's already written a second story with the same character based around the theme of fitness, but right now he's focused on promoting the first instalment before he moves forward with another project.

"I think kids are empowered by seeing how a boy can influence his family in such a positive way and how the family, together, discovers that eating smart is fun, cool and important for everyone." ■

Wanted: A home for old books

BILL GLADSTONE

Although the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library of Toronto closed about eight years ago, the library still exists in ghostly form. Picture rows of bookshelves in a darkened room, permanently locked and as silent as any librarian might wish for, and you are likely not far wrong.

All of the former library's books and resources are apparently still gathering dust in an off-site storage facility, according to Dara Solomon, director of the Ontario Jewish Archives and spokesperson for the now-defunct library, which was operated by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"They're in storage on Magnetic Drive [near Dufferin Street and Steeles Avenue]," Solomon said. "The movers relocated the library and took all the books out of the boxes and set them up on the shelves."

Tasked with finding a new home for the books, Solomon has been unable to find any takers. "No one is interested in taking on older books," she said. "I haven't been able to find any interest in them."

The library dates back to the late 1930s, when Spadina Avenue bookseller Ben Zion Hyman established a tiny independent library in a storefront along Spadina. By 1941 the library had gone public and moved into the Chambers, a set of rooms in the College and Spadina area.

It subsequently operated out of premises on Markham Street and Glen Park Road before moving in 1983 into its final home at 4600 Bathurst St. Known as the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library, it possessed some 30,000 volumes, according to a 1983 article in the Toronto Star.

Today the Frank and Anita Ekstein Holocaust Library fills the location where the former library used to reside.

For some reason, despite the Latners' largesse, Toronto's Jewish community never saw fit to develop the Jewish Public Library into a first-rate institution. By comparison, Montreal's venerable, 101-year-old Jewish Public Library is sustained by a $5-million endowment, holds more than 150,000 items, and features a large children's library, archives, multimedia centre, and antiquarian books collection.

In any case, Toronto is not exactly bereft of Jewish bibliographic resources and treasures: the University of Toronto's Robarts Library houses one of the best Judaica collections on the continent.

Since the rise of the Internet many public libraries are moving away from books into electronic resources like ebooks and online databases. Times have changed and the public no longer seems to need or crave printed words as once they did.

Toronto's Jewish Public Library has closed permanently with no prospect of revival, Solomon confirmed. It was closed "due to a lack of resources and a decline in circulation of books being taken out," she said. "That's a universal problem that libraries are having." ■

Film captures devotion of guide dogs and their masters

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

It's amazing the impact a beloved animal can have on a person, even after 71 years.

Max Eisen remembers the last time he saw his dog, Farkas, as if it was yesterday. The image is seared in his memory, and you can still hear the emotion in his voice as he recounts the tale.

Eisen, along with 450 other Jews in the town of Moldava in what is today part of Slovakia, were being marched out of town on the first day of Passover, 1944, en route to Auschwitz. They had been removed from their homes the night before and already their former neighbours had moved into the homes of the departing Jews. They watched in silence as the group walked out of town. As they marched past his family's property, Farkas recognized him and barked madly and wouldn't stop.

"Farkas was the only human being in that town. There was no humanity in that town," Eisen said.

It was a remarkable contrast to a time two years earlier when Eisen returned to his home after he and his father had been deported. Instead of being deported to a death camp, luck was with them and they were brought back from the brink. Something had changed the mind of the Horthy regime in Hungary, and so the Jews who were likely on their way to their deaths, were returned. Farkas greeted him with tail-wagging excitement and licks all over his face.

Viewing a film made during a recent March of the Living [MOL] trip to Nazi death camps, rekindled those memories. Eisen was particularly moved by a scene in which a guide dog for the blind licked the tears from the eyes of one of the Israeli participants. The woman had been on the ground, overcome with emotion by being in a room next to a gas chamber. Her dog, seeing her distress came over to comfort her. Sort of what Farkas did more than 70 years ago, said Eisen.

The 2013 March of the Living included six blind Israelis and their guide dogs.

The film of which Eisen was speaking is titled Blind Love, a 28-minute documentary filmed during the 2013 MOL. March of the Living brings young Jews to Poland where they visit sites of Jewish life before the war as well as concentration camps where much of European Jewry were murdered. A contingent of Holocaust survivors accompanies the group, telling their personal stories and adding to the impact of the trip.

The 2013 MOL included six blind Israelis and their guide dogs. One of them, Tel Aviv lawyer Liron Artzi, was the woman who broke down in tears in Majdanek. Her dog, Petel, a mixed Labrador and Golden Retriever, provided comfort when she was in distress.

The inclusion of the blind Israelis came about as the result of a fortuitous set of circumstances. A few years ago, Eli Rubenstein paid a visit to the Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind. Among the many hats that Rubenstein wears is one as president of the Canadian support group for the centre, so he wanted to see first hand the work done by that Israeli charity that matches guide dogs with blind people.

It turned out that the visually impaired Israelis he met were quite interested in one of his other community jobs, as national director of March of the Living Canada.

"Many told me they wanted to go on March of the Living," Rubenstein said. "They feel part of the Jewish community and they want to be part of the teaching about the Holocaust."

A film crew went along and they captured images of the visit that touched people on many levels, including the scene in Majdanek. It's a powerful moment and it shows just how far we've come from the days when Nazis trained dogs to murder Jews, Rubenstein said.

"We understood the symbolism," he continued. "The Nazis didn't just murder Jews, they murdered people with disabilities. And the Nazis trained German Shepherds to torture and kill prisoners."

One scene shows survivor David Shentow recounting his arrival in Auschwitz in 1942. As the prisoners disembarked from the train, one man asked an SS guard if he could get a photo from his luggage. The guard ordered his dog on the man. The dog went for his throat, and killed him.

To illustrate the scene, the filmmaker used a vintage photo provided by Canadian Bill Glied. Glied is a survivor of Auschwitz who has been on MOL three times. He has seen the film and believes it packs a powerful message.

"It tells of the juxtaposition of the [guide] dogs against the dogs the Nazis had there."

"The fact they took these six people to Auschwitz is an important and meaningful experience not only for them, but for all the people on the March," he said.

The broadcast premiere of the film is set for Nov. 4 on the CBC Documentary Channel. It was also scheduled to be screened at Congregation Habonim on Nov. 1, 8 p.m., during the 35th annual Holocaust Education Week. The screening co-sponsors are, Congregation Habonim, Toronto Jewish Film Festival, Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, March of the Living Digital Archives Project and Canadian Friends of the Israel Guide Dog Centre for the Blind. ■

Poet Robyn Sarah wins Governor General award

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Robyn Sarah of Montreal, a published poet since the early 1970s, has won the Governor General's Literary Award for English-language poetry, for her collection My Shoes Are Killing Me, it was announced on Oct. 28.

Published by the small house Biblioasis of Windsor, Ont., the collection is a reflection on the passage of time, with references to Jewish identity, that avoids the sentimental and offers unexpected humour, according to critics.

In October, Sarah won the Canadian Jewish Literary Award for the same collection.

The award jury praised My Shoes as "a lyrical power" and "a richly inventive, precise, meditative collection... This is a transformative work that continuously surprises the reader."

"My first reaction to finding out that I had won was shock, and I think it still hasn't entirely sunk in," Sarah told The CJN.

"Of course I'm happy – it's wonderfully affirming to be given this moment of validation and visibility, especially as a poet. At the same time, it's a little overwhelming to be suddenly in the spotlight, after 30-odd years in the shadows and margins of the literary world. One feels tongue-tied, right when everybody wants a quote!"

Born in New York in 1949 to Canadian parents, Sarah grew up in Montreal and was educated at McGill University and the Conservatoire de musique du Québec.

Her first work was published while she was completing her graduate studies.

She is known for finding inspiration in everyday experience or, in her words, "making much of something small."

Asked what influence her Jewish heritage has had on her writing, Sarah responded: "Well, we have been called the People of the Book. Our community is one in which literacy is valued, and our tradition is one in which words are weighed, considered, and unpacked for all their possible interpretations," she said.

"This is fertile ground for a writer, and especially for a poet, since poetry is the most compressed of literary forms – one in which as much as possible has to be packed into every word chosen. My poems only occasionally touch on overtly Jewish themes.

"Being Jewish is part of who I am, so the poems will sometimes reflect that part. I'm also a woman, I'm a musician, I'm a baby boomer entering seniorhood, among other things; those aspects of who I am are reflected in my poetry, too."

Her first full-length poetry collection The Space Between Sleep and Waking was published in 1981. Several more collections have been published since, as well as two volumes of short stories.

In 1976, she and Fred Louder founded the small press Villeneuve Publications, which operated until 1987. She taught English literature at Champlain Regional College until 1996.

In recent years, Sarah has been the poetry editor for Cormorant Books, and edited the 2011 collection Undercurrents: New Voices in Canadian Poetry.

Also receiving a Governor General's award was the translation into French of Mordecai Richler's novel Solomon Gursky Was Here, which won for English into French translation for Lori Saint-Martin and Paul Gagné.

Solomon Gursky is the first of five translations of Richler novels planned by the Montreal publisher Les Editions du Boréal. These are the first new translations of Richler books in Quebec in four decades.

The awards jury said the two translators "render brilliantly the energy, humour, irony and colour of a social fresco that spans five generations, taking us from the Old World to the New."

The awards, which earn winners $25,000 each, will be presented by Governor General David Johnston at Rideau Hall on Dec. 2. ■

MARRIED WITH KIDS

Behind the wheel

Lauren Kramer

There was a sick feeling in my stomach the day I told my dad he could no longer drive my kids around.

I knew it was time, knew I had to do it. Still, I felt a traitor uttering those words, my heart in my throat as his face fell with visible disappointment at the knowledge I no longer trusted him behind the wheel.

"You think I'm unfit to drive?" he asked incredulously. He'd been re-tested for his licence just months earlier, an exam he'd deemed unnecessary and grumbled about at length. In the end, he'd passed, but a nagging uncertainty persisted inside me. A little voice in my head reminded me about the red light he hadn't seen that one time, or the occasion he'd almost reversed into my car. So, how could I put my greatest treasures into his vehicle?

"It's not that I think you're unfit," I hedged, trying to inch my way delicately out of this incredibly painful conversation. "It's just that I'm not willing to take any chances."

Of course, it wasn't worth taking the chance. It hadn't been for at least six months. In the beginning, I'd tried not to say so out loud. When he'd offer to take the children for ice cream, I'd suggest we walk instead of drive. For other get-togethers we'd meet at a destination.

But eventually, honesty is unavoidable, and we had reached that point. I had to stand up as a mother and tell this man I love so dearly, this fiercely strong man who had fathered me with gentle determination all my life, that I questioned his driving skills. That I wasn't certain how much longer he should be behind the wheel. And that even if I was wrong, it wouldn't be worth it to experiment.

It's ironic, really. A year after I got my driver's licence at 18, my father declared I was a danger on the road, confiscated my keys and enrolled me in driving lessons. I remember feeling mortified and humiliated. "I can drive!" I raged. "I passed the test! Why are you making me take lessons?"

> A little voice in my head reminded me about the red light he hadn't seen.

It's hard to talk reason into a feisty 19-year-old who knows everything. But my parents managed to communicate their fear that I was driving recklessly, driving too fast, that I was an accident waiting to happen. "Do this for us," they pleaded. "We're paying. Just go for more lessons."

Steaming with indignation, I took the lessons. (It was the only way I was getting my car keys back, so I was highly motivated.) I learned a little about defensive driving, and while I'll never know if those classes made a difference, to this day, I've never had an accident.

Life moved relentlessly forward. My father has been behind the wheel for 56 years and his track record is, for the most part, impeccable. Sure, there are a few speeding fines and parking infractions. But he's never bent a fender, caused a collision or written off a vehicle.

Still, I'm the one who's fearful now. Fearful that he's not as alert as he once was, that his reflexes aren't as fast, that his anger might overwhelm him on the road. I can't wait for the possibility of an accident to find out if I'm right.

So here we are, a father and a daughter. A man who's convinced of his competence behind the wheel. A daughter who worries that he may lack insight into his abilities and that his skill in the driver's seat may have diminished. We love each other fiercely. And yet. There are my children, my innocents, who know nothing about the road and its hazards or about aging and its effects. They want a ride to the fish shop with Grandpa and look at me, mystified, when I insist they cannot just climb into the back seat.

I'll do the driving now, and gladly. I never want to say, "I told you so." ■

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier surveys how the commentators describe Isaac's return to his community
Rabbi Denise Handlarski locates the roots of Jewish feminism in the Torah's description of Rebecca Rabbi Yirmi Cohen explains the uniqueness of the Cave of Patriarchs in the history of Judaism

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier

Many people recall vividly the first meeting with their eventual spouse. But how about what happened immediately prior to that first meeting?

Interestingly, the Torah records what happened immediately prior to Isaac's first meeting with his future wife, Rebecca: "And Isaac came from the way of Be'er Lachai Roi, for he dwelt in the land of the South" (Genesis 24:62).

The commentators point to the significance of this verse, which describes not only Isaac's actions prior to his marriage, but also represents the first action he takes following the Akedah – the binding by his father on Moriah. There is significance to this emergence, and many interpreters offer fascinating insights into Isaac's inner life.

They point to the unique location where Isaac had settled: Be'er Lachai Roi. This was the desert well where an angel spoke to Hagar and said that God has heard her cries. She is promised a son, Ishmael, whose seed will be greatly multiplied (Genesis 16:10-14).

The midrash (Tanchuma) states that Isaac travelled to Be'er Lachai Roi in search of Hagar – he wanted to bring her back to Abraham. Now that Isaac is about to be married and start his own family, he didn't want his father to be alone.

According to Nahmanides, Isaac was visiting a place where prayers were answered. Perhaps Isaac was searching for a place to pray for his future marriage.

Finally, Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch wrote that Isaac had been in the desert all along. He desired a life of seclusion.

Coming from Be'er Lachai Roi seems to represent Isaac's return to life and community. Perhaps he is brought back by the need to take care of his father. Perhaps he realizes that it is time to leave the place of seclusion and reconnect with people. Once he is committed to leave the desert and embrace family and community, he – together with his wife Rebecca – continues the legacy of Abraham and Sarah. ■

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier is a Judaic Studies teacher in Montreal, where she lives with her husband and four daughters.

Rabbi Denise Handlarski

Although named for "Sarah's life," this parshah really begins with Sarah's death and burial. It then goes on to detail the betrothal of Rebecca to Isaac.

Rebecca is chosen because she is generous – she gives of her water and offers her home for hospitality. In order to marry Isaac, she is asked whether she will leave her own home and travel to Isaac's home. She declares strongly, "I will go."

Rarely in the Torah do we see women have the opportunity to assert their own will in this way. Rebecca wishes to use her strong character, her generosity and hospitality to better not just her own family but a whole people. The person she first benefits, of course, is Isaac. After they marry, the text says that Isaac is comforted from the loss of Sarah, his mother. The parshah begins with Sarah's death and ends with this note of Isaac finding comfort in another woman, the future mother to the generations of their descendants.

The assertion of Rebecca's will and the text's continual return to the importance of these matriarchs – for the well-being of the patriarchs (Abraham and Isaac) and in their own right – highlights the familial nature of the origin stories of our people.

Historically in Jewish text and culture, women, unfortunately, have played a secondary role. However, as the ones who tended to manage the family and the household, women have played a tremendous role in the fabric of Jewish life.

Even our texts, which tend to be filtered through and centred on a male point of view, acknowledge this extremely significant role. Although women are often seen as secondary, Rebecca has agency, and Isaac needs her.

These are the moments in our core texts that have given Jewish feminists the tools to imagine the place for women in Judaism. ■

Rabbi Denise Handlarski is spiritual leader of Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism in Toronto.

Rabbi Yirmi Cohen

This week's Torah portion, Chayei Sarah, tells us that, when Sarah passed on, Abraham went to purchase a field from Ephron the Hittite for the cave of the patriarchs and matriarchs.

Ephron offered it as a gift, but Abraham insisted on paying the full price, 400 silver shkalim. Why the full price? Abraham wanted to remove any connection between this cave and Ephron, so that it would remain his and the forefathers.

Now unfortunately, with terror in Israel, UNESCO has asked to have the cave turned over to Arabs. This Torah reading tells us the uniqueness of the cave: it is the first site in Israel to be purchased for the Jewish People. Since it was bought to bury Sarah, the mother of Isaac, it is clear that the cave has no connection to Ishmael. The cave gives us strength to believe all of Israel will remain in the hands of the Jews forever.

We must strengthen Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. But we should not be begging for "negotiations!" Negotiations have in the past led to terrible concessions and more bloodshed, God forbid! We must not negotiate any place in Israel! Talk, yes, but not negotiate our tiny country!

We have all seen the horrific pictures of our brothers and sisters who are being murdered. What can we do for them? The Torah says that when Jewish males put on tfillin, this scares away the enemy. Let's recite Psalms of King David, Tehilim, every day. I treasure the 10 minutes every day, when I drive my son to cheder and we say Psalms for Israel.

It is also an auspicious time for women to pray when they light Shabbat candles.

So, give charity. Study more Torah. Talk to someone you haven't seen for a while.

Peace at home brings blessings to us. May we merit Mashiach with the Third Temple on the Temple Mount, in Jerusalem. Amen! ■

Tea is an adventure in a cup

CAROLYN BLACKMAN
cblackman@thecjn.ca

Tea sommelier Carol Mark.

The Canadian Friends of Israel Elwyn is hosting an Afternoon Tea with a Modern Twist, Nov. 15, at the Holland Bloorview Conference Centre, 2-4 p.m., featuring certified tea sommelier Carol Mark.

At the event, "we will serve food paired with tea – things you would have had growing up in a kosher household," Mark said in an interview.

Funds raised will go to Israel Elwyn's preschool programs, which are located in various parts of the country.

"Currently, we are raising funds for a new preschool centre in the Haifa region," said Moshe Greengarten, chairman of the board of Canadian Friends of Israel Elwyn.

Founded in 1984, Israel Elwyn serves more than 3,000 children and adults with disabilities throughout Israel. The ultimate goal of all of Israel Elwyn's programs is to provide individuals with the tools they need to lead more independent lives within the community.

At the tea, Mark will talk about various topics including the health benefits of tea, how it is ethically grown and processed, and kosher tea.

Mark, the daughter of Chinese immigrants, said that when she was growing up, tea was always served at family gatherings and at the New Year, and was also used as medicine.

After recovering from breast cancer, she said, she rediscovered tea as a tool for taking time to heal, as well as part of a healthy lifestyle.

"Tea is a young scientific area," Mark said. "It has been found through a study that women under 50 years of age who are drinking three cups of green tea a day lower their chances of breast cancer by 37 per cent.

"Tea is the new buzzword for health, as there has been research in this area, especially with green tea. For the first time in British history, green tea is outselling black tea, and this is also happening across the world."

Originally a nurse and then an art gallery owner, Mark founded The Love of Tea, a purveyor of specialty pure blended teas that supports art and social change through its donation programs from tea sales.

"My start in the tea business was quite by accident. As part of my own recovery, I researched the health benefits of tea and started giving away tea to other people who were recovering. There are many components to my tea business, including at www.theloveofteamag.com, a newly launched e-magazine, which all together certainly takes up most of my life.

"I am also launching a bottled, healthy, to-go tea with no additives or sugar. Sugar has been identified as a main culprit underlying many diseases including cancer, and hidden sugar amounts to 80 pounds per year per person. When travelling I could not find a ready to-go drink I wanted.

"It also has a charity component and a percentage of each bottle will be donated to The Power of Health conference, which I established as an event to share best practices in health, food, medicine, alternative treatments slated for October 2016. We can only be healthier when we have the knowledge to make informed decisions."

In the 19th century in North America, Mark said, "women could only legally gather together to work on women's rights issues at teatime. In fact, the traditional tea events held by Jewish women's social groups had the same aims. They would fundraise for special causes. I feel like I'm continuing the tradition of women's political involvement and social change.

"Tea brings people together and provides a quiet, calming moment in the day to take time for yourself. That is why Silicon Valley has embraced tea to create moments of personal calm for their employees."

Tea, Mark said, is "an adventure in a cup. There are distinct taste profiles reflecting the growing regions around the world. I cook with tea, from appetizers to main dishes, desserts and even tea cocktails.

"Tea comes from one plant, Camellia Sinensis, and the way it is processed determines the end product. Black tea is wilted and fully oxidized, white tea is wilted and unoxidized, oolong tea is wilted, bruised and partly oxidized, yellow tea is wilted and unoxidized, green tea is wilted and unoxidized and puer tea is fermented.

But, Mark said, "my main focus is health, and that means organic and pesticide free. I was shocked a few years ago to learn that many individuals like myself were using tea as a health benefit, but there was little known information on the use of pesticides. So to have a healthy cup of tea ensure it is organic and pesticide free as possible." ■

With files from Susan Minuk.

Admission to the Israel Elwyn Afternoon Tea with a Modern Twist is $36 and a tax receipt will be issued.

Hilary Earl: Why do normal people do sadistic things?

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Holocaust Education Week 2015's scholar-in-residence, Hilary Earl, is a historian whose research focuses on perpetrator testimony and war crimes trials in the aftermath of the Holocaust. She is associate professor of European history at Nipissing University and the author of The Nuremberg SS-Einsatzgruppen Trial, 1945–1958: Atrocity, Law, and History, which won the 2010 Hans Rosenberg Prize for best book on German history from the American Historical Association. The CJN spoke to Earl about her research.

Hilary Earl

What are some things you'll be speaking about during HEW?

I'll be giving two public talks. One is at Beth Tzedec Congregation (Nov. 5) and is about a Nazi perpetrator named Martin Sandberger, who lived until 2010. He was prosecuted, but then reintegrated back into German society, raising a family and having quite a good career.

During the war, Sandberger was in charge of a commando responsible for killing all the Jews of Estonia. He was very well educated and had a PhD in law. After the war, he was prosecuted in Nuremberg. He was sentenced to death, but because of various political reasons, like the Cold War, the Americans reviewed his sentence and commuted it from death to a prison sentence. He was only in jail for 10 years. Then there was enormous pressure on the Americans to let German war criminals go, and they released him from prison in 1958. He had a lot of supporters and help from various important Germans, and got a good job for a major company, becoming their lawyer. He made a handsome living.

Why are you so interested in Nazi perpetrators?

I started out my scholarly career looking at victims and I didn't sleep, it was so horrible, and it broke my heart continuously. I was very interested in the question of why people who aren't pathological or otherwise sadistic or deranged are willing to participate in violence against other people – the question of why people hurt each other and so I came upon this subject of research.

The trial that I came to look closely at is the Nuremberg SS-Einsatzgruppen trial, which took place from 1945 to 1958. It was the ninth of the 13 Nuremberg trials and was a genocide trial of 24 individuals who could have been leaders or professors or business icons but happened to be in the Third Reich. They were major perpetrators who carried out major crimes against the Jews of Europe.

I think it's easier to understand why someone hurts someone else when they're ill or pathological, but harder to understand why regular people are involved in killing.

Have you found answers about why people who weren't deranged were involved in this sort of genocide?

With the individuals I've been looking at, they were highly ambitious and the state offered them careers to advance themselves if they were willing to do what it wanted. Almost all of these men were committed nationalists, and the professorate in the 1920s and '30s in Germany was full of diehard German nationalists who influenced their students. They weren't necessarily fascist, but were sympathetic to the Nazis. Sandberger, for example, was heavily influenced by his professors.

There are a number of reasons why men like him got involved in Nazi activity, but anti-Semitism was probably the least motivating factor. Some were diehard anti-Semites, but some really weren't at all. And that, too, is scary – that people can participate in killing when they don't even hate the people they're killing. I call these guys hybrid killers. They weren't the shooters, but the order-givers. But they also weren't sitting at desks like Adolf Eichmann. They were in the field overseeing mass atrocities. Collectively, these 24 supervisors killed between one million to 1.5 million people.

What can we learn about their reintegration into German society?

One takeaway is that Germany is the country that has dealt most extensively with the crimes of its past, but in order to do so, they have had to let people like Sandberger be welcomed back into German society. They prosecuted who they could prosecute, but then they had to run their country somehow.

Millions of Nazis were still alive after the war. Genocide is a corporate act, and it takes a myriad of people to carry it out. Sadly, many of the perpetrators ended up being major government officials or major players in business after the war. There was a collective amnesia in Germany in some ways. Inevitably, some people were never held to account. But Germany is also unique in that it recognizes what it's done and did its best to bring to trial who they could.

One hears about contemporary Germans having a collective sense of guilt for the Shoah. Is this recent and not prevalent in the years after the war?

It depends who you talk to and on the time frame. Nothing is static. Germany has ensured that education plays a major role in the transformation of its society. Germans learn all about the country's past in school. It's no coincidence Germany is one of the countries that produces the most historians. So, sure, there's a collective guilt and a sense of feeling badly, but they've also confronted it and continue to confront it, like with the recent prosecution of former Auschwitz death camp officer Oskar Groening.

If there was this sense of guilt, why were so many perpetrators allowed to work in high positions after the war?

Because there were millions of perpetrators. It requires half a country to commit genocide, and we don't have a justice system that's able to contend with that. Even if we did, you can't put your entire country in jail. It's one of the greatest problems in post-conflict societies – there are so many people involved in the violence that you can't penalize all of them. Germany's way to address this has been multifaceted: it has been to prosecute the highest-ranking people it could find, the decision-makers, and to use the educational system to transform society. It's also been to keep the issue alive by creating memorials and museums and making transfer payments to Israel.

The guys I study from the Nuremberg SS-Einsatzgruppen trial were leaders of killing units, and most got out of prison by 1958. The men they gave the orders to were largely prosecuted in the late 1950s and early 1960s, and many of these order-receivers got heavier sentences than the order-givers.

Why is that?

Because the leaders were prosecuted by the Americans, and the underlings were prosecuted by the Germans. Politics got involved. Between 1945 and 1949, the Americans prosecuted the biggest surviving war criminals they could find. But then Germany first got independence in 1949 (and completely in 1955), and part of the process of getting independence was its ability to prosecute the criminals themselves. So they began initiating trials starting in 1949, and they tended to have more severe penalties, aside from the death penalty against the original 23 tried in Nuremberg. The Americans wanted Germany as an ally against the Soviets, and part of that was letting the German war criminals out of prison. ■

The Nazi pied piper's lethal seduction

Backstory

EROL ARAF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The 80th anniversary of the release of the German film The Triumph of the Will calls for revisiting its significance. Leni Riefenstahl's documentary is constantly reconfigured and recycled for scenes requiring mass ornamentation in modern cinema, and its thematic ethos resonates in the folklore of 21st-century social media. To this day, the film's camouflaged message of pied pipers leading the multitudes to the promised land of imagined communities has been adapted by the disseminators of genocidal propaganda.

As German Prof. Eric Rentschler observed in his book on Nazi cinema, The Ministry of Illusion, the conjurers of Berlin made full use of film's ability to mobilize emotions and immobilize minds. "Audiovisual machinery played a crucial role in National Socialist design for living, in radical attempts to control human activity and dominate the physical world," Rentschler wrote.

Indeed, the Third Reich was, in the words of filmmaker Hans Jurgen Syberberg, "a sustained cinematic event," where its principal protagonists experienced their participation in shaping and leading Germany to total destruction as performing "stars" in the "greatest movie" ever made. They were simply "movie mad."

The Nuremberg Rally's choreography of violence and its "brute symmetry," in the words of American writer and filmmaker Susan Sontag, amounted to Nazi self-perception being projected onto the silver screen. The rally was a meticulously staged show, adorned with human and material props, exclusively designed for Riefenstahl's lenses.

In the film, Adolf Hitler was a national matinee idol who also happened to be the Reich's chancellor. The Fuhrer became the artist, and the artist became the Fuhrer. Indeed, according to a conversation in August 1939 before the outbreak of World War II, published in The British War Blue Book, Hitler told British ambassador Neville Henderson: "I am an artist and not a politician. Once the Polish question is settled, I want to end my life as an artist."

By estheticizing the political sphere, the Nazis anesthetized the masses with "songs, props, circuses and dances." These were the tools of the lethal seduction that enabled the National Socialists to create an omnipotent and omnipresent media dictatorship. The "celebrities" of the New Germany became also the jailers of the German mind.

The notion of "captive audience" assumed a new and sinister meaning in the Nazi world of manufactured dreams. But what we failed to see, as American historian George Mosse said, was "that the fascist esthetic itself reflected the needs and hopes of contemporary society, that what we brushed aside as the so-called superstructure was in reality the means through which most people grasped the fascist message, transforming politics into a civic religion."

And this is precisely how the celluloid "superstructure" engendered the invisible pied piper leading Germany and Europe with songs and dances to a calamitous finale.

The wizardry of fascism fascinated then, and continues to fascinate now. If the esthetic constructs of Leni Riefenstahl are enjoying a posthumous revival in modern cinema – as digital special effects greatly enhance the visual power of epic mass ornamentation – it is not because a venomous ideology has been resuscitated. It is because the form enjoys enduring appeal.

The danger here is that digital special effects combined with poisonous content can become once more a lethal tool in deadly hands. Rentschler was the first to point out that American filmmaker George Lucas restaged ceremonies from The Triumph of the Will in the final scene of Star Wars, Episode 1. In Batman Returns, the monumental constructs were pure Riefenstahl, Speer and Breker. More recently, The Hunger Games episodes, Ridley Scott's Exodus: Gods and Kings, and Peter Jackson's Lord of the Rings and Hobbit trilogies have encapsulated the quintessence of The Triumph's form.

But the real contemporary problem with the appeal of Leni Riefenstahl's vision does not reside in digitally reconfigured battle scenes. It finds its most lethal expression in cyberspace and its plethora of ubiquitous platforms that have become the dominant media for the dissemination of hatred. The Net defines who we are, how we perceive ourselves, how we project our desires, how we love, how we hate and how we preach violence. It is pervasive and all consuming in terms of its ability to manipulate emotions, mobilize fears, generate instant mass action communities and even light the fuse of orgies of ethnic mass murder on a global scale. ■

Israel expelling cats and crocs?

Israeli Agriculture Minister Uri Ariel cancelled a proposal to deport Israel's feral cats last week. Environmentalists had objected to Ariel's plan, which he said was necessary because spaying and neutering cats violates biblical law. For a few days after, it seemed Israel's animals were safe. But then the head of the Yafit settlement suggested transferring crocodiles from the West Bank to a foreign country after a crocodile was found on its grounds Nov. 4. The little croc likely escaped from a farm on a nearby moshav, though owner Gadi Bitan said it's not his. A number of reptiles have escaped from the farm, including several dozen in 2011. A state official said Bitan has previously blocked solutions to the problem.

Just a leaky pipe

Water dripping from walls doesn't usually induce rapture, but it did Nov. 3 for some visitors to the Kotel, who thought water flowing from the ancient stones signalled the coming of the Messiah. According to biblical prophecy, the Messiah's arrival will come with a great awakening of nature in the Holy Land, starting with water gushing from "the house of the Lord" in Jerusalem to fill all the rivers of Israel. But maintenance workers said the leak, detected in the area known as Wilson's Arch, was due to a burst pipe on the Temple Mount next to the Kotel. Water had seeped into the stones and made its way to the prayer section.

They're both welcome in the Holy Land.

Powerful Jews make Forbes list

Several Jews, including Facebook founder Mark Zuckerberg, made it onto Forbes magazine's 2015 World's Most Powerful People list, published Nov. 4. Of the 73 people on the list, U.S. Federal Reserve Chair Janet Yellen was the highest-ranked Jew at No. 7, while Zuckerberg was No. 10. Other Jews in the top 50 were Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, 21; Goldman Sachs CEO Lloyd Blankfein, 26; Google co-founder Sergey Brin, 30; and former New York mayor Michael Bloomberg, 44. Russian President Vladimir Putin was No. 1, and German Chancellor Angela Merkel was second. U.S. President Barack Obama was No. 3. ■

Election reflections

Much has been written on the pages of The CJN about former prime minister Stephen Harper's incredible support for Israel and what that means to the Jews. Since the election, there have been several analyses of the results.

The strong Zionist in me who is outraged by the world's unfairness to Israel and who has a son and his family living in Jerusalem deeply mourns the passing from office of the greatest foreign friend Israel has ever had as head of a government.

The patriotic Canadian, and lover of democracy in me, voted enthusiastically to have him removed from that job and rejoices in our success. The man was not good for this country.

Now what we supporters of Israel need to do in the next while is hold the Liberal government to its promise to be a good friend to the Jewish state. That would start by opposing the many preposterous resolutions that are routinely put to the United Nations General Assembly by various Jew-hating dictatorships and spineless European governments, as that party failed too often to do in the past. They can still support the rare reasonable one that may come up.

Finding partners for peace

The Oct. 22 column, "In Israel, terror and frustration abound," implies that the Israeli government is somehow absolved from responsibility with the rise of the current terror wave in Israel.

Editor Yoni Goldstein asks, "But what can Israel do? There is no one to talk to about peace on the Palestinian side, and no clear method to curtail the violence." There are many in Israel and in the Diaspora who would disagree with such an assessment. A senior IDF official, Alan Nitzan, testified that right-wing extremist settlers in the West Bank are fuelling Palestinian violence and terror. Nitzan related that both the activities of IDF soldiers and West Bank settlers are viewed by Palestinians as perpetuating the occupation.

Some would argue that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government has failed to provide security to Israeli citizens and is simply managing the conflict with a reactive policy. If Netanyahu recently declared that territorial concessions towards establishing a Palestinian state are inevitable, then why not agree to the diplomatic parameters of two states based on the peace proposal of the previous Israeli government? Why lead this territorial conflict into becoming a religious conflict? Is it not time for Netanyahu to stop avoiding his and the nation's obligation to make peace with the Palestinians?

Much has been made of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's misstatement that it was the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem who convinced Hitler to implement the final solution.

Let's concentrate on relevant misstatements by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas that there were never any Jewish Temples and that Jesus Christ was a Palestinian. Hitler needed no encouragement in his effort to annihilate the Jewish People.

Question of the week

Late last month, the Rabbinical Council of America, the main modern Orthodox rabbinical group, voted against the ordination or hiring of women rabbis. What do you think of this decision?

RABBI·2·RABBI

Orthodoxy and female rabbis

Is the recent rabbinical resolution against ordaining women a reaffirmation of tradition, or the beginning of a larger debate?

RABBI N. DANIEL KOROBKIN
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI LISA GRUSHCOW
TEMPLE EMANU-EL BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Grushcow: The Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) just came out with a rejection of Orthodox women's ordination and any rabbinic-type titles or roles for women.

As a rabbi in the Reform movement, which has been ordaining women for over 40 years, I am in many ways an outsider to this debate and the beneficiary of the struggles of those who came before me.

However, I have the privilege of serving the Montreal Jewish community and am proud to have as colleagues here two Orthodox women who are also clergy. I see them serving faithfully within their understanding of Halachah, and, like most people who break barriers, they excel at what they do.

At the same time, no one is forced to hire them or agree with the halachic grounding for their ordination. Why is this seen as such a threat?

Rabbi Korobkin: I have no doubt that the Orthodox women who serve as clergy in Montreal are doing excellent work.

Women serve in various capacities in religious leadership roles throughout the Orthodox world. Our schools have female headmasters, principals and religious studies instructors. Our communities have yoatzot Halachah (experts in family purity law), Torah scholars and hospital chaplains (Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children's Jewish chaplain was the recently retired Gitty Edery, an Orthodox lady who served with great distinction for many years).

My wife and I serve our shul as rabbi and rebbetzin, and I can assure you that her role is just as vital of a leadership position as mine.

The latest resolution addresses the specific issue of conferring ordination. Orthodox tradition only permits this formal rabbinic appointment for men, just as Mormons only permit formal priesthood ordination for men. Changing ordination rules is viewed by many in our circles to be as much of a deviation from Orthodoxy as the removal of the mechitzah or the installation of an organ in the synagogue.

So I wouldn't characterize it as reacting to a "threat," but rather as a reformulation of Orthodoxy's commitment to mesorah (tradition).

Rabbi Grushcow: I hear you, and I understand that we work within very different understandings of Jewish law, but the Jews I know who are Orthodox and support the ordination of women also are deeply connected with, and respectful of, mesorah.

I also know that the role of rebbetzin is time-honoured and significant in many Orthodox communities. But why should a woman have to marry a man who is a rabbi to serve as a spiritual leader? Why would one not want every spiritual leader to be trained and recognized as such (not to mention paid a salary)?

There is a tension here, of course. Judaism is about a tradition passed down for millennia, and the needs of the community usually outweigh individual needs. The answer cannot simply be that Orthodox women want to be rabbis so every other issue disappears. But it seems to me – again, with the humility of an outsider – that the Orthodox community is enriched by the spiritual leadership of all who have the ability and desire to serve.

My hope is that those who are in this debate will be able to go forward in a way that makes more room within the Jewish community, not less. Orthodox, Conservative, Reform – all are relatively recent groupings in terms of Jewish history, and none of us knows for certain which way is the best way forward.

It seems to me that there should be room enough for all of us in Jewish life, even with our disagreements.

Rabbi Korobkin: This is why many RCA members and officers – myself included – while agreeing with the substance of the resolution nonetheless voted against it. We believe that now is not the time to reaffirm our differences, but rather to find positive ways to work together amid our disagreements, even when those disagreements are about the very same mesorah we both wish to uphold.

My hope is that when the hoopla of this latest resolution dies down, Orthodox leaders will be able to more productively focus inward on the real social and religious ills of our communities, and then positively engage in outreach to the rest of the Jewish community to make Klal Yisrael more cohesive and strong. I look forward to sharing our common goals and strengths. ■

Does ordination ruling herald a split in Orthodoxy?

Is there room for women in the Orthodox rabbinate? The answer may be no or yes, depending on who you ask.

Earlier this month, the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA), the leading institution of Orthodox rabbis, issued a resolution reiterating its 2010 verdict on the subject of female rabbis. Back then, the RCA ruled it "cannot accept either the ordination of women or the recognition of women as members of the Orthodox rabbinate, regardless of the title." While many, including some rabbis associated with the RCA, questioned the timing of this latest statement, its meaning is not in doubt: for mainstream Orthodoxy, the idea of female rabbis remains a no-go.

And yet, the facts on the ground might suggest otherwise. A number of women are currently establishing their place in modern Orthodox communities, where they have achieved ordination under the labels "maharat" and "rabba," clever titles meant to carry the same weight as "rabbi" without resorting to that specific terminology. Two of those maharot – Abby Brown Scheier and Rachel Kohl Finegold, who are both CJN contributors – currently work in Montreal. (There are no other maharot working in Canada at present.)

So, while some leading rabbis pronounce from atop the Orthodox universe, the existence of these maharot, not to mention the Orthodox (male) rabbis who signed off on their ordinations, suggest that the RCA may not have the only word on the subject.

In this week's CJN, we report on the practical implications of the RCA's ruling and consider some of the underlying currents behind its decision. Reporter Sheri Shefa talks to maharot Brown Scheier and Kohl Finegold (see page 15), while, in our Rabbi 2 Rabbi column, rabbis Lisa Grushcow and Daniel Korobkin debate how the resolution is being perceived among both the Orthodox and the larger Jewish community (see page 4).

This is potentially a seminal moment for Orthodox Judaism. The RCA had no practical reason to restate its position on female rabbis at this moment – indeed, Rabbi Korobkin explains that he voted against the resolution for that very reason, even though he agreed with its substance. But Orthodox rabbis may have felt a need to distance themselves from the leaders of the "open Orthodox" movement, which, among its causes, has backed female ordination.

The question now is whether mainstream Orthodoxy and its open iteration can coexist. And the split in Orthodoxy encompasses much more than female rabbis – there is the issue of male ordination, too. This past June, Rabbi Avi Weiss, one of the architects of open Orthodoxy, quit the RCA because it would not accept rabbis ordained by his institution. Also, the open Orthodox service – which invites women to lead the congregation in prayer, layn the Torah and receive certain aliyot, and generally observes an ethos of equality – differs significantly from traditional Orthodoxy.

It's hard to see how the Orthodox community can stick together through this, especially when the RCA and leaders of open Orthodoxy don't seem inclined to find a solution. For Orthodoxy – in all its facets – to flourish, these two groups may have to go their separate ways, and agree to disagree. It wouldn't be the first time that's happened in Jewish history. ■ — YONI

INTERVIEW

Author paints an Eichmann at odds with Arendt's account

Ron Csillag

"This book is an accident."

Few authors, let alone one of a well-received, ground-breaking history, would begin an interview that way.

But Bettina Stangneth is no ordinary author. For one, she freely concedes that she's not a historian but a philosopher. Her areas of study are Immanuel Kant's concept of radical evil, and the theory of lying. A German non-Jew, she's also written about anti-Semitism.

So one might say that her book about Adolf Eichmann was a natural progression.

After hundreds of books on him, what's left to say about Eichmann, one of the main architects of the Final Solution. Plenty, it turns out.

Famously, Eichmann, who was in charge of Jewish affairs during the Third Reich, escaped from Europe to Argentina in 1950 and lived in Buenos Aires under the alias Ricardo Klement. The story is the stuff of Hollywood: he was abducted by Mossad agents in a top secret operation in 1960 and brought to Israel for what was billed as the trial of the century. Found guilty of war crimes, he was hanged in 1962.

Probably the most famous book on the trial was Hannah Arendt's Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil.

But what about that brief Argentine interregnum? What did Eichmann do, say, write and think during that lost decade? Was he the banal clerk in private life as he would later present in the witness box?

The voluminous answer is contained in Stangneth's Eichmann Before Jerusalem: The Unexamined Life of a Mass Murderer (Vintage Books), a compelling and upending look at a man widely believed to have kept a low profile, but didn't.

"I had no intention to write a book about Eichmann. This book is an accident," Stangneth, a 49-year-old resident of Hamburg told The CJN in Toronto, where she had come as one of three finalists for the prestigious Cundill Prize in History (she did not win the grand prize, which went to a book on the League of Nations).

"I am a philosopher. I am not a historian. My main subject...is the way humans deal with truth and honesty. I figured out a special way to read lies, to decipher lies. I wanted to show that my method works." She sought a way to employ this program (too complex to explain here) as a source for those who rely on hard truths, such as historians and judges.

After reading Arendt, she thought, "take Eichmann, for example. I was absolutely sure that historians' work was done, that there was no need to go to archives." But after reading everything she could get her hands on about the subject, "I found so many mistakes. I said, 'OK, I have to learn how to be a historian. I have to go to the archives.' "

She was glad she did because "everything changed."

Stangneth found a man at odds with the enduring images that had grown around him, of a recluse who lived in constant fear of capture, and the one nurtured by Arendt: that during the war, he had been merely a dull, plodding bureaucrat who was simply following orders – a "small cog in the machine."

To the contrary, in the words of one reviewer, Stangneth reveals "a skilled social manipulator with a pronounced ability to reinvent himself, an ideological warrior unrepentant about the past and eager to continue the racial war against the Jews."

Throughout his exile, Eichmann remained a passionate and open Nazi. He proudly signed photos with the flourish, "Adolf Eichmann – SS-¬Obersturmbannführer (retired)," and even boasted that the deportation of more than 400,000 Hungarian Jews was his masterpiece. He never denied his true identity.

"The fanatical National Socialist was still on active duty," Stangneth writes. "One thing in particular stands out: Not once during his escape and exile did Eichmann seek the shadows or try to act in secrecy. He wanted to be visible in Argentina and he wanted to be viewed as he once had been: as the symbol of a new age."

The real gold mine for Stangneth was listening to taped conversations with Eichmann made by a Dutch former SS journalist, Willem Stassen during salons attended by a small group of Nazis and their sympathizers.

Eichmann's only regret, he told Sassen, was not killing more Jews. "If we had killed 10.3 million, I would be satisfied, and would say, 'good, we have destroyed an enemy.' We would have fulfilled our duty to our blood and our people...if we had exterminated the most cunning intellect of all the human intellects alive today."

Stangneth admits she was surprised by Eichmann's brazenness but also by the fact that he was surrounded by many other German Nazis who had been shielded by Argentine president Juan Peron and the Vatican.

"There was a large community of Nazis, sitting there in Buenos Aires, talking and thinking and discussing like [it was] 1940," she said. "What you have to understand is there was no voice of reason in this room. They were all evil."

Eichmann was a compulsive writer, always jotting and making notes. Convinced of his innocence, he even drafted a letter to German chancellor Konrad Adenauer offering to return to Germany to stand trial.

And as Stangneth further discovered, he wasn't the dullard portrayed by Arendt but a well-read mind who had studied Judaism and its texts, and expounded on Kant, Aristotle, Nietzsche and Spinoza.

"I discovered Eichmann the thinker," Stangneth told The CJN.

But as an expert on lying, Stangneth knew a liar when she encountered one. Eichmann "lied over 2.5 million people to their deaths."

Germany, she went on, knew of his exact location as early as 1952. "We know perfectly well that had no consequences," the author noted. "The Germans kept it a secret even from the United States."

With the veil lifted on Eichmann in Argentina, is there anything left to say about one of history's greatest monsters?

"Perhaps the story is finished," Stangneth said, "but there could be so many more details. I do not believe in big surprises anymore. But who knows?" ■

Six Jewish MPs head to Ottawa

The CJN talks to our community's newest members of Parliament

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

The Liberal tide that swept away the Conservative government of Stephen Harper brought in what is believed to be a record six MPs of Jewish lineage – one of whom was appointed to cabinet.

Winnipeg South Centre MP Jim Carr, was named minister of natural resources and will have responsibility for overseeing hot-button issues such as the Keystone XL Pipeline in the United States as well as Northern Gateway, which the Liberals opposed prior to the election, and Energy East.

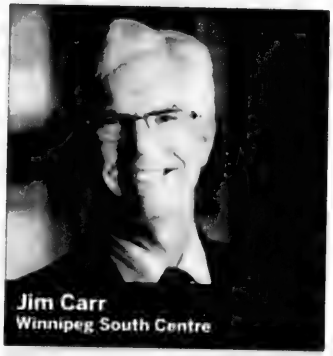
Carr, 64, is a former provincial politician in Manitoba and served as president of the Business Council of Manitoba. He was also a founding board member of the Canada West Foundation, a public policy and research NGO.

Of the incoming MPs, two hail from Quebec, three reside in and around Toronto, while Carr is the sole westerner.

At the same time, a handful of prominent Jewish MPs departed the scene. Longtime Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, who served as justice minister and attorney general in earlier Liberal governments, announced his retirement prior to the election. He was first elected in the Montreal riding in 1999.

Conservative MP Joe Oliver, who served as finance minister in the outgoing government – the first Jew to ever hold the position – was defeated in Eglinton-Lawrence, while his Tory colleague, Mark Adler, was similarly ousted in York Centre. Both ridings run along Toronto's Bathurst Street corridor and are home to thousands of Jewish voters.

In interviews with The CJN, the incoming MPs described their background, their ties to the Jewish community and how their Jewish heritage and being the children or grandchildren of immigrants helped inform their political views.



Jim Carr
Winnipeg South Centre

Jim Carr is well aware of the immigrant experience. His family's experience in Canada dates back to Czarist times. Carr is the grandson of immigrants who fled Russian pogroms in 1906.

> I can't separate my values and political views from my identity as a Canadian and as a member of the Jewish community.

"They came with nothing – no skills, no money – just a thirst for freedom for their children and grandchildren," he said in an interview prior to being selected to cabinet.

Carr grew up in a middle class household in the River Heights neighbourhood of Winnipeg. He had his bar mitzvah in 1964 at Congregation Shaarey Zedek.

"I've been part of the community all my life," he said.

He's also had a rather eclectic career, playing oboe in the Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra, working as a journalist for the Winnipeg Free Press and the CBC, and was the founding CEO of the Business Council of Manitoba. He also served in the provincial legislature as a critic in the areas of energy, education, urban affairs and constitutional matters.

Outside of politics he was a founding member of Arab-Jewish Dialogue of Winnipeg, and he calls himself, "a passionate supporter of the State of Israel, which I have visited many times."

Those life experiences shaped the values that he will bring to Ottawa.

"I can't separate my values and political views from my identity as a Canadian and as a member of the Jewish community," he said. ■

Michael Levitt
York Centre

Michael Levitt had a traditional Jewish upbringing, just not in a traditional Jewish setting. The incoming MP for York Centre, Levitt attended synagogue and participated in youth groups in his native Scotland, where the Jewish community was small, tight-knit and traditional. It wasn't until his family moved to Canada when he was a teenager that he was able to partake in the full array of communal activities.

> Levitt has visited Israel three times in recent years.

And partake he did. His CV listing his involvement in things Jewish is extensive. Among the most impactful involvements was his participation in a leadership training program under the auspices of the United Jewish Appeal. "I found it absolutely fascinating," he said.

He went on to serve as chair of the young adult division of the UJA and assisted in the UJA fundraising campaign, which raises money for a variety of Jewish agencies and for Israel.

He is a founding member of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee and he co-chaired Liberal Friends of Israel.

For Levitt, a partner and vice-president of business development for the Benjamin Group in Toronto, his Jewish heritage "absolutely" shaped the values he brings with him to Ottawa. Imbued with the spirit of tikkun olam, or repairing the world, he has particular empathy for seniors on fixed incomes, refugees and young people looking for jobs.

Levitt has visited Israel three times in recent years and expects his knowledge of the country will put him in a good position to inform his caucus colleagues about the challenges it faces. ■

Karina Gould
Burlington

Karina Gould calls herself "a fresh voice for Burlington," her hometown.

Although she is "not an active practitioner of Judaism," she maintains her heritage through the celebration of Chanukah, Purim and Yom Kippur.

> Israel is a beautiful country. It's unique in the world. It has difficult challenges.

Gould is Jewish on her father's side. Her paternal grandparents were Holocaust survivors from Czechoslovakia. Her grandfather was deported to Theresienstadt, then to Dachau and Auschwitz. Though separated during the war, her paternal grandparents were reunited afterward.

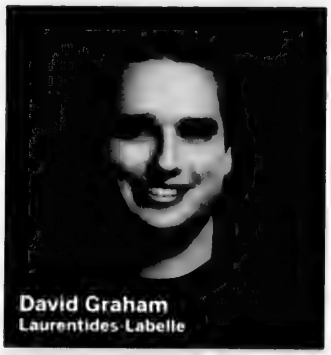
Her father met her mother, who is from Germany, while both were in Israel volunteering on Kibbutz Naot – where the sandals are made.

While in Israel, her father visited her grandfather's lifelong friend, a man who had been left for dead in a pile of corpses, but who had been rescued by her grandfather.

Gould visited Israel on a Birthright trip and stayed longer for a personal visit. Although she doesn't consider herself a Zionist – "it's not something that I thought about" – Gould admires the Jewish state.

"Israel is a beautiful country. It's unique in the world. It has difficult challenges." She particularly admires the country's diversity and hopes for a solution that will allow it to peacefully coexist with its neighbours.

Gould believes her family heritage plays a big role in shaping her political values. "My family was accepted and welcomed into Canada after a difficult experience," she said. "Canadian values of tolerance and diversity were not just important for my family, but for others. Canada provided the opportunity to grow and to thrive." ■



David Graham
Laurentides-Labelle

Before incoming Jewish MPs can play Jewish geography with their colleague David Graham, they might well be better off studying the science of geography – as in maps and charts. That way they'll be able to find the riding the Quebec MP represents. Graham was elected to represent Laurentides-Labelle, northwest of Montreal in the middle of cottage country and en route to the skiing venue Mont-Tremblant.

His family has lived in small-town Quebec for many years, he said, and his grandmother was an Olympic-level skier in her day. His great-grandfather, Hersh Wolofsky (Wolowski) was founder of Keneder Adler, a Yiddish-language newspaper that served the largely Jewish immigrant population of Montreal in the early 1900s.

Graham, 34, attended weekend Hebrew school as a young boy and today considers himself "a Reconstructionist Jew… culturally very Jewish."

"I happen to be a Jew who happens to be in politics," he said. "Jewish culture is very community-oriented culture by nature. It had an enormous impact on my values," he said, with the feeling that "community comes first."

That has led him to champion a number of community initiatives, from promoting free software and calling for better public transportation.

Advocating for his community will be job one when he gets to Ottawa, he said. "My priority is my community."

Laurentides-Labelle is "a poor riding" with an older population that lacks Internet and cellphone connectivity, he said. Getting government to provide infrastructure support is necessary for the future of the area. "How are you going to keep youth if they can't get the Internet?" Graham asked.

As for the Middle East, he said, "I absolutely believe in Israel's right to exist," adding that the region is a very complicated place and he would defer to the government leadership in crafting policy in the area. "I have great faith that [Prime Minister] Justin Trudeau knows who to turn to for the best advice." ■

Julie Dabrusin
Toronto-Danforth

Julie Dabrusin grew up in Montreal, but moved to Toronto to attend law school. She met a guy, got married and never moved back.

Today she lives in the Danforth area of Toronto and will represent Toronto-Danforth in Parliament.

Growing up, she attended Hebrew school regularly and remembers it as "an important part of my week."

Her Jewish identity is an important part of her life, as is her feeling of being part of a larger multicultural community.

> What I take from my Jewish background is a lot of study and learning, debate and advocacy. That ties into being involved in politics.

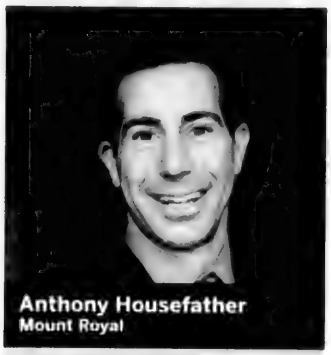
"What I take from my Jewish background is a lot of study and learning, debate and advocacy," she said. "That ties into being involved in politics."

Dabrusin has visited Israel twice, first as part of a CEGEP program that included volunteer work on a kibbutz and later, while attending McGill University, on an archeological dig that unearthed a Byzantine church.

"Israel is a beautiful country with a strong and resilient population… As a mother [of two], I understand Israelis wanting to be safe and secure," she said. ■



Anthony Housefather
Mount Royal

The origins of the family name Housefather are lost in the mists of time, but according to family lore, there was probably an innkeeper or someone who ran an orphanage somewhere in Bukovina, Romania, who adopted the name, or at least the pre-anglicized version of it.

That connection to the Austro-Hungarian empire is way in the past – all of Anthony Housefather's grandparents were born in Montreal, as was he. Housefather, who has served as mayor of Cote-St.-Luc since 2005, was recently elected MP in the Liberal bastion of Mount Royal, the seat vacated by Irwin Cotler. The riding has a higher proportion of Jews than any in Canada, he said.

Like his predecessor, Housefather has substantial links to the Jewish community. He attended Herzliah High School and is fluent in Hebrew. He served on the executive of Canadian Jewish Congress' Quebec region and was part of a group tasked with finding ways to retain young Jewish Montrealers who were leaving for greener pastures.

He also has longstanding ties to the Maccabi movement, with his first exposure to the Jewish sports organization as a teenager attending youth games in Memphis. At the 2013 Maccabiah Games in Israel, he won seven medals, two silver and five bronze, in a variety of masters swimming events.

"Being involved in the community, Jewish and non-Jewish, is an important part of our [family] values," he said.

Given his role in local government, he sees himself as an advocate for municipal interests at the federal level.

He also considers himself as someone who will speak up for the Jewish community and reflect their concerns over the wellbeing of the State of Israel.

"I'm passionate about the State of Israel, and I certainly [understand] the security issues [it] faces, given its borders and the narrowness of the country… I'm pretty well attuned to the policy issues on Israel. We committed in the election that we'd have Israel's back, and support for Israel is a Canadian value," he said. ■

My fruitful trip to Winnipeg

Avrum Rosensweig

It is Nov. 1, and I am in Winnipeg, the scholar in residence at Congregation Etz Chaim on Matheson Avenue.

What a delightful weekend it has been.

A number of months back, Calgary-born Rabbi Larry Lander of Congregation Etz Chaim asked if I would come to spend Shabbat with his congregation. We negotiated the time. The beginning of November would work. I was honoured.

Of course, I was nervous that I would step off the plane into two feet of snow and encounter -40 C weather. That, however, was not the case. As I type this, the weather is 7 C with not a snowflake in sight. My compact Fiat is gripping the road, and I have not spotted a Winnipeg dog wearing full winter regalia.

I have found, however, that Winnipeg Jews are a warm bunch who have extended themselves to me in every way possible. As they say in Yiddish, it's a mechayeh, in contrast to much of the Toronto Jewish community, which can be unwelcoming and cold in nature. (While a number of shuls there have successfully worked on turning up their warmth, there is still much to be done.)

Upon arrival at my hotel, I discovered a box of pastries, a bag of fresh fruit and bottles of water on my desk, delivered by Lina Streltsov, the very authentic shul program director. The snacks were accompanied by a hand-written welcome note. The front desk hotel staff commented later on Lina's lovely demeanour. Nice touch!

Rabbi Lander, the president of the shul, the gabbai, the ba'al koreh and the congregation in general have gone out of their way to make me feel at home. At one point, prior to my after-davening workshop, the rabbi stood in the kiddush line and assembled a plate of food for me. In my speech, I mentioned what tremendous character traits this man has.

During my stay, I also discovered a raised consciousness among the Winnipeg Jewish community having to do with aboriginal issues. Winnipeg has the largest aboriginal population in Canada, numbering some 70,000 people. (Its total population is 683,000.)

As you might imagine, there is much greater interaction between the Jewish and aboriginal communities here than there is elsewhere.

After speaking, I was approached by a number of congregants who either told me about their involvement with local aboriginal communities or about their desire to become involved in Ve'ahavta's Jewish-aboriginal initiatives. It was deeply inspiring to hear this.

I was also very fortunate to run into Phil Fontaine, former chief of the Assembly of First Nations who is also the honorary co-chair of Ve'ahavta's Jewish-aboriginal initiatives, along with Toronto businessman Larry Tanenbaum and former prime minister Paul Martin.

I told Phil about Ve'ahavta's recent professional development day for educators in Toronto's Jewish school system, held at Leo Baeck School and facilitated by aboriginal educators. I let him know the goal of the PD day was to teach the real history of aboriginal peoples in Canada, including residential schools. He was most proud of our community recognizing that the PD day was in response to recommendations coming out of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission.

All in all, my first time in Winnipeg has been most fruitful. My time with the Jewish community has been productive and heimish. While I'm happy I missed the snow and the frigid weather, I could not have asked for a nicer Shabbat and a more embracing community.

Wouldn't it be nice if Jewish communities across Canada could get to know each other more so we could have some shared goals? We could learn a lot from one another.

I look forward to returning to this town and possibly working together on a tikkun olam program. ■

Life at the edge of a knife

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz

Even terror campaigns use marketing techniques. The current wave of violence in Israel is knife-themed, and this theme is reinforced with sermons, YouTube videos, and Facebook posts. The resulting "knife intifadah" is the terrorist equivalent of the ice bucket challenge: a social media campaign that goes viral, except that instead of curing disease, the "knife intifadah" murders grandfathers.

And now Israelis find themselves at the edge of a knife. Questions about how to defend against anonymous assailants hiding knives have confounded security experts. But other, more significant questions arise as well. Terror is psychological warfare, an attempt to destroy the Israeli soul. One must wonder: can Israel hold on to her values and her morale at the edge of the knife?

This question is not new. Persecution has dogged the Jewish People, and for the last two millennia, they have needed to meet the spiritual challenge of oppression. And the way to do that, to quote the Talmud, is recognize that "even if you have a sharp sword held to your neck," you must never lose your faith and your hope.

And now, with a sharp blade being pointed at Israel's neck, her challenge is to avoid unrestrained hatred. Rabbi David Stav made a public ruling that once an attacker is subdued, it is forbidden by Halachah to injure them in any way. Sadly, there are those who consider this ruling too liberal, and after I posted in support of Rabbi Stav on my own Facebook page, I got criticism for being "naive." But the moral and halachic logic of Rabbi Stav's decision is impeccable, and the importance of this ruling cannot be overstated. Yes, vigilante justice might feel satisfying when watching an action movie; but in actuality taking the law into your own hands, aside from being wildly immoral, undermines the rule of law. Gun-wielding activists deciding who shall live and who shall die will end up making terrible mistakes in the process, and some may be emboldened to go on and use violence for political ends as well.

> Terror is psychological warfare, an attempt to destroy the Israeli soul.

In the Middle Ages, when there was often more than enough reason for Jews to be embittered at their neighbours, Jews refused, even at the edge of the knife, to abandon their faith in humanity. Rabbi Meir of Rothenburg, who experienced multiple persecutions in his own life, insisted that for a Jew to act dishonestly to a non-Jew was not only theft, but a desecration of God's name. This ruling points to the dogged determination of medieval Jews to maintain their ethics, even with a sword held to the throat; Rabbi Stav's ruling is a continuation of that tradition.

The edge of a knife also challenges one's morale as well. The difficulty of recent weeks lends itself to pessimism, bitterness and hopelessness, with the worry that this new wave of terror will make it impossible to live a normal life. Here, too, is a spiritual challenge at the edge of a knife – and to maintain optimism despite it all is nothing short of heroic.

Chana Henkin's son and daughter-in-law were brutally murdered in a terror attack, leaving four young children as orphans. Despite this tragedy, Henkin, a well respected Jewish educator, has not wavered in her determination, and continues to emphasize to her students the importance of optimism. In one recent lecture she told them that: "unfortunately… many lives have been lost. But… I believe that things have never been better for the Jewish People than they are right now… We are all being tested…[but] we must know that we are marching forward, we have a role, and we will fulfil that role."

This remarkable determination comes from someone who is living in the shadow of death. And if other Israelis can hold on to their morale and morality with similar determination, they will triumph, even when living at the edge of a knife. ■

Rabbis must lead, not follow

Rabbi Dow Marmur

Despite the establishment of many new institutions that train non-Orthodox rabbis for the United States and other countries, including Canada, and notwithstanding the large proportion of female graduates, it seems that the total number of those who nowadays want to serve the Jewish people as rabbis is smaller than when there were few seminaries and only men were ordained.

Recruitment difficulty isn't given as a reason for the decision last September by the Reconstructionist Rabbinic College in Philadelphia to admit students with non-Jewish spouses. But it's impossible to ignore it as an important factor in this radical change of policy.

According to college president Rabbi Deborah Waxman, the change is primarily the result of accepting the reality that more than half of all American married Jews have non-Jewish spouses. Writing in the Huffington Post, she stated that her college has "chosen to stop fighting against intermarriage and to concentrate on building a vital Jewish future." It seeks to help those who live in mixed families yet "want to remain Jewish and to live in Jewish community." Rabbis with non-Jewish spouses, she suggests, will not only reflect this reality, but they'll be better equipped to reach out to intermarried Jews.

Janet Eisner, editor of the Forward, disagrees. Though only about one per cent of Jews in the United States are card-carrying Reconstructionists, the movement has always had "an outsized effect on American Jewry." She reminds her readers that Reconstructionism often embraced progressive stands years or decades before the larger liberal denominations followed. The two small seminaries that already admit students with non-Jewish spouses are on the margin of Jewish life. Not so the Reconstructionist College.

Eisner's argument is cogent: "Clergy don't reflect their congregations. Clergy lead their congregations – and do so not as leaders who bow to the fashion and trends of the moment, but as vivid exemplars of our best norms and intentions, as strong aspirational figures."

Unlike say a Jewish studies professor at a university, a rabbi doesn't just teach Torah, a rabbi is Torah. The authentic exponent of Judaism must embody its values and serve as a Jewish role model. As tradition has it, this means also that what the rabbi does in private is of concern to the community. It's impossible to see how a Jewish spiritual leader whose spouse is an adherent of another faith or who has a Christmas tree at home for his or her non-Jewish children can qualify as a rabbi reflecting authentic Jewish life.

Of course, the rabbi must reach out to the entire community, including the intermarried. Integrating such families is a sacred task today. But can a rabbi do so by being part of the problem rather than the solution?

We know from experience that what one of the three mainstream liberal movements – Reform, Conservative, Reconstructionist – decides, the others soon follow, because they compete for the same potential members. Recruitment isn't only a problem for rabbinic schools but also for congregations.

As I wrote on this page not long ago, I've now come to accept the reality, indeed the necessity, that a person should be a full member of a congregation if she or he has only one Jewish parent – mother or father. But what's sufficient for members of congregations cannot be enough for those who lead them.

We therefore have good reason to applaud the stance of Dorshei Emet, the Reconstructionist congregation in Montreal that decided to distance itself from the decision to ordain intermarried rabbis. Its sister congregation in Toronto, we're told, hasn't yet declared its intentions. Let's hope it follows suit.

Even if accepting intermarried rabbis reflects the spirit of our age, we have much to learn from Charles Spurgeon, a 19th-century Baptist preacher in England, who noted "the distinction between serving your own generation and being a slave to it." Following current trends in the guise of serving the people may turn rabbis into slaves. ■

How Canada can help stem the Syrian refugee crisis

Sheryl Saperia

Prime Minister Justin Trudeau is facing the complexities of implementing his laudable campaign pledge to bring 25,000 Syrian refugees to Canada by the end of the year. The commitment to grant safe haven to these individuals is consistent with the thematic messaging that permeated the Liberal party's election campaign, including compassion and respect for human rights.

However, any policy attempting to claim a human rights mantle in this effort should not be focused solely on providing assistance to victims after the bloodshed. One critical way in which Canada can contribute to ending the atrocities in Syria, rather than exclusively dealing with their aftermath, is by helping to disrupt the Iran-Syria nexus.

Syrian President Bashar al-Assad has waged a ruthless and relentless struggle to remain in power in Damascus. He has been propped up by the Iranian regime, which has provided him with funds, weapons, advisors and military personnel as part of its own ambitious campaign to strengthen regional proxies and realize its hegemonic ambitions. The egregious human rights violations of these two players need to be addressed as part of a balanced human rights policy in Canada.

Trudeau should therefore ensure that both Syria and Iran remain listed as state sponsors of terror pursuant to the Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act. Canadian sanctions under the Special Economic Measures Act (SEMA) against the two states should similarly continue. If the Liberal government wishes to lift nuclear-related sanctions against Iran in credence to the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action, sanctions should instead be imposed on Tehran for its human rights abuses. This is consistent with a motion unanimously adopted in 2014 by the House of Commons subcommittee on international human rights, which called for the imposition of SEMA sanctions on Iranian human rights violators.

Moreover, Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) cannot be given a pass by Ottawa. The IRGC, it must be recalled, has been found culpable for terrorist acts around the world and is the vanguard for the regime's violent repression of Iranian citizens. One of its branches, the Quds Force, is a listed terrorist entity in Canada. In 2012, the Liberal Party of Canada urged the Conservative government to go further and designate the IRGC in its entirety as a terrorist group. Interim Leader Bob Rae lamented at the time: "For years, the Liberal Party of Canada has joined with communities across Canada calling on the Harper Conservatives to list the entire IRGC as a terrorist entity, and this government still refuses to do so."

Under Trudeau's leadership, Liberal foreign affairs critic Marc Garneau called for the entire IRGC to be placed on Canada's list of terrorist entities as recently as March 2015. Now in power, the new Liberal government should make this a reality.

In fact, there is more reason than ever to issue a blanket designation of the IRGC. Ali Alfoneh, my colleague at the Foundation for Defense of Democracies, has noted that of the recent IRGC fatalities in Syria, an increasing number are coming from IRGC ground forces rather than the Quds Force. The implication is that Iranian intervention in the Syrian civil war is blurring the distinctions between the branches of the IRGC and, in Alfoneh's words, "effectively turning the entire Guard into an expeditionary force."

Lastly, it behooves policymakers to understand that renewing economic ties with Iran translates into contracts with the IRGC, which controls at least one-sixth of the Iranian economy. Money in the IRGC's coffers means greater resources to torture Iranian citizens and facilitate Assad's ethnic cleansing of Sunni Muslims.

Trudeau is not faced with an either/or scenario. Taking aim at the heinous violators of human rights is a necessary augmentation to rebuilding the lives of their victims. Maintaining a tough stance against Iran and Syria, two of the prime contributors to the Syrian refugee crisis, is entirely consistent with a Liberal vision for a more caring Canada. ■

Dion's remarks on Israel come under scrutiny

plungen@thecjn.ca

During the recent election campaign, candidates for the Conservative party frequently cited the government's steadfast support of Israel and suggested that things might be different under a Liberal government. But Liberal leader – and now prime minister – Justin Trudeau always maintained that support for Israel is not a partisan issue.

Last week, Canada's newly minted foreign affairs minister, Stéphane Dion, gave two interviews in which it was reported that he saw Israel as an ally, but wanted Canada to return to a role as an "honest broker" in the Middle East while improving relations with other countries in the region.

Does that signal a change in Canadian policy?

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), warns against making that interpretation. In his French-language television interview, Dion never used the term "honest broker" and there are no quotes attributable to him in the print article by iPolitics in which he used those words, Fogel said.

In his radio talk, Dion referred to Israel as an ally of Canada and that he wanted to remove Israel as a wedge issue, a clear reference to the Liberal perception of how the Conservatives managed the Israel file, Fogel said.

Dion's reference to Israel as an ally marks something of a departure. "Previous Liberal governments were never comfortable using the word 'ally'. That was something introduced with the Harper government," Fogel stated. "It's a formulation that continues."

Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion

> He said Canada supported Israel and that it is important for Canada to develop positive relations with Israel's neighbouring countries.
> Prof. Nelson Wiseman
> University of Toronto

In the radio interview, Dion was asked if he wished to make Canada's Mideast policy more balanced, and he replied that he wanted it to be "effective and open," Fogel added.

Avi Benlolo, CEO of Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, offered a different perspective. He said Dion's comments are worrisome.

Taking the news report at face value, Benlolo said the suggestion Canada would adopt an honest-broker role between Israel and its neighbours causes some "trepidation. We're observing the atmosphere. We don't know which way the wind will blow."

Benlolo said despite Trudeau's assurances that Canada would stand steadfastly with its ally, Israel, he worries "we could also go back to where the Liberals used to be, and see a more neutral position," including at the United Nations.

Canada should take the side of its ally, the only democracy in the Middle East that respects individual rights, he said.

Nelson Wiseman, a professor of political science at the University of Toronto, said he saw no red flags with Dion's reported comments. "He said Canada supported Israel and that it is important for Canada to develop positive relations with Israel's neighbouring countries." Wiseman said Dion mentions Lebanon, but not Palestine.

As to improving relations with countries other than Israel, Wiseman said that under the previous government, Canada had a mixed record. Canada concluded a huge arms deal with Saudi Arabia and signed a free trade agreement with Jordan. But relations with the United Arab Emirates suffered because of a dispute over landing rights at Toronto's Pearson International Airport.

Dion refers to Lebanon specifically in terms of improving relations, which could rebound to Israel's benefit, Wiseman said.

In his iPolitics interview, Dion is quoted as saying, "Israel understands that for Canada to be helpful, we need to strengthen our links with countries that are around Israel and should be part of the solution and not becoming completely dysfunctional, as unfortunately, Syria has become."

He also referenced an episode from the time when Liberal John Manley was the foreign affairs minister and he was asked by his Israeli counterpart to contact a group in Lebanon on Israel's behalf. That is something Canada should be in a position to do, Dion stated.

Fogel said he takes issue with the suggestion that Canada's relations with Arab countries suffered because of its strong support of Israel. Canada maintained good relations with Jordan, Lebanon and the Gulf states, he said.

CIJA will be "on top of the file to see that the Liberals remain consistent with their oft-repeated statement there would be no difference in policy" between them and the previous government.

An upcoming test might be close at hand. Later this month the United Nations General Assembly will meet to discuss numerous topics, including Israel.

Dion did not respond to The CJN's requests for comment. ■

New foreign minister has mixed record on Mideast

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca

Canada's new foreign affairs minister Stéphane Dion has a mixed record on the Arab-Israeli conflict over his long political career.

Dion, a former Université de Montréal (UdeM) political science professor originally from Quebec City, has since 1996 represented the Montreal riding of St. Laurent, home to a significant Jewish community and increasingly large Arab and Muslim population.

Both communities have traditionally voted Liberal, and Dion has endeavoured to walk a fine line on the Middle East.

Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's tapping Dion for this key post comes as something of a surprise, because fellow veteran Montreal MP Marc Garneau of Westmount-Notre Dame de Grâce, a vocal supporter of Israel, had been foreign affairs critic. Dion, who led the party from 2006 to 2008, handled the intergovernmental affairs and heritage portfolios.

It was in the city (now borough) of St. Laurent in 2004 where a Jewish elementary school, United Talmud Torahs (UTT), was firebombed by a Lebanese-born Muslim teenager in retaliation, he said, for Israel's killing of a Hamas leader.

Dion, then a cabinet minister, came to the school that morning to denounce the hate crime, which was later judged to be an act of terrorism. However, he had to backpedal on a comment to the effect that it was regrettable that this happened when not all Jews support the policies of then-Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon.

He clarified that, "No matter what one's opinion of the Sharon government's actions, violence is never an acceptable response. When I said, 'Why link all Canadian Jews with the policy of a government?' it was in the context of expressing my admiration for the pluralism of opinions among the Jews of Canada and elsewhere."

At the 2006 party convention where he was selected leader, Dion in his speech ridiculed the new "very right-wing" Conservative government for modelling Canadian foreign policy on that of the United States.

"Today we have... a prime minister who is mirroring the style of his hero to the point that [then-] president [George W.] Bush should be getting royalties from Mr. Harper's speeches."

He had been critical of former prime minister Stephen Harper's support of Israel during its conflict with Hezbollah that summer, calling for a more even-handed approach and an immediate ceasefire.

Stéphane Dion in 2007

During that war, Dion wrote in a Globe and Mail article: "When one believes a friend to be mistaken, one should say so," and he suggested that the Lebanese civilian casualties and "breadth of destruction" may increase support for Hezbollah and weaken the Lebanese state without strengthening Israel's security.

Dion stood by those opinions in a conference call with the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee. He also said Canada should send humanitarian aid to the Palestinian Authority (PA), then ruled by Hamas, through "third parties."

Dion had two prominent Jewish community backers in his leadership bid — businessman Stephen Bronfman and former MP and ambassador to Israel David Berger, but few grassroots Jewish delegates supported him.

Jews have appreciated Dion, father of the Clarity Act, for his strong defence of national unity over the years.

However, less than a year into his leadership, Dion was in hot water with the Jewish community for handpicking Jocelyn Coulon, an academic and commentator critical of Israel and the United States, as the Liberal candidate in the Outremont byelection.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada were dismayed by Coulon's view that the international community should talk to Hamas. He retracted that position after a meeting with community leaders.

Dion had personally chosen Coulon, a UdeM professor, to play a role in moving Canada's foreign policy away from "the current Conservative government's Republican-style approach."

Trudeau reaches out to CIJA to affirm support for Israel

lsarick@thecjn.ca

Prime Minister Justin Trudeau reached out to the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) to reaffirm his support for Israel and his willingness to discuss broader social issues.

In a 10-minute phone call Nov. 2, before being officially sworn in Nov. 4, that CIJA chair David Cape described as "very warm and very friendly," Trudeau expressed his commitment to continue his strong relationship with CIJA.

"He reaffirmed his expectation for the government to work closely with the Jewish community and thanked us for all the work we had done," Cape said.

Trudeau also expressed that "his government would continue the tradition of multipartisan support for Israel," Cape said. "But he said he specifically was hoping we could work together on a broader range of issues."

One issue of particular interest to CIJA is Bill C-51, the anti-terrorism act, which Trudeau had supported when it was introduced by the previous Conservative government. During the election campaign, Trudeau said he intended to amend the bill.

In a presentation to Parliament last spring, CIJA affirmed its support for the bill and suggested ways that oversight of Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), Canada's spy agency, should be improved and strengthened.

Cape said he reiterated this point to Trudeau Nov. 2.

CIJA is also deeply interested in participating in the national discussion on physician-assisted dying, and Cape said he discussed that with Trudeau as well.

The issue is sure to be debated in the House of Commons soon, after a Supreme Court decision last February gave the government one year to implement new legislation.

CIJA recently emailed members of the community asking for opinions on the issue and heard "passionately expressed thoughts," on the subject, Cape said.

"I said it would be important for us to engage on a number of these social issues and I was hopeful that the Jewish community could be a springboard for his government to create broader support across the populations for this type of social issue," Cape said.

The current wave of terrorism in Israel was not discussed, but Trudeau "expressed the hope there would be peace ultimately in the region," Cape said.

Cape said he concluded the conversation by introducing Trudeau to the Hebrew word tikvah, meaning hope, a theme that Trudeau repeatedly referred to during his campaign, and one that has great resonance for the Jewish community as well, Cape said.

While there had been some concerns expressed during the campaign about whether Trudeau would be as supportive of the Jewish community as former prime minister Stephen Harper had been, Cape said that that is not the case.

"I got every sense that there was complete willingness from the prime minister-designate to have that dialogue and to work as closely with our community as had been in the past." ■

Maharot say RCA motion won't change their roles

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Maharat Rachel Kohl Finegold

The two women who use the title "maharat" and serve Montreal's Orthodox Jewish community say the latest resolution by the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) reaffirming that women shouldn't be ordained as rabbis or maharot won't change what they do.

Maharat Rachel Kohl Finegold, who serves Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, and Maharat Abby Brown Scheier, who also serves the Montreal Jewish community as an educator, are two of the first three graduates of Yeshivat Maharat who inspired a similar statement from the RCA when they were ordained in 2013.

That motion followed one passed three years earlier by the RCA, the largest international organization of Orthodox rabbis, in response to the founding of the New York-based yeshiva, the first Orthodox rabbinical school for women.

The 2010 resolution said the school was "a violation of our mesorah (tradition)" and that the RCA "regrets that the leadership of the school has chosen a path that contradicts the norms of our community."

In 2013, when three women graduated from the program for the first time, the RCA reaffirmed its opposition to the idea of female Orthodox rabbis.

The most recent resolution, passed late last month, stated that "due to our aforesaid commitment to sacred continuity, we cannot accept either the ordination of women or the recognition of women as members of the Orthodox rabbinate, regardless of the title."

Maharat Scheier told The CJN, that despite the resolutions, she'll continue to serve her community.

"The community has responded so well and only encouraged what we've been doing. That's my experience. The resolution doesn't change anything for those who are out there and those who see the impact of what the women are [doing]," she said.

"The fact is that there are 22 women enrolled in the school at the moment, as well as 11 graduates… My position is that we've seen how in just the past three years, the response has been so positive in the community… we expect that this will be the case in the future as well."

Maharat Finegold said this latest resolution doesn't say anything different from the ones passed in 2010 and 2013, but it suggests the RCA is "uncomfortable with the growth of support [for maharot] and they're uncomfortable with the fact that these are women who are squarely within the Orthodox community. I grew up going to Orthodox day schools and Orthodox camps, and I very much consider myself an Orthodox woman."

In a poem she posted on her Facebook page, Maharat Finegold wrote, "I have answered the call to serve my people. To use my spiritual and intellectual energy to teach Torah and enliven the spirit of the Jewish nation. I have answered this call despite the questions, the hesitations, the ambiguities, the many distractions.

"I am here. Does that make you afraid? Does that make you wonder what I might do next? Does my presence threaten to topple the edifice of the Mesorah?… People often ask me, 'Why don't you just become a Conservative Rabbi? Wouldn't it be easier, simpler? No, it would not be easier to deny who I am, to refrain from speaking my truth, to ignore the path of my Torah, in order to make things simpler for all of us."

Rabbi Daniel Korobkin, spiritual leader of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto and the RCA's northeast vice-president, explained that the resolution was voted on by 900 members of the organization and it was a very close vote.

"The margin of difference was about 20 rabbis. It was pretty much divided. But not because there is a division of opinion about whether women should be ordained. There is general consensus that that is not part of the Orthodox tradition. The reason why there was a difference of opinion was that [some questioned whether] this was a productive resolution or not… We just view the resolution as a bit of a distraction," Rabbi Korobkin said.

"I acknowledge that within the Orthodox community, some of the most effective leaders within the Orthodox Jewish community are women – as teachers, as principals, as yoetzot halachah, as board members, as shul presidents and so forth. It is really only the issue of a formal rabbinic ordination that this resolution addresses."

Rabbi Korobkin said he would rather focus on where members of the Jewish community can find common ground and work together.

Calls spike for Israel's emergency response network

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

The violence in Israel has caused about a 10 per cent spike in the number of daily phone calls to United Hatzalah of Israel, a non-profit, civilian emergency medical response network, says Eli Beer, the organization's president and co-founder.

"Before, our volunteers got 700 calls or so a day, and now we're getting an extra 50 to 70 each day," Beer, a paramedic of over 26 years who co-created United Hatzalah in1989.

Beer was in Toronto last month and spoke at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation and Beth Torah Congregation and to private groups in the Jewish community about his experiences treating victims of terrorist attacks in Israel.

He told The CJN that a large number of the additional calls United Hatzalah is getting have to do with terror attacks such as stoned cars or stabbings, but many also come from people having panic attacks.

"We get calls from elderly people, some who are Holocaust survivors, in areas where there's a lot of terrorism, who need someone to help calm them down," he said.

United Hatzalah is Israel's largest independent, fully volunteer-run emergency medical services organization.

Its close to 3,000 volunteers have all undergone United Hatzalah's 200-hour medical training program.

It delivers free and immediate emergency medical services to those in need, regardless of race or religion and "everywhere in the country we can," Beer said.

"We have Jews and Arabs working together. We have volunteers that come from east Jerusalem and want to save lives."

United Hatzalah co-ordinates with the multitude of ambulance services – Beer said there are about 100 different ones in Israel, including national and local companies – and is notified any time there is an emergency call.

All its volunteers have a GPS app on their phones that within the first few seconds after a call comes in, sends an alert to anyone who happens to be in the immediate area of the emergency.

This allows them to get to the site within two to three minutes and to administer treatment to those in crisis before an ambulance arrives.

"The whole idea behind United Hatzalah is not to compete with the ambulance services, but complement them," Beer stressed.

The volunteers typically have day jobs, ranging "from doctors to fish vendors," Beer said, but if an emergency happens nearby, they're committed to dropping everything to assist or save a life.

Beer emphasized that some of the volunteers are Arab, Muslim and Christian.

United Hatzalah is funded by donors around the world, mostly from the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom, and the donations allow the organization to purchase what it calls "ambucycles" – medically equipped motorcycles – and other equipment. About 400 of the volunteers use ambucycles.

Beer said United Hatzalah volunteers focus on treating victims and never encounter dilemmas as to whether to administer medical treatment to terrorists. As civilian medical responders, they're not allowed to go near terrorists until the police have arrived and checked to ensure the former aren't hiding additional weapons.

"By the time [terrorists] are ready to be treated, the [actual] ambulances have shown up," Beer said.

Asked if he thought Israel was in the midst of a third intifadah, Beer, said: "I think it's stupid terrorism... Terrorism that comes from people who are uneducated, not sophisticated."

While Beer and friends started the organization in a religious area of Jerusalem, they decided "to go beyond our neighbourhood, because our goal is to go everywhere and have a very fast response. Today we have a lot of very Orthodox people who will drive [to sites of crisis] even on Shabbat to save lives, but almost half our volunteers are not religious, and about seven per cent aren't Jewish."

Saving lives takes precedence over other responsibilities in Judaism, he said, and United Hatzalah is working to expand internationally, including to countries such as Lithuania, Panama and Brazil.

"This [service] should be offered everywhere in the world, not just in Jewish communities," Beer said. ■

Exhibit recalls South Africa's 'shtetl by the sea'

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Dubbed by some "the shtetl by the sea," North American Jews might best understand Muizenberg, a beachside suburb of Cape Town once brimming with both Jewish residents and Jewish holiday-goers, as the Miami of South Africa.

Memories of Muizenberg, a South African exhibition featuring photographs and recollections from the post-World War II hub of Jewish life and culture, will be showcased Nov. 16 to 29 at Toronto's Schwartz/Reisman Centre, marking the show's 10th international appearance.

Most recently shown in various cities in Australia, the exhibit, curated by Johannseburg-based Joy Kropman, was brought to Toronto by Richard Stern, 78, a Torontonian who himself grew up along the beach in Muizenberg.

He said the exhibit features about 40 panels displaying memorabilia – mainly images and accompanying text – from what was considered a kind of golden age for Jews in Muizenberg, as well as more than 1,000 photographs submitted by Jews who had lived or vacationed in the town during its Jewish heyday, roughly between 1950 and 1965.

Stern, who moved to Canada in 1963, explained that in this period, anywhere from 10,000 to 20,000 Jews would regularly travel to Muizenberg to escape the heat of the South African interior and relax by the sea during the country's summer months of December and January.

In addition, at the peak of the town's popularity among South African Jews, about 600 Jewish families made Muizenberg their permanent residence, and the town had both a synagogue and kosher hotels.

"That beach used to be absolutely packed during summer months. There were thousands of young people. The older people would sit by the seaside and the younger people would be by what was called the 'snake pit' – a protected area, a piece of sand with bathing boxes on one side and a pavilion on the other that people packed into from one corner to another," Stern recalled.

"Muizenberg was very much a part of people's lives growing up. Many Jews met their spouses there," he added.

After Stern's brother, who lives in Israel, made the opening speech for the exhibit's Tel Aviv stop, Stern said he inquired about bringing Memories of Muizenberg to Toronto, and he ultimately paid to ship the exhibit here.

The beach in Muizenberg, with its Victorian bathing huts, was popular in the '50s and '60s.

"They were going to destroy it, because after Australia, no one else wanted to take the exhibit. I thought it would be a good community project, as so many South African Jews live here in Canada… It's a real walk down memory lane," he said.

He noted that many Jews hailing from Muizenberg became quite influential, starting large companies in South Africa.

"The whole of the beachfront was settled by mining magnates like the Oppenheimer family and the Schlesinger family. All the houses along the beachfront were designed by Sir Herbert Baker, an architect who designed houses of parliament in Pretoria," he said.

Stern's own grandfather, Max Sonnenberg, moved from Germany to Muizenberg and later became a member of parliament in South Africa during World War II.

Due to political upheaval in South Africa from the mid-1960s to the 1980s, the country's Jewish population dwindled substantially, and a large number of Jews who had either lived or vacationed in Muizenberg moved to Canada.

Stern, whose four grandparents hailed, respectively, from Germany, England and the United States before ending up in Muizenberg, said the exhibit's illustrative panels give viewers who are unfamiliar with the seaside town a real sense of what Jewish life was like there.

And for those who are actually from Muizenberg or who spent their summer vacations there, the exhibit will be an opportunity to reminisce and recognize people they once knew in the many photographs.

After Toronto, Stern said, the exhibit will head to Atlanta, and then, possibly, to Dallas. ■

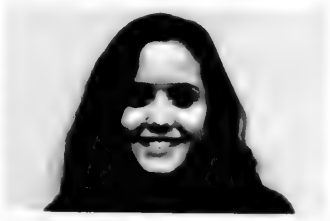
Waterloo student group presses for Israel boycott

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca



Alexa Fuentes Valdez

A student group at the University of Waterloo (UW) has submitted a petition to the school's Federation of Students – known as Feds – to push for a referendum on whether the school should sever academic ties with Israeli post-secondary institutions.

The petition, drafted by Ethical Collaboration UW, states that Palestinian students face systematic discrimination at the Israeli institutions that UW has academic partnerships with, including the University of Haifa, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Technion – Israel Institute of Technology, Tel Aviv University, and the Weizmann Institute of Science.

On Oct. 8, the group handed over 4,000 signatures – which meets the minimum requirement of 10 per cent of undergraduate student signatures needed to trigger a referendum – to the student federation.

Feds, which represents UW undergraduates, is currently in the process of cross-referencing the signatures to ensure they're from Waterloo students. If the 4,000 signatures are verified, a referendum will be called.

But Judy Zelikovitz, vice-president of university and local partner services at the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, said that even if a referendum is called and students vote in favour of boycotting Israeli academic institutions, the result will be non-binding and will likely not have any bearing on the university's decisions to partner with Israeli schools.

"We look at Waterloo, which has an excellent number of joint programs and partnerships with Israeli universities. We know that this is not led by one or two people, but by people at the very top. UW president Feridun Hamdullahpur has been instrumental in securing those partnerships and being on the ground in Israel with his team to make sure that's happening," Zelikovitz said.

"I presume that regardless of what a vote might determine, these relationships are going to remain in place and student resolutions or a referendum isn't going to impact that right now."

In a statement to The CJN, UW spokesperson Nick Manning said the administration is monitoring the situation and will respond accordingly.

"Waterloo proactively engages with international research-intensive universities that share our values of academic freedom, freedom of expression and equity," he said.

Although she's confident that a referendum won't affect UW's relationship with Israel, Zelikovitz said she was concerned the petition "was presented somewhat dishonestly in terms of the intent of what they were asking people to sign up for."

According to Alexa Fuentes Valdez, a second-year psychology student, when she and her friends were approached by an Ethical Collaboration representative to sign the petition last March, they were vaguely told the petition was in support of human rights.

After Valdez pressed the group's representative for more information, she told her that UW is collaborating with universities in Israel that were developing weapons to kill Palestinians.

Valdez said she doesn't have an issue with Ethical Collaboration's decision to advocate on behalf of Palestinians, but disagreed with their approach to pressure students by implying if they didn't sign it, they didn't support human rights.

"Originally, I was going to sign it because I didn't know what it was for. I was like, 'Of course I care about human rights.' But when I asked for more details they started talking about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict… Two of my friends signed it. They said, 'I didn't want to not sign it.' So there was some peer pressure because they worded it like it was about human rights. My friends want their signatures removed now."

Requests for an interview with an Ethical Collaboration representative went unanswered.

Marc Newburgh, CEO of Hillel Ontario, who has been working with UW students to respond to the petition, said, "There's a heightened conversation that didn't exist before. It's creating awareness in conversation with students and ensuring that students are aware of what they've signed on to and how this represents or doesn't represent Israel and what the ties are that the university has with Israel."

While Feds is currently working on verifying the signatures, CIJA and Hillel Ontario launched an email campaign to urge members of the pro-Israel community to send an email to Hamdullahpur to thank him for his commitment to working with Israeli institutions.

Zelikovitz said about 500 people took part in this initiative. ■

Synagogues mobilize to help Syrian refugees

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Early in the summer, a reporter returned from Lebanon with news about a Kurdish family that had fled Syria and was living in a barn. They were working as field hands to earn their keep, but none of the three children attended school, conditions were miserable and their prospects were bleak.

It so happened that the congregation at Congregation Darchei Noam in Toronto was looking for a way to help Syrian refugees, and the Kurdish family fit the bill.

Darchei Noam was among the first Jewish groups to mobilize to sponsor a Syrian refugee family, and as a result, the process is pretty well advanced. All the documentation has been completed and sent to the processing office in Winnipeg. If approved, the family could be in Canada in a matter of months.

Though perhaps the earliest, Darchei Noam is certainly not the only Jewish group or congregation sponsoring Syrian refugees. Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) Toronto, which is a sponsorship agreement holder (SAH), counts at least 17 congregations, private groups and individuals who are at various stages of sponsoring refugees.

Sponsors are expected to raise $27,000 to maintain a family of four and $29,700 for a family of five. That doesn't include additional travel and medical costs, and other expenses needed to assist the refugee families through the first year or two after their arrival in Canada.

In addition to the families and individuals at Darchei Noam, the families and individuals of other congregations and groups operating under JIAS auspices include groups at Beth Tzedec Congregation, Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, BFG Group, City Shul, families and individuals at Holy Blossom Temple, First Narayever Congregation, Jewish Family Services of Ottawa, Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism, Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School (and friends), Scadding Court Community Centre, Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, Temple Kol Ami, Danforth Jewish Circle, and Ve'ahavta.

The response from the Jewish community has been extensive, particularly after a photo of drowned Syrian toddler Alan Kurdi was featured prominently in the international media, said Lia Kisel, language and settlement director at JIAS Toronto. The organization fielded hundreds of calls from people asking how they could help, and JIAS organized an information night attended by more than 100 people.

The people at Darchei Noam got started last May, and to date, they've raised "a good deal more than $29,500," said Suzanne Silk Klein, co-chair of the synagogue's refugee sponsorship program.

They've exceeded that base amount to such an extent that "we're hoping we can deal with a second family," she said.

A number of synagogue members have volunteered to assist in the integration of the family once they arrive, helping provide medical and dental care, assistance in navigating the education system, help with shopping and other daily tasks, Silk Klein said.

Silk Klein acknowledged there were discussions at the shul over who should be sponsored, but "very few people said to me, 'Do we really want to sponsor X, Y and Z?' I said this is a humanitarian need. Nobody turned me down for money because they were a Muslim family."

All applicants will be "seriously vetted" and the family, when they heard they were being sponsored by a Jewish congregation in Toronto, said, "'I can't believe that people who don't know us, help us.'" Silk Klein said.

Concerns over the background of potential sponsored refugees were raised at Beth Tikvah, said Rabbi Jarrod Grover, who delivered a Rosh Hashanah sermon about the Jewish principle of helping the stranger in need.

Rabbi Grover said he has been in contact with JIAS and hopes to piggy-back on the Darchei Noam effort by sponsoring a member of the Kurdish group's extended family to Canada.

"The fact it's Kurdish made it easier to raise the money," he said. "The Kurds are a persecuted minority. It's a different story. There is no history of Kurdish anti-Semitism or opposition to Israel."

So far the shul has raised close to $20,000.

"People can identify with this situation. It is part of our story, and as Jews, we have a responsibility to help," Rabbi Grover said.

Shul speakers examine Jewish-Muslim relations

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

"Are we allies or foes?" promotional material for a community event asks, referring to the relationship between Muslims and Jews.

As far as Azim Shamshiev is concerned, there are many similarities between Islam and Judaism. Both are monotheistic faiths with long, intertwined histories and a strong focus on community identity. "I can't think of any two religions so close to each other," he said.

However, Shamshiev, a Muslim who hails originally from Uzbekistan, acknowledged there is more to it than that. Despite the similarities, people of the two faiths are "disconnected from each other," suffer from mistrust and in some cases, even hatred, he said.

Today, Shamshiev resides in Toronto where he works as executive vice-president of the Intercultural Dialogue Institute of Toronto (IDI), GTA West, an organization formed in 2010 to promote social cohesion and foster respect among people of various backgrounds. He is also a participant in the Muslim Leadership Initiative (MLI), a program run at the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem to foster greater understanding of Judaism and Israel among visiting Muslim leaders.

Shamshiev was joined by MLI program director Yossi Klein Halevi in addressing the relationship between Muslims and Jews, at a community event at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue attended by hundreds of people. The program was sponsored by the Shalom Hartman Institute and the IDI.

The critical thing for Muslim communities is to try to understand Jews "from their own perspective, their own frame of reference," Shamshiev said.

Klein Halevi, author of several books, including Like Dreamers: The Story of the Israeli Paratroopers who Reunited Jerusalem and Divided a Nation, said the MLI brings North American Muslims to Israel in a program of study. An important part of the program is exposing Muslims to the concept of Jewish peoplehood, something with which they are generally not familiar.

Jews see peoplehood as key to their identity, as well as their connection to the Land of Israel. Muslims don't. As a result, Muslims see Israel as an artificial creation, he suggested.

MLI does not focus on politics nor does it aim to convince Muslim leaders about this or that policy of the Israeli government. The goal is to create a basis of respectful conversation founded on "knowledge of who we are as a people," Klein Halevi said.

He said he hoped a Jewish Leadership Initiative might be implemented one day to expose Jews to the Muslim point of view.

In a question-and-answer segment, kicked off by Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, the panellists were asked to address Jews' fear of Muslims and Muslims fears of Jews.

Klein Halevi said Jews have a long, historical fear of those who wish to do them harm. He said Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu tapped into that in his recent reference to the Mufti of Jerusalem's alliance with Adolf Hitler. That "expresses a fear we have" of "facing genocidal threats coming from the Muslim world," he said.

Shamshiev said Muslim attitudes toward Jews are framed by two seminal events, its colonial past with the importation of anti-Jewish attitudes, and the current conflict between Israelis and Palestinians.

He said Islam is tolerant, and he pointed to two of Muhammad's wives who were Jewish to illustrate the point. One converted to Islam, the other did not, yet she was accepted, he noted.

Asked to explain the concept of jihad, Shamshiev said in its most important manifestation – the "greater jihad" – it refers to fighting evil and striving for moral excellence.

A "lesser jihad" referred to a battle fought by Muhammad against idol worshippers, he said.

Asked to respond to Jews' concerns about anti-Semitism among Muslims, Klein Halevi said it is a fear he understands. But dialogue is something "we have to try."

He noted that Imam Abdullah Antepli knocked on his door on behalf of North American Muslims who were eager to start a dialogue. That led to creation of the MLI.

Imam Antepli considers himself a recovering anti-Semite who wants to create an indigenous North American brand of Islam while engaging seriously with the Jewish community, he said. ●

Film documents stories of Shoah child survivors

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN

Susan Pasternak was born in northeastern Poland in 1939, just month before the outbreak of World War II. The Germans forced her family to live in the ghetto of Zambrów, but arrangements were made for her and her mother to hide in the apartment of a Polish woman in the town. "My mother and I snuck out of the ghetto. We lived under a table with a heavy black cloth. That was home for my mother and me for 3-1/2 years."

Pasternak told her story in Child Survivors – Then & Now: Understanding Our Childhood and its Impact on Our Lives, a documentary film that debuted at Baycrest Health Sciences Centre on Nov. 3 during Holocaust Education Week. About 100 people attended the event, which included a discussion with the child Holocaust survivors following the screening.

Humber College film professor Eva Ziemsen and her students produced the film. It featured participants in a group for child Holocaust survivors co-facilitated by Baycrest social workers Peggy Solomon and Shoshana Yaakobi.

The group – it now has about a dozen members from diverse European backgrounds – is held bi-monthly and was started by Solomon back in 2003. The participants began as a group of strangers and grew to become friends, Solomon said. "They're a dynamic type of family."

In the film, the members spoke about surviving the war as children, and some of them also discussed their experiences as new immigrants in Canada.

When Pasternak disembarked at Pier 21 in Halifax in 1947, she was only eight years old. "I was the first immigrant child to arrive from Europe after the war."

But she came alone. Her mother suffered a fatal heart attack after the war ended in 1945. Pasternak was in a displaced persons camp until she was reunited with an aunt who'd immigrated to Canada before the war.

Faigie Libman was born into a prosperous family in Kaunas, Lithuania. She and her mother, the only survivors in their family, were able to stay together in concentration and labour camps, she recounted. "My mother registered me. Instead of saying I was 10, she said I was 12. She stuffed me in the right places. I remained in the concentration camp, and I was one of the best workers. I consider myself a miracle."

Anna Cheszes was born near Bialystok as Pola Kaplan around 1940. When she was a toddler, she was sent to live with a Jewish family that had fake Polish identity papers, as well as baptism papers for an Anna Strzelczyk. Cheszes took on that name.

Beppie Erlich, who was originally from the Netherlands, was hidden under tiles when at age five and fed through a straw.

Gershon Williger, a participant in the group with wife Jane, is also from the Netherlands. His parents were killed at Stutthof in 1944. He said he found out he was Jewish after the war, when he was eight years old. In his youth, he became very connected to Israel through Habonim. "I fell in love with the State of Israel... I was eager to get out of Europe. Europe had robbed me of my family."

Harry Rozendaal, another survivor of Dutch origin, described the isolation he and his wife experienced when they immigrated to Canada and never really felt connected to a community in Montreal. He also spoke of the loneliness he now feels since the death of his wife of 58 years. "I'm still suffering. I miss her every day."

Etti Miller, who was born in the Vilna Ghetto in 1941, recalled the social challenges she faced when she first came to Toronto. "I didn't know the language. I had two long braids. I was chubby and I was picked on. Two or three kids would beat me up. It was scheduled every day."

The teachers overlooked the bullying, because she didn't have the language facility to tell them about the harassment, she said. "Life was a misery."

While things improved for her by Grade 7, as an only child, she was very aware of her parents' suffering. "I felt that I should not put more burden on my parents. They loved me, but they had their own tzuris."

They'd been Polish partisans. Her father, a wealthy, educated man, had a lot of prestige in Europe, she said. "After the war, my parents were broken. They lived in their own shadow. As I got older, I realized: thank God I survived the war, as opposed to other kids who didn't. I have to make the best of it."

Other participants in the child survivors group include Rose Factor, Hans Sanders, Yolanda Engels, Marika Freeman, Filo Caresses and Nina Oval. ■

Doctor discusses Shoah's legacy for medical ethics

FRANCES KRAFT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

It's inconceivable to think that physicians could transform from healers into killers, said Dr. Raul Artal at a Holocaust Education Week event geared mainly for medical professionals.

But, he noted, German doctors and other medical personnel took part in large-scale concentration camp experiments concerning malnutrition, and the infection of man-made wounds to test antibiotics, among other topics of investigation.

As well, he said, during World War II, more than six million Jews were selected and killed; 400,000 German patients were selected and sterilized; 5,000 German children selected and euthanized; and 200,000 German adults selected and euthanized. Only 15 per cent of patients in German mental hospitals at the start of the war survived. Thousands of German doctors were involved, Artal said.

The California-based professor and chairman emeritus of Saint Louis University's department of obstetrics, gynecology and women's health, spoke Nov. 4 about Medical Ethics and the Holocaust: A Legacy for Today, at Mount Sinai Hospital, as part of Toronto's 35th annual Holocaust Education Week.

Artal, who is a champion of Houston's Center of Medicine After the Holocaust, teaching internationally about medical ethics lessons from the Holocaust, also spoke the preceding night at Reena in a more personal vein.

At Mount Sinai, he also touched on his own experience when he spoke briefly about his birth in 1943 in Bersad, a German Romanian concentration camp in Transnistria.

Artal noted that he was born with what would later be described as an extremely low Apgar score. "Don't predict anything based on Apgar scores," he cautioned.

He also said he was lucky not to be born in a camp like Auschwitz, where babies with Aryan features were given up for adoption, and those with non-Aryan features were sent to the gas chambers.

Addressing directly the relevance of his lecture topic, Artal asked, "What is the lesson today, when technology exists to modify genes and create 'perfect' babies?"

He believes that genome technology "should be used only for modifying genes that lead to disease, not to attain better babies," he said.

Biomedical ethics have evolved over time, and will continue to be an essential component of medical education, he added. Future issues will depend on medical advances in technology and other factors including disease knowledge, the national health care delivery system, and "our collective conscience."

Medical ethics is not a list of rules, Artal said, but rather "a matter of continual thought and evolution."

Current principles include respecting patient autonomy, promoting the well-being of patients, and causing no harm or injury, Artal said.

He explained that medical ethics was consistent until the mid- to late 1800s, when Charles Darwin proposed the idea of natural selection, Darwin's cousin Francis Galton coined the term "eugenics," and Friedrich Nietzsche said that God is dead, and that "the sick man is a parasite of society."

During the Third Reich, Artal said, there was a slippery slope that started with 1933 laws permitting involuntary sterilization of people with conditions ranging from blindness or deafness to schizophrenia, and those from "undesired races." Eventually, this led to the Final Solution, and later to a coverup of what happened, Artal added.

Of 23 medical doctors tried at Nuremberg following the war, seven were acquitted, seven received death sentences, and the remainder received prison sentences ranging from 10 years to life.

The 10-point Nuremberg code developed at the trial deals with medical research, and states, among other things, that voluntary consent of the human subject is essential. As well, Artal added, the subject should be at liberty to bring the experiment to an end, and experiments should avoid all unnecessary physical and mental suffering. ■

Revenge called central to Soviet Holocaust narrative

jshupac@thecjn.ca

The western Holocaust narrative tends to be one of victimhood and "never again," while the Soviet narrative tends to be about revenge.

That was the central point stressed at a panel discussion Nov. 2 at the University of Toronto as part of Holocaust Education Week.

Titled "The Red Army and the End of the Holocaust," the event was the Annual Wolfe Lecture on the Holocaust, presented by the Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Chair in Holocaust Studies, the Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, U of T's faculty of arts and science, and the Anne Tanenbaum Centre for Jewish Studies at U of T.

The panel, attended by about 100 people, was moderated by Doris Bergen, the Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Professor of Holocaust Studies at U of T and comprised Anna Shternshis, acting director of the Anne Tanenbaum Centre for Jewish Studies and an associate professor of Yiddish at U of T, and Zvi Gitelman, a professor of Judaic studies at the University of Michigan.

The conversation was framed by Bergen's explanation that although the Soviet military is known for liberating Auschwitz and other concentration camps, the concept of the Soviets as liberators has been somewhat underplayed.

"This has to do with the multiple and sometimes contradictory roles played by the Red Army and the Soviet Union during the Holocaust," she said, explaining that the Soviet Union went from being "the ideological foe of Nazi Germany" to, after 1939, Germany's partner in dividing Poland and destroying large parts of eastern Europe.

The Soviet Union was both the site of mass killings of Jews and, in Siberia and parts of the interior, a refuge for at least half a million Jews during World War II.

Shternshis and Gitelman both shed light on the responses of Jewish and non-Jewish Red Army soldiers as they came upon the horrors of the Holocaust from 1943 onward, emphasizing that desire for revenge was extremely evident.

Shternshis, who has studied oral histories, literary texts and personal sources such as diaries and written correspondences between Red Army soldiers and relatives while serving, said that every former Jewish Red Army soldier she interviewed "talked about the importance of executing personal revenge for what happened to their families. I heard so many quotes like, 'The Germans killed all my family, I'll kill even more of their family… I saw letters where a wife wrote in Yiddish to her husband in the Red Army to 'Kill [Germans] and show no mercy.'"

She referred to works of Soviet poetry written during the period – both in Russian and in Yiddish – that she said show, "an aggressive call for revenge… and [are] all about the physical extermination of the Germans."

Gitelman, who has studied sources such as military-commissioned reports and Soviet and Yiddish press materials from the period, noted that among World War II's many "dirty little secrets" were the unofficial acts of revenge by Red Army soldiers – Jewish and non-Jewish. For instance, the mass rape of German women, of which Soviet soldiers in particular were guilty, was a form of "retaliatory humiliation."

Shternshis said the average Red Army soldier encountered the Holocaust by directly witnessing sites of carnage – such as the mass graves they came across as they advanced eastward in 1943 – and by reading about it in the press or hearing of atrocities from family members' letters.

From hundreds of interviews she conducted with Jewish Red Army veterans, Shternshis learned that many Jewish soldiers and officers who helped liberate Ukraine asked, "Where are all the Jews? Where are my relatives?" By 1943, she said, Jews in the army who had thought of themselves as more Russian than Jewish had seen the extermination of their people and this marked "the watershed line… where many started switching to thinking of themselves as Jews." ■

Survivor tells Haligonians he 'could only hang onto hope'

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT, HALIFAX

Nate Leipciger has this audience in the palms of his hands.

It's evident the 87-year-old Holocaust survivor has told his story many times before, as he walks leisurely in front of more than 200 people assembled for the opening event of Holocaust Education Week in Halifax.

He speaks emotionally, carefully and in fluent clear English about his experience as a young Polish teen living through almost two years of horror under the Nazis during World War II.

"You could only hang onto hope," he said to a Nov. 1 audience of Jews and non-Jews. "It was the only survival mechanism."

He stressed the importance of telling his story, which he has done in book form. The Weight of Freedom is a 280-page tome, one of 62 in the Azrieli Series of Holocaust Memoirs of Canadian survivors.

"It's important to tell the story. There are six million stories and we [the survivors] have to talk for them," he said.

Leipciger – who was in Halifax with his wife, three daughters, their spouses and two of his nine grandchildren – headlined a week of education that drew large numbers to two films, a French presentation, and a talk by guest lecturer Rabbi Claudio Kasier-Blueth, retired from a pulpit in Victoria B.C., discussing reconciliation between church and synagogue.

The week concluded Nov. 8 with a commemoration of Kristallnacht, when Holocaust survivor Sidney Zoltak of Montreal, a Polish boy saved by Christians in his hometown, was guest speaker.

In his Nov. 1 talk, Leipciger told how, as a 15-year-old in 1943, he was taken with his family from their quiet home in Chorzow, Poland, put on a cattle car and delivered "to the middle of nowhere. I was tattooed [No. 133628], which meant I was going to a concentration camp. Those not tattooed were taken to the gas chambers at once."

He and his father were spared. His mother and sister were taken away and never seen by Leipciger and his father again. Leipciger said he survived in Auschwitz and other camps until January 1945, when his camp was evacuated so its prisoners could go on a five-day, 140-km death march, with only a half a loaf of bread and no water. Many died en route.

By April, he said to his father, who had miraculously survived with him, "I can't go on. I'd rather be shot right now than die at the roadside." His father urged him forward. "You can't give up hope now," he said. Within three days, the Americans liberated them, "and we had a restoration of life."

He eventually arrived in Canada, with his father and completed high school, learning English, with difficulty, so he could find a trade. He worked part-time jobs and graduated from the University of Toronto with an engineering degree.

After working for others, he and two partners started a firm that became very successful. Today, he's retired, but his daughter, Lisa Pinkus, runs the firm, now a division of SNC Lavalin.

Leipciger is an annual leader of March of the Living tours and speaks often to schools and other groups about his Holocaust experiences. He and wife, Bernice, have been married for 61 years. "When he first told me his story, I didn't believe him," said Bernice, who was 17 at the time. "He suggested I read books he recommended to me, and I did. I understood very quickly."

She says Nate would have nightmares, "but he wanted the world to know. It's his mandate. He feels he has to do this."

Zoltak, 83, came through Pier 21 in Halifax to Montreal in May 1948 and became a successful insurance broker. He spoke of his return to Poland in 1997 to thank the Catholic family who saved him and his family.

He wanted to present them with a Righteous Among Nations medal for protecting Jews during the war, but they refused, still afraid of anti-Semitic reprisals all those years later.

"Finally in 2011, they accepted it, but only before a very small gathering at the Israeli Embassy in Poland," he said.

He said the world has learned little in the last 80 years. Governments don't speak loudly enough, and children must be taught, by their parents that hate is never right and love is never wrong. ■

Church hosts Shoah survivors for Nostra Aetate event

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

When a west Winnipeg Catholic church held a panel discussion last month featuring four Jewish Holocaust survivors speaking about their suffering, close to 300 Catholics listened with rapt attention.

The fact this kind of event could take place at all – and that it's not seen as anything unusual – is a testament to the revolution in Catholic-Jewish relations brought about by Nostra Aetate (In Our Time), the encyclical introduced by Pope John XXIII that was subsequently ratified by the Second Vatican Council and promulgated by his successor, Pope Paul VI, on Oct. 28, 1965.

The Oct. 21 program was one of a series hosted by Mary, Mother of the Church to commemorate the 50th anniversary of Nostra Aetate.

"Father Kevin Bettens [the church's spiritual leader] and I became aware of the 50th anniversary and felt that our church should do something to commemorate the event," said parishioner Greg Barrett, who moderated the evening. "We approached Rabbi Allan Green of Congregation Shaarey Zedek to ask for his support and also spoke with other Christian denominations."

In his opening remarks, Barrett spoke of the importance of Nostra Aetate in promoting dialogue, understanding and reconciliation between Jews and Catholics, a policy that, he noted, Pope Francis fully endorses.

He described Nostra Aetate as "a call to love" and spoke of anti-Semitism as the "longest hatred."

"For 1,600 years, Catholics were taught contempt for Jews," he said. "That teaching prepared the ground for the Holocaust and the murder of six million Jews."

Stefan Carter, Morris Faintuch, Barbara Goszer and Walter Saltzberg were Jewish children living in Poland in 1939 when the Nazis invaded. They each in turn described their struggle to survive.

Saltzberg and Carter were born in Warsaw. Carter was from an assimilated, well-to-do Jewish family who spoke Polish in the home. He spoke about moving into the ghetto and its horrendous conditions, as well as efforts by Jews to carry on a semi-normal life with secret schools, underground newspapers, theatre and concerts.

He was able to leave thanks to a bribe paid to a guard. He had cousins on the outside – one married to a Polish woman – who hid him in their apartment for the duration of the war.

Saltzberg recounted that he had been on his own from age 10. For three years, a Christian doctor sheltered him. In the waning years of the war, a young Jewish man took care of him.

Saltzberg's luck almost ran out when the apartment he was hiding in was hit by a bomb. He was trapped in rubble up to his neck and suffered a broken leg. A friend pulled him out, but he couldn't get treatment for his leg. Combined with later having to hide in an underground bunker for five months with little room to move, Saltzberg was left with one leg shorter than the other.

Morris Faintuch was from Lodz and was 10 when the war began. After his parents were killed, he and an older brother struggled to survive. Faintuch left the ghetto and lived as best he could outside. In March 1944, he was captured and sent to Auschwitz. He raised his sleeve to show his number on his arm, noting that it became his name.

Barbara Goszer, from Lvov, was nine when her parents managed to smuggle her out of the ghetto and place her with a Christian family. After a while, the family moved with her to a small town where she went to school and attended church regularly with the family.

"I could have become Catholic after the war," she said. "I became very close with my adopted family. But I felt it was important to remain Jewish and serve as a witness to the Holocaust."

Goszer, Carter and Saltzberg came directly to Winnipeg in the late 1940s as war orphans, while Faintuch arrived in 1953 after living in Israel for a few years. He had grandparents and an older brother here who had come before the war.

The Nostra Aetate commemorations actually began a week earlier with a presentation on anti-Semitism by Father Sam Argenziano of Holy Rosary Church in Winnipeg. The final program in the series was Oct. 28 and featured Rabbi Green speaking about Judaism. ■

He's out of politics, but Baird still supports Israel

jshupac@thecjn.ca

The fact he's left federal politics won't stop him from being a strong advocate for Israel, former foreign affairs minister John Baird stressed to an audience of about 150 people at a gala held Nov. 7 in support of Canadian Hadassah-Wizo (CHW).

Baird and retired Col. Natan Barak, founder and CEO of mPrest Systems and leader of Israel's Iron Dome Command and Control System Development, were the keynote speakers at the "I love Israel" gala, held at the Eaton Chelsea Hotel.

Barak spoke first, delivering a presentation on the different types of rocket threats Israel faces and way the Iron Dome works to protect Israelis.

Baird then listed the "few people, or perhaps more than a few people," who he said were happy to see him leave foreign affairs, including "the foreign policy elites in Ottawa, the gang at CBC, the go-along-to-get-along types at the United Nations, and those who long for the return of that mushy phrase, 'Canada as an honest broker.'" But he emphasized that he'll continue to be vocal in his support for the Jewish People and Israel.

"I will continue to be an outspoken advocate for the truth, for the only liberal democracy in the Middle East, for the Jewish state," he said, drawing applause.

In addition to expressing admiration for the Jewish People for "accomplishing what they have on such a small strip of land in a really tough neighbourhood," and for Israel as the most economically prosperous country in the Middle East and "a beacon of light in a part of the world where all too often darkness prevails," Baird said it was one of the greatest privileges of his life to work to strengthen the bonds of friendship between Canada and Israel.

He traced his commitment to Israel back to 1993, when he was in his 20s and spent four months working for a cabinet minister in the ministry of foreign affairs during the brief government of prime minister Kim Campbell.

He described being at a briefing about rockets falling on Metula and asking a public servant what Canada would do about it, such as issue a statement, bring it up at the UN or talk to its allies. Baird said the bureaucrat said something he'd never forget: that Canada "[doesn't] get involved in things like this, because it's hard to tell the white hats from the black hats."

Baird detailed his reaction: "I drew a picture of a white hat and a black hat. Under the white hat, I put Israel. Under the black hat, I put Hezbollah. Under the white, I put liberal democracy, and under the black, I put terrorist organization. Under the white, I put our friend, and under the black, I put our enemy." He added, "Ladies and gentlemen, it couldn't be any more black and white than that."

He said he decided right then that if he were ever in a position to change Canada's approach, he'd do so.

When he became foreign affairs minister, he instructed his officials to change every vote Canada had previously made in support of anti-Israel resolutions at the UN General Assembly, so that Canada was no longer "joining the pile-on and singling out Israel for condemnation each and every year."

His officials warned that "all hell would break loose" and that Canada would face an immediate trade boycott by the Arab world. But Baird said Canada went ahead and changed its votes and didn't get a single question about it in the House of Commons, nor did his press secretary receive a single call from the parliamentary press gallery, nor did then-Palestinian Authority prime minister, Salam Fayyad raise the issue with Baird when the two met.

Baird said that too often, Israel and the Jewish People are on the frontlines in fighting terrorism, confronting groups such as Hamas in Gaza and Hezbollah in Lebanon, and Canada needs to stand with them. "We call out those who excuse [terrorism] or perversely seek to justify it under the guise of moral relativism," he said.

Baird concluded by stressing that Israel has no greater friend than Canada and that by "working together, I know we can make this relationship even stronger in the weeks, months and years ahead." ■

Lawyer teaches natives how to reclaim looted art

lsarick@thecjn.ca

The lessons the Jewish community has learned in reclaiming priceless art that was looted by the Nazis are being passed on to another group of people seeking to reclaim stolen sacred goods: Ontario's First Nations.

At a Nov. 4 conference organized by the Chiefs of Ontario on protecting and repatriating sacred sites and items, the lawyer – whose California firm has reclaimed several works of Nazi-looted art, including the paintings featured in the recent movie Woman in Gold – described his most significant victories and some cases that are still tied up in litigation.

Addressing the conference, which included archeologists, curators and lawyers as well as community members, Donald Burris outlined the similarities in their situations.

"Just as the speakers have been highlighting the issue of cultural repatriation and reconciliation, that is similar to what we work with. We're dealing with families that have lost many relatives, who've had to rebuild lives and in some ways have had to get back a vestige of what they've lost," he said. "In the American experience, we didn't have respect for our own First Nations. In the Jewish experience [the Holocaust]... this was an absolute policy to destroy, destroy the culture of the Jewish People."

Burris described his firm's successful, but protracted fight in the Woman in Gold case, which included an appeal before the U.S. Supreme Court to reclaim five paintings by Gustav Klimt that were being held in the Austrian national art gallery.

In another instance, he described how his case was helped when a district attorney also filed suit for a stolen painting. The attorney, a Japanese-American who had been interned during World War II, said he became involved in the case to uphold a promise to his parents to fight injustices related to the era, Burris said.

Burris, who usually speaks to Jewish groups and was in Toronto last month to speak at a fundraiser for ORT Toronto, said in an interview that he hoped to leave the aboriginal group with a message that perseverance, creativity and some luck can lead to a successful resolution.

"Maybe they were a little down... I was hoping they would hear some of the positive stories and they could be applied to the issues they have to deal with," he said after his presentation.

First Nations, in fact, have run into many of the same obstacles regarding jurisdiction and repatriation that Burris has encountered, said Rose Miller, archeological supervisor monitor for the Six Nations Reserve near Brantford, Ont.

> All of the fights he has with museums and galleries we have the same fights
> Rose Miller, Archeological Supervisor Monitor For The Six Nations Reserve

"All of the fights he has – with museums and galleries – we have the same fights," she said in an interview. "Museums say you have to prove it is ours. The onus is always on us to prove it is ours."

While her community has primarily focused on reclaiming the remains of ancestors, they are as valuable as stolen art to her community.

"When he [Burris] talks about how hard it is on the Jewish families, it is no different than when we fight to get sacred artifacts back," she said.

Adam Kahgee, justice director for the Chiefs of Ontario, a political organization that represents 133 First Nations communities in the province, and one of the organizers of the three-day conference said First Nations' efforts to protect sacred sites and reclaim stolen items are a way to heal their communities.

"You can see the parallel with what Don [Burris] was taking about, the role of getting back art that was taken from the Jewish People... and how that makes them whole and gives them back part of their culture," he said. "There's some really interesting parallels between the genocide of Jewish people during World War II and the colonial genocidal practices of Britain and Canada to First Nations and indigenous peoples." ■

'Free Jewish Learning Program at the Heart of Synagogue's Plans

Instilling a Jewish Identity, One Child at a Time

Shaar Shalom Synagogue recently launched an innovative Jewish Learning Program for children aged five to Bat/Bar Mitzvah to address the fact that 50% of Jewish children in the GTA do not receive any formal Jewish education

"Too many kids in the GTA... receive no Jewish education at all, and while day schools are an excellent option, the costs are higher than many families can afford. We designed this program to simply be one of the benefits we offer our members, with tuition at zero cost. We want our families to enjoy an innovative learning program for their kids at no additional cost aside from a very modest materials fee," said Shaar Shalom's rabbi, Steven Schwarzman

The program is called ATID, which is the Hebrew word for Future The focus of Atid's curriculum is Hebrew, prayer, Jewish holidays, songs and dances and more

Bettina Schwarzman, the director, has more than 20 years of teaching experience. Bettina balances learning with fun and movement in an after school setting

"I like going to Atid. I get "alone time" with Bettina to work on Hebrew letters and words. I have so much fun. My grandfather came to pick me up at 6 and I asked him to come back in an hour!", said Daniella Hartman, aged 7

Atid's one-on-one approach helps children learn at their own pace and get individualized attention.

Shaar Shalom Synagogue offers this free program exclusively to members, making this an attractive benefit of membership This membership allows children to attend from one to four days per week, with flexibility to plan around current after school activities. Membership also includes High Holiday seats. Additionally, it reduces or elimates fees for many events held in the synagogue

Membership can be purchased by the family themselves or as a special gift by a relative for the family. A perfect gift that keeps on giving

Israeli cancer fund marks 40 years of saving lives

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Andrew Faas, an ICRF donor and cancer survivor, stands at the ICRF donor recognition wall in Tel Aviv during a recent trip to Israel that celebrated the organization's 40th anniversary.

Israel Cancer Research Fund supporters, volunteers and donors are celebrating 40 years since the non-profit organization began raising money to promote life-saving cancer research.

About 25 people from ICRF's eight chapters throughout North America and Israel got together in Israel in October to visit some of the 90 scientists working at major Israeli universities and hospitals that ICRF funds to work towards cures for various cancers.

Since 1975, ICRF has granted about $53 million (US) to Israeli cancer research scientists, which has resulted in cancer-fighting drugs, including Gleevec, a drug that treats chronic myelogynous leukemia, and Doxil, a drug that fights ovarian, breast and AIDS-related cancers.

Andrew Faas, an ICRF donor and a cancer survivor who joined the delegation to Israel last month – during which the group visited Hebrew University in Jerusalem, the Weizmann Institute of Science, Tel Aviv University and Ben Gurion University, and were treated to a gala hosted by ICRF's Jerusalem chapter chair Tamir Gilat, who is a cancer survivor and former goalie for the Maccabi Tel Aviv soccer team – wrote a blog post that highlighted the need for an organization like ICRF.

"Unfortunately, now as in 1975 when ICRF was formed, governments and big Pharma (the pharmaceutical industry) provide little investment in basic research," Faas wrote.

"Were it not for Israeli scientists funded by the ICRF, I would be dead today. Just over a decade ago I was diagnosed with leukemia and given, at most, six years to live. Thankfully I was prescribed a drug, Gleevec, which turned my fatal condition into a chronic one. ICRF funded the research, which led to the development of this miracle drug, which targets the harmful cells without affecting the healthy ones."

He said in the years since his diagnosis, the Faas Foundation has supported ICRF for more than just personal reasons.

"It is our passion for basic research that has been the major factor. Without basic research there would be no discovery, and without funding there would be no basic research, which would restrain the development of better treatments and ultimately a cure."

Jo Wagner Arbus, the executive director of ICRF in Toronto explained that the basic research that is being done is focused on "cellular division and why a cell starts off as being non-cancerous and high functioning in a person's body and how it changes to become cancer."

Brad Goldhar ICRF's international president added that ICRF-funded scientists are changing the landscape of cancer treatment around the world.

"The big buzzword these days is personalized medicine, which means two people that walk into a hospital with the same disease – let's say it's breast cancer or lung cancer – may have different personal genetic makeup. Therefore the treatment of their disease has to be different. There is a lot of focus on how to get to the point where you can basically figure out the genetic makeup of the individual, and then come up with the right cocktail, a combination of medicine that will be beneficial," Goldhar said.

He said that although the research is happening in Israel, the impact is global.

"If you ask a doctor working at a major cancer clinic anywhere in the world, 'Are you using Israeli science in your clinic?' no matter where they are in the world, the answer would be yes. So whether it's that drug, or others, or other types of therapies, there is Israeli science everywhere," he said.

One of the most exciting developments for ICRF in its 40th year, is that, for the first time, the organization is funding collaborative research between Israeli and North American researchers.

"There are three projects that are being funded. One is with a scientist working at Toronto General Hospital in partnership with scientists at Bar Ilan University. There was some pretty serious competition to get that funding and of the various projects that were reviewed, a scientist at Toronto General Hospital was one of the recipients," Goldhar said. ■

Toronto visitors impressed by human rights museum

With the inaugural visit Oct. 25-28 by 100 Grade 10 students from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto to the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, the Winnipeg-based Asper Foundation has taken its first step toward fulfilling one of the central goals of the late Israel Asper when he conceived of a human rights museum in Winnipeg more than 15 years ago.

"Since 1997, the Asper Foundation has paid to send more than 14,000 students from over 200 schools across Canada to the U.S. Holocaust Museum in Washington. Now we are going to be bringing those students to Winnipeg instead," said Jeff Morry, senior programmer for the foundation.

This first visit by the students from TanenbaumCHAT's north campus was a pilot project, Morry said.

"We will take some time now to determine how we proceed based on the feedback from this group. Then, in the spring, we plan to start bringing about 1,000 students a year from across Canada to Winnipeg to experience the museum [which has been open for just over a year]. We want to educate and inspire young people."

For the TanenbaumCHAT students, the visit to the museum and presentations from French-born Holocaust survivors (and sisters) Rochelle Fink and Regine Frankel, Yazidi community leader Nafiya Naso, and two refugees from Sierra Leone were eye-opening.

"I never realized before how many other peoples [in addition to Jews] were murdered in the Holocaust," said student Hallie Rodney. "The museum gave me a new understanding of the importance of the Holocaust."

Cedric Attias said it's important for young people to learn the stories the museum is presenting so they can try to prevent future genocides. "I was impressed by the sheer size of the building," he said. "It's largely interactive, which helps in connecting with our generation, who are so into technology."

Kayla Saul was impressed by the museum's architectural design. "It's amazing how you go from light to darkness," she said. "The design was obviously well thought out to create the greatest impact. It makes you appreciate the freedoms we have in Canada."

One of the most important goals of the museum is to encourage visitors to action. Kayla said the trip would spur her to help raise money for refugees, while Cedric said he went home with greater sympathy for people struggling for freedom. "I hope to come back here some time," he said.

The student's trip also included tours of the Manitoba Museum (formerly the Manitoba Museum of Man and Nature), the Manitoba legislature, the new polar bear exhibit at the Winnipeg Zoo, and the Asper Campus and Gray Academy of Jewish Education.

A couple of weeks before the TanenbaumCHAT students came, nine members of Toronto's Temple Emanu-El also travelled to Winnipeg to tour the museum.

Like the high schoolers, they were quite impressed with the museum. For Holocaust survivor Judy Weissenberg Cohen, the visit had special meaning, because she was able to see and listen to her own testimony for the first time.

"It was a very moving moment, particularly for our young tour guide," she said. "He said that that was the first time he had ever met someone whose words were part of the exhibit."

While in Winnipeg, the temple members were hosted by Temple Shalom, Winnipeg's Reform congregation, with whom they shared Friday night supper and attended services. The visitors also enjoyed a jazz concert at Temple Shalom, and on Sunday morning before their departure were provided with an overview of Winnipeg Jewish history by life-long Winnipegger David Cohen. ■

Question: Regarding custody: My daughter deals with her mother's emotional nonsense much too frequently for an eleven-year-old girl. I'm not sure its normal for a mother/ex-wife to bad mouth and trash-talk her ex-husband. My daughter wants nothing more than to live with us. Is there an age when a child can decide on their own?

Answer: No, there is no such age. Nonetheless, by age 16, if a teenager moves with her feet, no court is going to stop her. No statute or court has ever drawn a line in the sand because with children, everything depends upon individual facts and their best interests. And a child's best interest first depends upon who's telling the story and upon who's listening. Even if one parent indicates where the child says she "wants" to live, a judge might well suspect the child is saying the exact same thing to the other parent. Why would a child do that? First, the child may not wish to hurt the other parent's feelings. Secondly, a child may well want to manipulate the situation. It's not unusual for a child to "play" one parent off the other.

What one child then "says" and another parent actually "hears" can cause tremendous pain to both. For this wise reason, a child's age is not the only legal test because the true wishes of a child may not be the best criteria, especially when the child doesn't want to be asked or might be planning meticulously for a PlayStation 3. And if the 12-year-old child is immature, then the child's chameleon wishes the next day may be a trip to Disneyworld, if properly coached. Maybe child support is consistently late and mom can't pay the bills. Should her ill-advised bursts of frustration now really translate into a change of custody?

My strong advice: Take the pressure off the child. Sit down with your ex and start compromising for the child's sake. If you can't get past your mutual distrust, hatred and anger get help from a mediator or a therapist. No rules about "when that kid turns 12 she's moving in with me and that will show her" is going to turn your daughter into a better person, a moral woman, a loving individual with a peaceful soul.

When she's older you want her to say "my daddy did the right thing." Remember also the words of William Blake: "we become what we behold." So set an example – lest your bitter child develops her own troubled relationships.

Israeli secular court to rule on Orthodox conversions

plungen@thecjn.ca

There's a lacuna in Israeli law – a gap, an opening into which Rabbi Seth Farber and the organization he heads, ITIM, is hoping to wedge a size 12 shoe.

So far the door is ajar, but whether it's slammed shut remains to be seen.

ITIM, a non-profit organization that helps people navigate Israeli religious bureaucracy, is supporting Martina Ragacova and two others who are suing the Israeli government for the right to have their private Orthodox conversions recognized by state authorities. A decision is expected in the next few months and if Ragacova is successful, it could end the monopoly of the Chief Rabbinate on conversions when it comes to determining an applicant's citizenship and status in the State of Israel.

At the same time, ITIM is promoting an alternative conversion system called Giyur Kehalacha (Conversion According to Halachah), an Orthodox process that has brought more than 70 people into the Jewish fold.

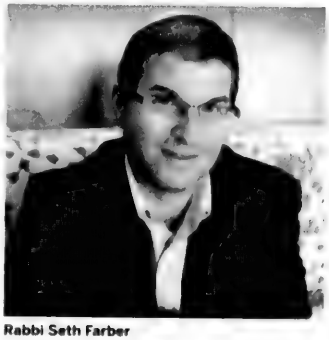
Breaking "the hegemony" of the Chief Rabbinate is crucial, Rabbi Farber said. At stake is nothing less than the future of the Jewish People. "After the security situation, this is the most important part of life in Israel. It's about who's in, who's out and whether we are going to let a small band of rabbis decide that and put up barriers to entering the Jewish fold," he said.

Rabbi Farber, an American who made aliyah 20 years ago, said a consensus has emerged in Israeli society that conversions outside the auspices of the Chief Rabbinate should be recognized. Rabbi Farber was in Toronto last week as part of a brief overseas visit sponsored by Torah in Motion to inform members of the Jewish community about recent developments in Israel. He spoke at Or Chaim Yeshiva in Toronto, as well as in Ottawa, Phoenix and Los Angeles.

Rabbi Farber said the High Court decision will have implications for issues such as registration as a recognized Jew, marriage and citizenship.

The Chief Rabbinate wishes to keep to itself the right to determine who is properly converted to Judaism. In doing so, it's imposing strict standards on conversions, ignoring halachic precedents that permit a more lenient approach, he added.

Rabbi Farber said controversy over conversion has been brewing in Israel ever since the massive wave of immigration from the former Soviet Union began in the 1980s. More than one million people moved to Israel, but as many as 350,000 were not halachically Jewish.



Rabbi Seth Farber

As a result, they were unable to be married in Israel in the courts controlled by the Chief Rabbinate. "They did not have the full rights as Jews, even though they came as Jews and self identified as Jews." They lived in Israel, served in the army, participated in the country's life but weren't considered fully Jewish. "That created a lot of resentment," he said.

Ragacova was converted in Bnei Brak by the rabbinic court of Rabbi Nissim Karelitz, who is highly respected in the ultra-Orthodox world. Nevertheless, the Chief Rabbinate refused to recognize that conversion and any others not performed by its roster of 33 rabbis.

Moreover, it is increasingly imposing strict criteria that are not necessary under Halachah, said Rabbi Farber.

One example – not cited by Farber – is the case of Karen Brunwasser. Brunwasser's father is Jewish. Her mother was not, but both she and her mother were converted by an Orthodox rabbinic court in Philadelphia when she was an infant. When Brunwasser moved to Israel, she learned the Chief Rabbinate did not accept the validity of the conversion, because two of the rabbis who officiated had also presided over congregations that had mixed seating.

That's the kind of thing that has prompted concern in the Diaspora. "The North American Jewish community is perturbed by the expanding powers of the Chief Rabbinate, because it is being exported to North America," Rabbi Farber said.

Efforts to expand the number of Orthodox rabbis empowered to perform conversions seems to have run into a roadblock. In 2004, then-prime minister Ariel Sharon created a Conversion Authority to try to bring into the Jewish fold the thousands of Russian Jews. But recently the Conversion Authority was transferred from the Justice Ministry to the Religious Services Ministry, which is controlled by Shas, a religious party.

Activists seek end to Chief Rabbinate monopoly

Other reforms that would have permitted municipal rabbis to create their own conversion courts have been stopped, Ha'aretz reported.

"A group of rabbis and activists realized a red line had been crossed, that the Conversion Authority would remain the same and after discussing it with the moderate religious Zionist community, the die was cast to create an alternative Orthodox conversion court. This is the first mainstream Orthodox challenge to the hegemony of the Chief Rabbi of Israel," Rabbi Farber said.

Twenty-one Orthodox rabbis perform conversions under Giyur Kehalacha auspices, primarily for children. The courts are given a high degree of credibility because of the involvement of prominent Orthodox scholars. The president of the conversion courts is Rabbi Nahum Rabinovitch, formerly of Toronto, while Rabbi David Stav, a respected scholar, is also part of the new system, Rabbi Farber said.

"What differentiates these conversions is our human approach and our halachic approach. We start with the premise that they self-identify as Jews and they want to share our destiny and we want to work together to bring them into the halachic Jewish fold," he said.

"We don't see ourselves as gatekeepers trying to keep people out. We see ourselves as representatives of a halachic community, trying to help people come in."

Rabbi Farber hopes the Supreme Court will see it the same way and by approving a conversion outside the Chief Rabbinate's authority, end its monopoly on determining who is a Jew. ■

'To me, it is not a helpful resolution'

"To me, it is not a helpful resolution. It is still certainly a reaffirmation of what Orthodoxy stands for, which is very traditional gender roles for men and women and part of those carefully assigned gender roles are that men should be the religious leaders on the pulpit, and women should take other roles of leadership such as the educators and head mistresses of schools and so forth," he said.

"That being said, the vast majority of the officers of the RCA felt that this was not a helpful resolution to be brought forward at the current time."

In a statement to The CJN, Rabbi Chaim Strauchler, spiritual leader at Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, who sits on RCA's executive committee, said, "Female leadership is crucial to the past, present and future of our community. This leadership will continue to evolve through the life work of great women committed to the process of Halachah and to the social dynamics of a living breathing community."

Although the resolution has no direct impact on the maharot currently working in Orthodox communities, Maharat Finegold said, "I think it does raise the question of how comfortable will people feel in the future making new hires. But I think there is also a deep desire. I talk to people all the time who say, 'We really need a maharat in our community.' And there just aren't enough of us to go around." ■

Yitzhak Navon buried in state funeral on Mount Herzl

JTA
JERUSALEM

Yitzhak Navon, Israel's first Sephardi president and the first president to visit Egypt, was buried in a state funeral on Mount Herzl.

Navon, who served from 1978 to 1983, died Nov. 6 at 94. His body lay in state on Sunday morning before his funeral at noon. Along with his family, the mourners included current and former Israeli leaders.

In his eulogy at the funeral, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called Navon "a jewel that adorned our capital, Jerusalem."

Navon served in four Knessets, becoming one of the Labor Party's most respected members. He served one term as president; he chose not to vie for the position a second time, preferring to serve again in the Knesset. During his presidential term, he threatened to resign unless an investigation committee was set up to look at the events that took place in 1982 at the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps, where an Israel-allied Lebanese Christian militia massacred hundreds of people.

Yitzhak Navon, Israel's fifth president, lies in state at the President's residence in Jerusalem.

Netanyahu also remembered Navon earlier Sunday, at the beginning of the weekly Cabinet meeting.

"Israel's heritage was his guiding principle as president, especially the heritage of Sephardi Jewish communities, and he also worked to advance this heritage among all parts of the nation as deputy prime minister, minister of education and culture and – of course – as president," the prime minister said.

"I will always remember the clarity of his spoken Hebrew. The love of Jerusalem was embedded deep in his heart; this was the city in which he grew up and lived, and wrote books to which he was deeply linked. He will be remembered as a president who brought people together; his memory will be enshrined in the heart of the nation."

The current Israeli president, Reuven Rivlin, who also eulogized Navon at the funeral, said in an earlier statement that Navon "created a new style and practice for the presidency. Yitzhak was a noble man, unceremoniously aristocratic, a president who came from the people, and whom the people greatly loved and appreciated."

Navon, Israel's fifth president, was born to a Sephardi family who had lived in Jerusalem for over 300 years.

He worked as a teacher and in the 1940s became an officer in the Haganah, which later became the Israel Defence Forces. He was one of the closest advisers to Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, and also served as private secretary to Israel's first foreign minister, Moshe Sharet.

Navon was the author of several books and a play. ■

Reform Jews cheer Biden's support for Israel

JTA
ORLANDO, FLA.

Thousands of Reform Jews cheered U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden's criticism of Israeli settlements, but were even more boisterous in applauding his pledge to fight the delegitimization of Israel and to stop Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon.

In a keynote address to 5,000 people at the 2015 Biennial of the Union for Reform Judaism, Biden acknowledged disagreements between the Obama administration and Israeli government over settlements and the Iran deal. But, he added, the "core of our alliance is as strong as steel."

"No one president or prime minister can alter that no matter what they do," Biden said.

Biden stressed the need to turn the focus on the Iran deal to ensuring that Iran lives up to its commitments. The vice-president pledged that if Iran tries to cheat, sanctions will snap back. If Iran does cheat, he added, all options – including the "use of military force" – remain on the table for stopping any future Iranian pursuit of a nuclear weapon.

"We simply will not permit Iran to acquire a nuclear weapon. Period. Period," he said.

Biden received strong applause for his comments on stopping Iran, as well as his pledge that the Obama administration would work with Israel to strengthen its military capability in the face of a host of regional threats.

Later in the 45-minute speech, the vice-president received a standing ovation when he promised that the Obama administration would fight efforts to delegitimize Israel and likened some harsh criticism of the Jewish state to anti-Semitism. He also received a standing ovation when he stressed the need for a two-state solution.

The audience cheered when he declared that "there is no excuse, there should be no tolerance for any member or employee of the Israeli administration referring to the president of the United States in derogatory terms. Period. Period. Period. Period." The comment appeared to be a reference to Ran Baratz, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's pick to serve as his media chief. After announcing the potential appointment, it surfaced that Baratz, a former university lecturer, posted on Facebook in March that Obama's reaction to Netanyahu's speech to Congress was "modern anti-Semitism." He also has mocked Secretary of State John Kerry and Israeli President Reuven Rivlin.

"Not withstanding those terrible comments," Biden said, "no one, no one, no one can undermine our relationship and the security of the Jewish and democratic State of Israel."

Baratz has apologized both for the comments and for not informing Netanyahu about them. For his part, the prime minister has criticized the comments – but has not backed off his plans to appoint Baratz.

Biden praised Rabbi David Saperstein, the longtime director of the Reform movement's Washington office who now serves as United States ambassador-at-large for international religious freedom. Saperstein was honoured earlier in the evening. And the vice-president thanked the Reform movement for working with him for decades on a host of liberal domestic issues, as well as efforts to bring Soviet Jews and Ethiopian Jews to Israel in the 1980s and to stop genocide in the Balkans in the 1990s. He also praised the Reform movement for quickly backing him in 2012 when he got ahead of the president in voicing support for legalized gay marriage.

The vice-president attributed the Reform movement's activism to its immigrant history.

"You don't forget," Biden said. "That's what I love about you. You do not forget." ■

Abbas proves he's no partner for peace: Israeli minister

TAMAR PILEGGI
JERUSALEM

Israel's Energy Minister Yuval Steinitz claimed Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas was directly responsible for incitement behind the recent upsurge in Palestinian terrorism, and that this proved he was an unsuitable partner in pursuing a peaceful solution to the conflict.

"The wave of terrorism took off in large part due to Abu Mazen's incitement," Steinitz said on Nov. 7, using the Palestinian leader's nom de guerre, "and he cannot be absolved of his responsibility for this terrorism."

At a cultural event in Ness Ziona, Steinitz said Abbas "has still not proven to be a partner for peace, and the critical thing to do now is to stop incitement."

"There hasn't been a government that has been able to end the conflict, this is the reality in the Middle East. No one has a magic solution, not a right-wing government and not a left-wing government," he added.

U.S. officials said last Thursday that U.S. President Barack Obama has made a "realistic assessment" that a peace deal between Israelis and Palestinians is not possible during his final months in office. The stark assessment came ahead of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's visit to the White House Nov. 9, the first meeting between the two leaders in more than a year.

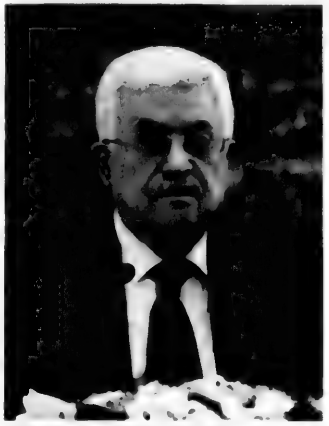
Last month, on the sidelines of Israeli-American Council in Washington D.C., Steinitz leveled similar criticisms against Abbas, describing him as "the number one instigator in the world against the Jewish people and the state of Israel."

"There is a great similarity between the incitement of the Palestinian Authority under Abu Mazen and the incitement of the Nazis against the Jewish people before the Second World War," he charged.

"To speak of Abbas' part [in the violence] is the understatement of the century," Steinitz said.

Israel's energy minister insisted that while Abbas condemned Palestinian terrorism to world leaders, the subtext of Palestinian Authority-sponsored media proved the insincerity of his condemnation.

Steinitz at the time said that 18 months earlier he had presented members of the U.S. Congress with evidence of incitement, including PA-sponsored children's magazines that he said featured positive images of Hitler.



Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas

Like Steinitz, Netanyahu and other top Israeli officials have repeatedly accused Abbas and his government of fueling the surge in terrorism, in part by peddling "lies" about purported Israeli plans to change the status quo at Jerusalem's flashpoint Temple Mount holy site.

Incitement to violence by Abbas and others, they charge, is a major catalyst for the recent wave of Palestinian terrorism in which 11 Israelis have been killed in the spate of near-daily attacks since Oct. 1 and dozens have been wounded.

Over 60 Palestinians have been killed in the latest round of violence, the majority of them while carrying out stabbing attacks against Israelis. The rest died in clashes with Israeli military forces.

On Friday Nov. 8, 369 members of the U.S. House of Representatives urged Abbas to cease inciting violence, to continue security co-operation with Israel and to agree to renew peace talks without conditions.

The bipartisan letter made clear that US lawmakers saw Abbas and other PA officials responsible for inciting violence against Israelis, and unless calm was restored there'll be little chance for a two-state solution. ■

Canadian artist explores healing through a giant egg

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, JERUSALEM

When the people of Israel needed healing, Canadian performance artist Alana Ruben Free offered it in the form of a giant egg, exploring motherhood as part of the second Jerusalem Biennale, from Sept. 24 to Nov. 5.

The 8-foot-tall (2.5 metre) aluminum egg weighs half a metric ton (1,100 pounds), and can seat three or four people comfortably along the curved bench inside. Part of Free's performance piece entitled "Presence=Present," it stood in the Hechal Shlomo gallery at the heart of an exhibit called "The Art of Motherhood." Free created the egg in collaboration with Israeli sculptor David Gerstein.

In "Presence=Present," the viewer is also the performer. Visitors viewed the egg from the outside, then entered it to sit inside for a two-minute period, alone or with a loved one.

Free offered a text to say aloud, which reads, "I love you / I trust you / I respect you / I appreciate your presence in my life." Silence or other words could be substituted.

The idea for the experience "germinated," Free told The CJN, for more than a decade, during which she explored themes of motherhood in other creative ways.

Free was born in Fredericton, N.B., and earned a degree in business from Western University, where she was a Rhodes Scholar finalist, and a master's degree in Jewish Studies from Touro College in New York. She helped found the Mom Egg literary journal and presented a number of plays and performance art pieces all over North America before making aliyah two years ago.

In "Presence=Present," Free envisioned an escape from a "technologically complex world, with continual distractions, [and where] alienation and loneliness are common conditions."

"I was contemplating what [would be] the best way to give my audience the experience of love. I was thinking about public meditative spaces, how to create a sacred space in the public."

Around 500 people entered the egg during the Biennale, including her own 20-year-old son, and, at the closing event on Nov. 4, her parents, Allen and Rhona Ruben of Toronto. She entered the egg with each one in turn.

Visitor numbers were lower than expected due to ongoing violence and stabbings in Jerusalem. However, Free called the experience's healing potential ideal and well-timed. "I have well over 200 testimonials of people who have been in the egg," One wrote, "I felt myself pure and new, returning to the womb." Another, "During this time of terrible violent acts by our enemies, it gave me a sense of peace."

"It's very beautiful... to be a witness to so much love," said Free, saying one couple from Vancouver Island spontaneously decided to redo their marriage vows inside the egg.

The Biennale (pronounced "bee-en-ah-LAY") concept began in Venice in 1895, and has grown to more than 200 events all over the world, including Montreal and Vancouver.

Galleries all over the city showcased nearly 200 artists who explored sacred texts, relationships between Diaspora and Israeli Jews, and the city of Jerusalem itself.

Ram Ozeri, founder of the Jerusalem Biennale, called Free's piece, "one of the most important and brilliant art pieces we had... It's a very updated medium, unconventional; it's an installation and a performance coming together."

He was surprised, entering the egg with his wife and son. "From the outside, it looks like one thing ... But there's something so unique, when you sit there inside an art piece. You feel so intimate, and so close to someone that you care about."

While most artists did not remain with their pieces during the entire Biennale, Free spent almost every day introducing and guiding visitors from all over the world. "Something shifts when you enter it," she said. "It's a bit of a magical space. It opens people's hearts; it opens their imagination." ■

For Reform Jews, some good news on engagement

STEVEN M. COHEN
JTA, NEW YORK

While the 2013 Pew survey uncovered some disturbing evidence of lower levels of Jewish engagement among young people, the same survey contains several pieces of good news for Reform Jews 5,000 of whom are gathering this week in Orlando, Fla., for the movement's biennial conference organized by the Union for Reform Judaism.

Since 1990, Reform synagogue members not only grew in number, but they held steady on several measures of Jewish engagement, even as their rate of intermarriage soared and the number with predominantly Jewish friends declined. The positive indicators point to the movement having the human assets it will need as it confronts a variety of challenges ahead.

These inferences, which must be regarded with caution, derive from comparisons I drew between the 1990 National Jewish Population Survey (NJPS) and the Pew survey. While both studies are highly regarded by survey professionals, such comparisons are tricky, in part owing to the vastly different survey methodologies. (As Pew surveyed individuals in 2013 and NJPS surveyed households in 1990, I converted the 1990 respondents to stand for individual adult Jews rather than the entire household.)

That said, it appears that the numbers of Reform synagogue members rose from about 623,000 in 1990 to approximately 756,000 in 2013, commensurate with the expanding number of adult Jews overall, which grew from 4.3 million to 5.3 million during the same time period. In addition, with intermarriage four times higher in 2013 than in 1990 (31 per cent of married Jews vs. less than eight per cent in 1990 among Reform temple members), far more non-Jews were affiliated with Reform temples in 2013 than their rather paltry numbers in 1990 when intermarriage was far more rare.

Along with the increase in intermarriage came a decrease in the number of Reform temple members with mostly Jewish close friends. Standing at 36 per cent in 2013, the comparable number had been 49 per cent in 1990. Obviously, Jewish spouses and Jewish friends go hand in hand, both empirically and metaphorically.

Despite the increased intermarriage and diminished Jewish social networks (Jewish friends and family), the 1990 to 2013 period saw hardly any change in the proportions who celebrate Jewish holidays, to take one telling domain of Jewish engagement.

> The Jews who joined Reform temples were as active in Jewish life, if not more so, as their counterparts in 1990.

For Reform temple members, seder attendance reached 94 per cent in 2013, just above the 91 per cent reported in 1990. It looks like Yom Kippur fasting also grew, to 75 per cent, from the 70 per cent 23 years earlier. Attending High Holiday services (at least at some point) reached 95 per cent among temple members, jumping markedly from 81 per cent in 1990. In another domain, the proportion that said they gave something to Jewish charities also ticked upward to 85 percent from 80 percent.

To be sure, not all indicators of Jewish engagement moved upward. The survey comparisons show slight declines in some other indicators. Comparing 2013 with 1990, we find drops in monthly service attendance (34 per cent in 2013 vs. 40 per cent in 1990), in usually lighting Shabbat candles (21 per cent "now" vs. 27 per cent then), in belonging to a Jewish organization (46 per cent vs. 49 per cent in 1990), and in feeling that being Jewish is very important (a slight decline to 60 per cent from 63 per cent in 1990).

But given the surveys' differences in sampling, in how respondents understood the questions, in the way they were interviewed and in whom they represent, we can't take the small differences in either direction too seriously.

The overall conclusion: not only did Reform temples affiliate more adult Jews in 2013, but the Jews who joined them were as active in Jewish life, if not more so, as their counterparts in 1990.

PLO launches Hebrew Facebook page

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

The Palestinian national movement has launched a Hebrew-language Facebook page whose purpose is to make the Palestinians' case to Israeli Jews.

The Palestine Liberation Organization's (PLO) "Committee for Interaction with Israeli Society" published its first post on the social network last week.

The outreach body, founded in December 2012, explains its vision in one of its earliest posts: "Reaching a just and sustainable solution to the Middle East conflict depends on the establishment of an independent Palestinian state alongside Israel on the basis of the 4 June 1967 lines and a just and agreed-upon solution to the refugee problem on the basis of UN resolution 194."

Titled "Palestine in Hebrew," the page's messages are geared toward Israelis and their concerns, telling them, "The occupation is the enemy, oppressing our lives and corrupting yours."

It employs hashtags – a kind of tagging that sorts posts by searchable subjects – that urge Israelis to act politically, such as "#be_responsible_end_the_occupation."

> The occupation is the enemy, oppressing our lives and corrupting yours

And it includes high-production-value videos that counter Israeli perceptions of international moves taken by the Palestinian Authority (PA) in recent years, such as explaining in Hebrew that "the appeal to the UN" for recognition of a state of Palestine "was never meant to isolate Israel or hurt its legitimacy, but to emphasize the illegitimacy of the occupation that began in 1967 in order to end it."

It also carries a speech by PA President Mahmoud Abbas.

The page had a scant 179 "likes" by last Sunday morning, though millions of Israelis are on Facebook, by far the most popular social network among Hebrew speakers.

But it has already drawn Israeli-Jewish responses and counter-arguments to the claims made in its posts, and its establishment was reported in mainstream Israeli media Nov. 8 including Israel Radio's morning news broadcast.

One Israeli posted to the page a 1910 newspaper clipping of an Arab attack on a Jew in Jaffa, with the sarcastic comment, "Because of the occupation," suggesting that Arab violence against Jews preceded the 1967 conquest of the West Bank and Gaza. In one post, the PLO page complained of Justice Minister Ayelet Shaked's proposal to require political advocacy groups to wear tags in the Knesset similar to those worn by lobbyists, saying, "We will be identified by the tags Shaked is requiring us to wear."

That first-person reference led one commenter on the page to say, "It appears that this page is actually run by Israeli left-wingers in the PLO's name."

There was no immediate word on the identity of the page's administrators, though the Hebrew is fluent and largely error-free, including when translating linguistically difficult passages from the poems of the Palestinian national poet, Mohammed Darwish. ■

Israeli said to pass on intelligence re: downed airline

JTA
JERUSALEM

Some of the intelligence intercepts being used to assess what happened to a Russian airplane that crashed over the Sinai Peninsula came from Israel.

Israeli officials would not comment on the claims by an unnamed U.S. official and a diplomatic source, CNN reported Sunday.

The communications between the Islamic State affiliates in Sinai were captured by Israeli intelligence focused there and passed along to the United States and Britain, the sources said, CNN reported.

Investigators looking into the crash of the Metrojet flight bound for Russia told Reuters on Sunday that they are "90 per cent sure" a bomb on board is the cause. All 224 people aboard were killed in the Oct. 31 crash, including a former program director for Hillel Russia.

The Sinai affiliate of the Islamic State claimed responsibility for bringing down the passenger flight, saying it was in retaliation for Russian airstrikes on rebels in Syria's civil war.

Russia began launching airstrikes on Syria in September, saying it was coordinating with Syrian President Bashar Assad to combat terror groups such as the Islamic State. ■

Reform movement growing but also greying

Now, any discussion of Reform temple members immediately provokes curiosity about Reform-identified non-members. From 1990 to 2013, how did they change? For the most part they experienced the same sorts of changes as were recorded among Reform temple members. They grew in number (though not as much), rising from 912,000 to 1,154,000. Their intermarriage rates jumped significantly, almost doubling from 34 per cent to 66 per cent (of those who were married at the time of each survey). And the numbers of those with mostly Jewish friends declined – from 30 per cent in 1990 to 23 per cent in 2013.

Notwithstanding the weakening of Jewish social networks, among adult Jews who identify as Reform yet belong to no congregation, the 2013 vs. 1990 comparisons show generally small changes in both directions on those measures of Jewish identity that were found in both studies.

The increased numbers of Reform congregants and their steady levels of Jewish engagement should certainly hearten both clergy and lay leaders of Reform congregations and the continental movement. At the same time, serious challenges are not only on the horizon, but have arrived. Among them are the sharply declining numbers of younger adult congregants, illustrated by the rise of average age from 46 in 1990 to 52 in 2013, as well as the very small number of Reform-identified congregants 35-44 (73,000) as compared with the far larger number just 20 years older (224,000).

Another issue is the very high rate of intermarriage – roughly 80 per cent among married Reform-raised Jews during 2000-13.

Yet the over-time patterns do suggest that collectively, the Reform population can contend with high and rising rates of intermarriage, with two provisos: that intermarried couples affiliate with congregations, and that they undertake several other acts of Jewish engagement and commitment. ■

Many terrorists are not on Facebook as media claim

AVI ISSACHAROFF
JERUSALEM

Palestinian stone throwers clash with Israeli soldiers near Ramallah in the West Bank on Nov. 6. Many of the attackers are not drawn to the cause by social media, Avi Issacharoff argues. FLASH90 PHOTO

Pundits have explained countless times over the past month that part of the current outburst of violence, perhaps even most of it, is the direct result of incitement on Palestinian social media. Again and again, Facebook was singled out as a central driving engine of the latest escalation, which is described in Palestinian media as the "Al-Quds [Jerusalem] intifadah."

But from interrogations by Israeli investigators of the terrorists and other attackers arrested following recent attacks, or who were caught on the way to carrying them out, a different and surprising picture emerges.

Many of the attackers do not have accounts on Facebook, or on any other social networks. The online videos urging attacks on Jews have not reached them. They were motivated to strike by incitement of the old variety, the sort that played a dominant role in the last century: conversations, coffeehouse chatter; some television broadcasts, to be sure; but primarily the lightning-fast spread of rumours from mouth to ear. It is these that is triggering a substantial proportion of the latest mobilization against the Jews.

In the past, this phenomenon was called fazaah, an Arabic term for an alarm or loud cry intended to drive its audience to attack. That old mechanism seems to be at the heart of the incitement driving this latest "intifadah," which has seen the instruments of incitement known from as far back as the Arab revolt of 1936 combined with those of modern youths fed by (among other sources) the social networks of 2015.

Social networks are emphatically not absent from the arena. They play a clear role in igniting the passions of the current escalation, Hamas and others are making perniciously adept use of them, but they are apparently not as central as the media have hitherto suggested.

About half of urban Palestinian youths are on Facebook, but in villages and refugee camps the picture is very different. The attackers who came out of the villages of the Hebron region, for example, not only aren't on Facebook, they often live in homes without regular electricity service.

One young woman from a village near Nablus told investigators that her village does not have a steady supply of power, and explained that she decided to carry out an attack when she happened to hear someone saying aloud that Hudai Hashalmoun, a niqab-wearing Palestinian woman who was shot by a Givati soldier in Hebron as she attempted a stabbing attack, was murdered in cold blood, butchered and desecrated. She decided then and there to carry out an attack to avenge the death of a young woman she did not know.

This story is emblematic of another dramatic finding from the interrogations: a number of the attackers set out on their attacks within less than an hour of being exposed to purported news or rumour, whether through online videos or word of mouth, of the "murders" of Palestinians by Israel. Others planned their attacks over time and even filmed their final testaments in videos intended to be broadcast after their deaths.

The fact that some of the attackers were spurred to action by a simple statement from neighbours and family members, or by graphic pictures from deadly protests or previous terror attacks aired on television, highlights the abiding importance of these traditional platforms in driving the violence. Indeed, the most prominent media outlet cited by the attackers as influencing their decision was Hamas' Al-Aqsa TV, which has a wide following in the West Bank, along with Islamic Jihad's channel and two others: Al-Quds and Palestine Mubasher. All are popular Palestinian television outlets whose broadcasts, Israeli investigators believe, are contributing to the terrorists' sense of mission.

The Palestinian Authority (PA) is working to prevent these outlets' incitement to violence, but the Al-Aqsa channel has been able to bypass the authority's oversight through the simple expedient of using real-time broadcasts from reporters through their cellphones to deliver the claims that help create the atmosphere of fazaah.

The PA has a similarly difficult time controlling the wild frontiers of social media. Here, too, the general view of what has been happening is a little misconceived: the notion that many recently launched Facebook pages calling for a third intifadah are the work of individuals, or of local initiatives, is not entirely correct. The role of Hamas in leading this discourse on Facebook is becoming more evident to the security services. Hamas now operates no small number of Facebook pages meant to fire up audiences to a modern-day fazaah. Some pages are based in Gaza and some in the West Bank.

That doesn't mean there aren't Facebook pages managed by independent individuals or ordinary Palestinians. But Hamas is now believed to be the dominant force driving the incitement in social media.

At the end of the day, the sheer number of Facebook pages working to inflame tensions has made it difficult for Israeli and Palestinian security services to disrupt the incitement efforts. As soon as one page is closed, many others are opened.

Israel has collected data on the identities of the attackers. In 33 days, 73 Palestinians set out to commit attacks: 24 from Jerusalem and surrounding villages; 47 from the West Bank. 32 of them from the Hebron area, and 20 from the city itself. Just two were Israeli citizens.

Six of the 73 were women. All but two were unmarried. The average age: 20.

City-dwellers outnumber rural Palestinians by almost two-to-one: Forty-five of the attackers came from cities or smaller towns (like Qabatiya), 24 from rural villages, and just four from refugee camps – or, to be exact, from one refugee camp, the east Jerusalem neighbourhood of Shuafat.

In that last figure lies perhaps the most dramatic difference between the current intifadah and those of 1987 and 2000. In the past, the refugee camps were at the forefront of the outbreak of violence and terror, and undertook much of the fighting. Today, despite the dismal economic and social conditions in the camps, they are not actually part of the stabbing intifadah. (Shuafat is more representative of the centrality of east Jerusalem in the phenomenon than of refugee camps generally.)

Whereas in the past, tens of thousands of camp residents took to the streets of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, joined the armed cells of Fatah and Hamas and constituted the "spearhead" of the violence, they are only peripheral actors in the protests taking place in the West Bank in recent weeks, and are unambiguously avoiding taking part in the stabbing attacks.

This absence may explain the broader lack of popular participation in the violence, which has thus far been limited to a few thousand activists.

It is hard, and perhaps impossible, to produce a straightforward profile of the "average terrorist" in this escalation. On one level, he is a young, unmarried man from east Jerusalem or Hebron. But as we have learned in recent days, some attackers come from elsewhere, some are women, some are educated and some less so.

Some are social outsiders, while others, like Muhannad Halabi, who began the wave of stabbing attacks with his early October killing of Nehemia Lavi and Aharon Bennett in Jerusalem's Old City, were socially popular. Among the women, the first female attackers were discernibly drawn from the sidelines of Palestinian society, but the attacks that came later were committed by women from social circles that represent the mainstream of Palestinian society in the West Bank.

These differences from the past, and the diversity of the attackers, make it hard to say where this is all heading. Security officials do not expect any significant reduction in the violence anytime soon, at least not while there is no diplomatic horizon. The reason for that assessment is tied to the PA's precarious position in this violence. Even as Fatah has disseminated calls for violence, and PA President Mahmoud Abbas has accused Israel of threatening Al-Aqsa and falsely charged Israel with executing innocent Palestinians, the PA has been a key factor in blunting incitement and violent opposition to Israel. Without a change in the PA's interactions with Israel – that is, a new diplomatic initiative that might give it a credible alternative to the violence – it will not be able to continue security co-ordination with Israel, or to help ensure the struggle remains diffuse and confined to the "popular," for very long. The latest escalation, in other words, runs a real risk of slipping into an armed intifadah. ■

ABIGAIL KLEIN LEICHMAN
ISRAEL 21C

The municipality of Tel Aviv-Yafo (Jaffa) is nicknamed "The Non-Stop City" but its world-famous nightlife scene is just one of the many facets of this diamond of a city – Israel's second-largest in population after Jerusalem.

Also known as The Big Orange, this 20-square-mile seaside city boasts multiple foreign embassies, museums and cultural centres, including the Tel Aviv Museum of Art, Beit Hatfutsot-Museum of the Jewish People, Tel Aviv Performing Arts Center, Habima National Theater, Cameri Theater, Suzanne Dellal Center for Dance and Theater and many others.

You'll need more than a day to soak up everything Tel Aviv has to offer. Fortunately the city has about 10,000 hotel rooms, with global chains such as Sheraton, Hilton, Carlton and Intercontinental, as well as a fast-growing boutique hotel sector.

We suggest you start by staking a spot in the sand.

Hang out at the beach:

It's not for nothing that National Geographic recently named Tel Aviv-Yafo one of the world's top 10 oceanfront cities – though technically the city's 14 kilometres (nearly nine miles) of 13 official beaches face the Mediterranean Sea rather than the ocean. From May through mid-October, lifeguards are on duty and you can rent beach chairs and umbrellas, windsurfers, surfboards, sailboats, motorboats and diving equipment.

Dolphinarium Beach is best known for its drumming circles, Capoeira dancers and windsurfers; Gordon and Aviv beaches are great for volleyball; surfing is tops at Hilton Beach, which is also the city's most gay-friendly beach and the only one with a section for dogs. Nordau Beach has separate-swimming hours (females on Sunday, Tuesday and Thursday; males on Monday, Wednesday and Friday; Saturdays mixed).

Four beaches are wheelchair accessible (Hilton, Tzuk, Northern Tzuk, Metzitzim) and you will find matkot players on every beach.

Walk, jog, bike or Segway the seaside promenade:

The bustling Tel Aviv-Jaffa Promenade (Tayelet) is a series of boardwalks extending along the beach between the Jaffa Port in the south to Tel Baruch Beach, north of the Tel Aviv Port. This is your best opportunity for people-watching and snapping selfies against the incomparable backdrop of sea, sand and Mediterranean sunsets. Cafés and restaurants dot the central part of the promenade along Herbert Samuel Street, and there are plenty of benches where you can stop and sit along the way.

If you'd like to do this on wheels, rent a green bike at any of the city's Tel-O-Fun stations or sign up for a Segway beachfront tour if you're at least 16 years old.

See where it all began at Independence Hall, 16 Rothschild Boulevard:

On May 14, 1948, David Ben Gurion read Israel's Declaration of Independence in this building, which has been preserved to look exactly like it did on that day. Take a guided tour to find out all about the dramatic founding of the state of Israel.

Planetarium at Eretz Israel Museum

Discover Old Jaffa:

Part of the Tel Aviv municipality since 1950, the 5,000-year-old port city of Jaffa (Yafo) is where warriors, pilgrims, traders and tourists have historically entered the Holy Land bearing goods, ideas, fashion and stories. The tales of Jaffa are presented in a multimedia way at the Old Jaffa Visitors' Center built on the ruins of a Roman-era Jewish house in Kedumim Square; there's an archeological exhibition underneath.

The visitors' centre is a good place to start your tour of Jaffa, which should also include the world-famous Jaffa Flea Market and Jaffa Port, as well as ancient houses of worship, art galleries, the Wishing Bridge and the Zodiac Fountain. Take the centre's self-guided audio tour or the municipality's free guided walking tour on Wednesdays at 10 a.m., starting at the iconic Jaffa Clock Tower built in 1901, at the intersection of Marzuk and Azar streets.

Get acculturated at the Eretz Israel Museum, 2 Haim Levanon Street:

This multidisciplinary museum is made up of pavilions spread over a vast green campus. You can choose to explore archaeology, Judaica, ethnography, history and culture of the Land of Israel, and traditional arts and crafts, including a glass pavilion. You can also visit the state-of-the-art planetarium and take advantage of seasonal cultural events and youth activities.

The Yarkon park and river

Treat your taste buds at Sarona Market, 3 Kalman Magen St.:

The recently opened Sarona Market complex, Israel's largest indoor culinary marketplace, comprises 8,700 square metres filled with 91 shops, kiosks and restaurants, most open seven days a week. You'll find imported delicacies as well as Israeli fruits and vegetables from Emek Hefer and the Arava, lamb and veal from the Golan Heights, fresh fish from the Mediterranean Sea, local wines and boutique beers, spices, chocolates and handmade pastries.

It's also worthwhile to explore the (not as fancy) outdoor markets for which Tel Aviv is famous, including Shuk HaCarmel, Shuk HaNamal (Port Market), Shuk Levinsky and Shuk Hatikva.

Commune with nature-in-the-city at Yarkon Park (Ganei Yehoshua):

This spectacular urban oasis stretches for hundreds of acres along the Yarkon River and includes myriad activities and attractions including its own huge water park, a 45-foot climbing wall, hot-air balloon ride, basketball and rollerblading courts, playgrounds and trampolines, bike trails and bridges. Rent a paddle boat or a two-wheeler, tandem or family bike. Enjoy wildlife in the bird sanctuary and petting zoo.

Yarkon's 10-acre Rock Garden, one of the largest of its kind in the world, also contains 3,500 species of plants, including some six acres of cacti; the five-acre Tropical Garden features a wooden walkway shaded by towering palm trees around a little lake; and Seven Mills has restored historic flour mills on a stream where ducks and other waterfowl abound.

Hatahana: The New Station leisure and entertainment compound, HaMered and Kaufman streets:

At the southern end of Neve Tzedek is the Jaffa train station, built in 1892 as part of the first railway line between Jaffa and Jerusalem. From the end of World War I to the eve of the War of Independence in 1948, the line was operated by Palestine Railways. The scrupulously restored Templer-style building is the centrepiece of the popular leisure and entertainment complex opened here in 2010. Through 2015, Hatahana is featuring the 3-D 100-year history show "Virtual Time Travel Trailer" in carriage 24.

The parking is shared by the Israel Defence Forces History Museum, one of four military museums across Tel Aviv that you can access with one admission ticket.

Get a handcrafted treasure at Nahalat Binyamin:

Every Tuesday and Friday from 10 a.m. until sundown, crafters display their wares on umbrella-shaded tables along Nahalat Binyamin Street. The Nahalat Binyamin Arts & Crafts Fair was inaugurated by the city in 1987 and is now Israel's largest such fair, with more than 200 artists selected by a public committee. Browse the handcrafted jewelry, ceramics, toys, lampshades, clocks, paintings and Judaica while being entertained by roving performance artists of all kinds. ■

Sleep comfortably on El Al flights to Israel

El Al now offers "bed-like" seating in business class on all their 767's from Toronto to Tel Aviv .

Dinah Kutner, general manager for El Al Canada, said that El Al has responded to customer's requests to be able to sleep even more comfortably than before on the 12-hour non-stop flight to Israel from Toronto.

"This is a very big deal for us, and we certainly anticipate a jump in sales," she said.

David Maimon, El Al CEO, said that "upgrading the seats, and making more space between rows in the premium classes on long-range aircraft is part of our ongoing strategy of improving the product and the overall El Al customer experience. We are continuously striving to provide the most advanced service to our customers."

El Al upgraded the seats to "bed-like" seats and is offering more space between rows. The upgraded aircraft offer 21 Business Class seats.

Business Class Seats are electrically operated with ergonomic support. The expanded pitch is 190.5 centimetres to 193 centimetres.

The seat width is 50.8 centimetres and the "bed-like" seat features sitting, resting and sleep positions, leg support, and ergonomic support

Maimon said that in co-operation with Hollandia, recognized experts in precision-engineered sleep systems, a unique, luxurious mattress was designed for the comfort of premium class passengers. The mattress is made with tempur, a special advanced material used by NASA for upholstering seats on its spaceships.

In other El Al news, we are excited to announce that the signing ceremony has just ended, on Oct. 29, sealing El Al's purchase of new Dreamliner aircraft as part of the company's largest ever renewal program.

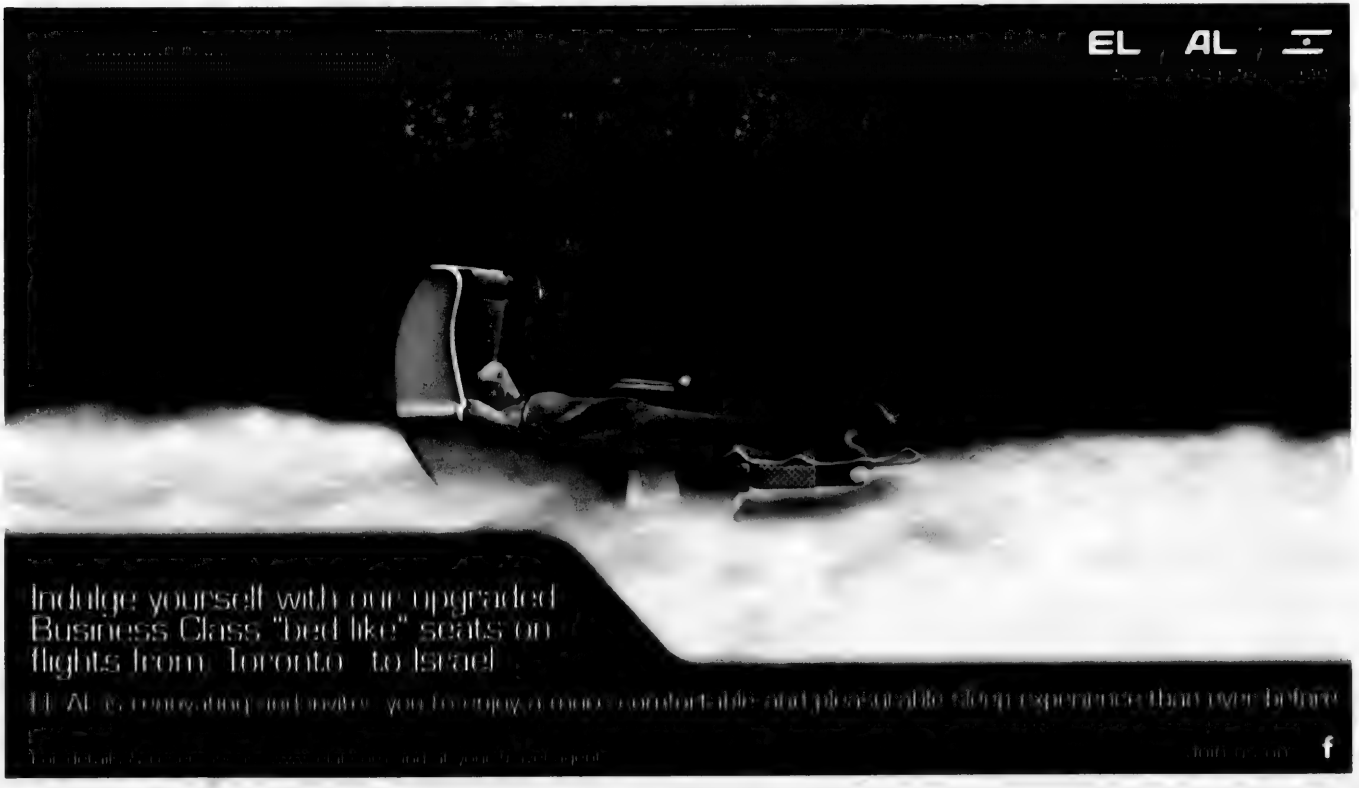
Ray Conner, president and CEO of the Boeing Company's Commercial Airplanes Group arrived in Israel to sign the deal with El Al president David Maimon. The ceremony was held in an El Al hangar at Ben-Gurion Airport in the presence of Israel's minister of transport, Yisrael Katz, U.S. Ambassador to Israel Dan Shapiro, and Rabbi Meir Lau.

El Al expects to renew its fleet with 15 Dreamliners.

Maimon said this move is expected to constitute a significant step forward in the optimization of the network of routes, passenger service and flight experience.

During the next five years, he said, these aircraft will replace the 747-400 and 767 fleets and are designated to fly to medium and long-haul destinations such as Toronto, Boston, Bangkok, Beijing, Mumbai, South Africa and more.

"We shall continue to preserve our position as first choice in flying to and from Israel, and as a leading company offering its customers maximum comfort, technological innovation and quality service. I am convinced that this move is a great opportunity to meet the high standard expected of us and continue the momentum of El Al's innovation." ■



Jewish Life

Book passes the torch of Holocaust memory

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Seventy years after the end of World War II and 25 years after March of the Living (MOL) began bringing Jewish high school students and survivors to European death camps, MOL is employing the latest in 21st-century technology to help tell the story of the Holocaust.

MOL recently launched a handsome coffee table book titled Witness: Passing the Torch of Holocaust Memory to New Generations, which records the testimony of survivors and the reaction of students to the terrible events of the Holocaust. Built into several pages in each copy are digital watermarks that users can scan with a smartphone or tablet and then view video testimony by Holocaust survivors.

The free Digimarc Discover app allows readers to expand their experience of the book by viewing – or witnessing – the recorded first hand testimony of survivors themselves. The videos are provided by Steven Spielberg's USC Shoah Foundation Archives and MOL's Digital Archives Project.

The book itself is a treasure trove of photographs, poetry, commentary and history designed to enlighten a broad audience about the events of the Holocaust. Many of the survivors featured in the book are Canadian, including Nate Leipciger, Max Illand, Sidney Zoltak and Max Eisen. With 7,500 copies in print, there is also interest in translating the work into German, Spanish, French and Hebrew, among other languages, said Eli Rubenstein, national director of MOL Canada, who compiled Witness.

In gathering the content for the book, Rubenstein raided the MOL archives for photos, taken both by professional photographers who were part of the MOL team as well as those taken by participants. He combined them with the poems of the young participants and added sections to provide a historical underpinning to explain the events that led to the murder of Europe's Jews.

Rubenstein believes that the underlying message of the book is a positive one, despite the grisly historic event that is at its core.

"This book is about hope and making the world a better place. It's not about hate or revenge. The aim is to heal," he said.

In addition to survivor testimony, the book includes sections dedicated to Jews who fought back – both physically through force of arms and through spiritual resistance – to liberators and to Righteous Gentiles.

"No one survived unless someone helped them," Rubenstein said.

The book is based on an exhibit that premiered at United Nations headquarters in New York in 2014 under the title, When You Listen to a Witness, You Become a Witness. That exhibit, which is smaller in scale than what can be found in the book, will go on display later this month at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre at the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

In a unique touch, the book opens with a message from Pope Francis, who expresses his support for March of the Living. In that, he was following in the footsteps of Pope John Paul II, who also supported the MOL initiatives of remembrance, Rubenstein said.

Witness was officially launched at Congregation Habonim last month and is on sale at Chapters Indigo and online at Amazon. Negotiations are under way to provide a downloadable version of the book, Rubenstein said. ■

Singer-songwriter on an emotional roller-coaster ride

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Dayna Shereck had never written a song until she turned 35, but after her divorce, when she was finding her way through relationships, she started hearing melodies in her head.

"I got a friend of mine to teach me about four chords on the guitar, and I must have written 12 or 15 songs right away," she said.

Now, five years later, one of her pop songs has been placed in a movie, and several artists, including country singer Marcum Stewart, have included her songs on their albums. She was a finalist in the Great American Song Contest and a semi-finalist in the International Songwriting Competition for 2012, 2013 and 2014.

Although she's more of a songwriter than a vocalist, Shereck sings beautifully on an EP of her alt country tunes that she released this year.

Shereck got her initial break in a difficult industry after she contacted the Songwriters Association of Canada. The organization hooked her up with a multi-platinum producer, Marcus Kane, who recognized her talent, and her first demo, Faultlines, was born.

Over the past five years, Shereck, who lives in Toronto, has made some 10 trips to Nashville to write and record. Her first taste of success in Nashville came when she co-wrote All I Really Want Is You with Stewart. The song was demoed and pitched to a major country artist later that same week.

"That was the first thing that made me feel, I'm here and it's really happening," she said.

Thousands of artists are in Nashville pitching songs, writing and performing at any one time, and Shereck said the "nature of the business often dictates whether a song is cut by an artist." But she added that some people say the best songs do win in the end.

"When you're in Nashville, you're aware of the business, what they're looking for, and you can end up writing for the market. The commercial market is not where I target my stuff," she said. She's had a major label "hold," comparable to a reservation, placed on one of her songs, she said, but it didn't make it onto the artist's recording.

"So it's an emotional roller-coaster," she added. But the highs, when they happen, are exhilarating. The pop tune, Whadaya Say, which Shereck wrote with two co-writers, is a featured song in the 2015 movie On the Wing. It's been shown at several U.S. film festivals and took the Best Feature Award at the seventh annual Louisville International Festival of Film last month.

Whadaya Say is hopeful and romantic, Shereck said, adding that she usually writes "heavier, sadder stuff," like some of the songs on her EP, Suitcase Full of Dreams. The five-song EP, which she co-wrote with other songwriters, has a traditional country/bluegrass sound. It includes the track Think Again, a song about the fragility of love. I Didn't Chase All the Good Ones Away is a catchy tune about female empowerment, about valuing "yourself and hopefully one of the good ones will be there when you find yourself in that place," Shereck said. Shereck is again on her way to Nashville to pursue her dreams. "This time it's mostly about writing with people who I have already started things with, finishing songs that were in progress and writing new ones," she said.

Shereck, a mother of two, David, 11, and Olivia, 13, also works for a not-for-profit agency, helping people with barriers to employment find jobs. "I've always encouraged people to follow their dreams and that's what I'm doing now," Shereck said. ■

For more information about Shereck, visit www.songsbydayna.com and check out her blog at http://nashville-diaries.blogspot.ca. Suitcase Full of Dreams is available for download on iTunes.

Nathan Fielder is the mensch Canada needs

Michael Fraiman

Canadian Jewish comic Nathan Fielder took to Conan O'Brien's talk show on Oct. 21 to reveal his latest business venture: a line of outerwear that is soft, durable, breathable and completely open in its acknowledgment that the Holocaust did indeed happen.

Fielder, a Vancouver native, had been wearing a windbreaker made by Taiga, a B.C. brand, for much of his life. Then he learned that a 2001 Taiga shopping catalogue included an obituary for a known Holocaust denier.

"As a Jew, I'm like, 'Oh, crap,'" Fielder told O'Brien on TV. "In searching for a replacement, I realized I couldn't be sure that any of these other jacket companies weren't hiding dark secrets as well." To play it safe, he decided to start his own.

And so was born Summit Ice, the world's first outdoor apparel company to openly promote Holocaust awareness. All proceeds have been going to the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre – so far, that's been more than $60,000 – promoted in part by celebrities wearing the jacket around Hollywood, including Seth Rogan, Ellie Kemper, Joseph Gordon-Levitt, Rob Lowe, John Mayer and Jack Black.

By any measure, Fielder is not just a solid businessman and hilarious comic – he's also a mensch. Best of all, Canadians can be proud that he's our mensch.

That Fielder is sending Summit Ice's profits to a Vancouver Holocaust centre is a sigh of relief for Canadians sick of homegrown talent moving south and forgetting their roots. How can we still call Jim Carrey a Canadian when he's entrenched in American debates over measles vaccination and gun-control laws? Why should we keep fawning over Lorne Michaels when New York gave him Saturday Night Live, while the only thing Toronto gave him was a brief writing gig at CBC Radio?

On the surface, Fielder isn't any different. Like everyone else who outgrew this country, he moved on from a recurring domestic role – on This Hour Has 22 Minutes – to starring in his own Comedy Central show, Nathan For You.

The show follows Fielder around as he tries to help struggling businesses with plainly ridiculous ideas. It's a perfect set-up: Fielder's still so unknown and innocently straight-faced that his subtle improv echoes the genius of Stephen Colbert, Andy Kaufman and Sacha Baron Cohen.

But it wasn't until his Dumb Starbucks gag – wherein he tried to boost the popularity of a small, independent Los Angeles café by transforming it into a Starbucks parody, merely by mimicking everything about the gargantuan chain but preceding it with the word "dumb" (e.g. dumb venti lattes, dumb Norah Jones CDs, etc.) – that two things became clear.

One was that he was now a comedy superstar, as Dumb Starbucks exploded into an international sensation.

The second thing was that he had clearly outgrown Canada. He could never have created a pseudo-art installation like Dumb Starbucks here; our copyright laws are too strict, and our national sense of humour not quite so brazen. We're more reserved, much like Fielder's own onscreen persona.

So it was all the more refreshing to hear that he was maintaining that connection to his home city – and his Judaism – with Summit Ice. Fielder's still not as big a star as, say, Seth Rogen (the two were in the same high school improv class), so maybe that accounts for some lingering Canadian affinity. He's big, but he isn't so big that he's forgotten us yet.

But it may also be because Fielder is himself a quiet, sentimental man. He's notoriously secretive about his personal life, largely deemed a blank slate – a dead-eyed host who rarely smiles and keeps his show about his guests, not himself.

In a rare interview, he revealed that his TV character is an embellishment of his own nervous self, and his comedy derives from a very Canadian quality – people being too afraid to speak their minds.

But Fielder, onscreen, speaks his mind. He's shed that overly polite Canadian stereotype, but he hasn't forgotten his roots. The man, I say, is a true Canadian mensch. ■

Village Shul aims to prove Jewish men can jump

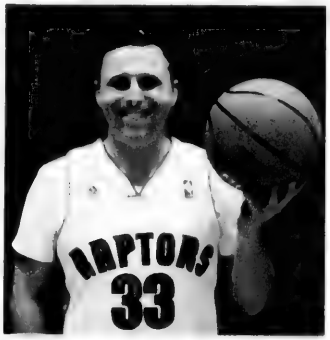
PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

If you're active around the rim, a baller who can dish it or drain a three-pointer, the Village Shul wants you.

The synagogue, located on Eglinton Avenue, is looking for 125 to 150 guys, to participate in its inaugural Toronto Jewish Men's 3-on-3 Basketball Tournament.

The event will take place on Tuesday, Dec. 1 from 6-10 p.m. at Hoopdome in Downsview Park. Its target is to raise $7,500 or more, but its goal is bigger than that, said tournament organizer Mike Fegelman.

"I'm really excited about getting people out regardless of religious background," he said. Shuls from across the city of Toronto and across the denominational spectrum have been contacted and asked to participate. It is the Village Shul's mandate to bring people together and support community engagement. Basketball is a perfect means to attract people for a fun event that will include sports, socializing and shmoozing, he said.



Mike Fegelman

A touch football event in June attracted about 100 players and raised $10,000 to support the synagogue's operating costs.

"It was phenomenal. What I loved about it was that it was a great opportunity to bring out Jews from all walks of life – young professionals to the older demographic," Fegelman said.

Funds for the hoops tourney will be raised from the $54 per person entry fee as well as from corporate sponsorship. Howie T's Burger Bar will provide the food and is the corporate sponsor. Tax receipts will be issued, he added.

In addition to the football game, held at nearby Cedarvale Park, the Village Shul has also sponsored a ladies' retreat at a private home in Forest Hill that included swimming, socializing and sushi, he said.

Also on the shul's agenda is a pool tournament some time in the new year, Fegelman added. ■

Fauda explores both sides of Israeli-Palestinian conflict

Israeli TV show will be screened by Toronto Jewish Film Festival in three sittings

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Israeli television has been seriously good for a while now, as anyone who's followed the trajectory of homegrown Israeli dramas like Hatufim, successfully adapted a year after its 2010 release to the critically-acclaimed American variation, Homeland, can attest.

North American viewers should therefore be taking note of the latest political thriller to make serious waves in Israel, both for its high quality and unique subject matter.

Fauda, which Torontonians will have a chance to watch over the course of three screenings – the first held Nov. 15 – at Innis Town Hall and presented by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival in partnership with the Anne Tanenbaum Centre for Jewish Studies, is being hailed as the first Israeli drama to explore both the Israeli and Palestinian experience of the regional conflict.

Written and developed by Lior Raz (who also plays the show's protagonist, Doron) and Avi Issacharoff, Fauda, which premiered in Israel in February, is about an elite, undercover counter-terrorist unit in the Israel Defence Forces that frequently poses as Arabs and undertakes covert military operations in the West Bank.

Immersed in Arabic and Palestinian culture and mores, the team, which the premiere season's 12 episodes are centred on, endeavours to find and kill the seemingly indomitable Hamas terrorist, Abu Ahmad, or "the Panther," played by Palestinian Israeli actor Hisham Suliman.

Specifically, the focus falls on the team's commander, Doron, who has been wooed back to the unit, largely by his own demons, from a brief foray into civilian life.

The show follows as he forgoes the fragile domestic life he's built and devotes all he has to trying to defeat Abu Ahmad, the man it was widely believe he'd killed 18 months prior.

What's most compelling about Fauda (which translates, in Arabic, to "chaos") is that the personal challenges and tragedies of Doron and the men in his unit – who are, not surprisingly, revealed to be far more entwined in their various dramas and betrayals than first meets the eye – are shown alongside those of Abu Ahmad and his tight-knit network of family, supporters and friends.

While frankly it seems bizarre, not to mention long-overdue, that an Israeli program hasn't until now showcased the other side of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Fauda has been lauded for its extensive use of Arabic (the show is fairly evenly split where Hebrew and Arabic language are concerned) and portrayal of Hamas operatives, and their families as complex and, often, compassionate human beings coping with their own internal struggles and desires to protect those they love.

Though overall it still skews towards emphasizing the Israeli characters' lives in greater detail – and with greater nuance – a number of the Palestinian characters are finely drawn and deeply empathetic.

Lior Raz plays the show's protagonist.

Abu Ahmad's sister-in-law, for example, who watches while her new husband is gunned down before her eyes in the midst of their wedding celebration, is extremely sympathetic to behold as she transforms from a hopeful and eminently vital young woman in love to one overtaken by anger, hopelessness and grief.

The violent actions she subsequently takes are depicted more than anything as heartrending, as opposed to enraging.

Then there's Shirin, the Palestinian doctor and cousin of Abu Ahmad's right hand man, who is unwittingly drawn into the web of duplicity and violence as, beneath the double-dealing, a kernel of authentic connection is forged between her and Doron.

Even Abu Ahmad himself is positioned, in many ways, in a sympathetic light, the fierce love he has for his family frequently highlighted.

A scene wherein he and his wife – who his underground life has long kept him separate from – are reunited, is affecting to some extent although here the script would have benefited from some stronger, more imaginative writing and greater depth.

Ultimately, Fauda delivers insofar as, in many ways, it exposes the fluidity and the fissures of the boundaries, both physical and social, that have been erected between Palestinians and Israelis: Doron's unit simply need put on different clothes and switch to Arabic and they are taken for Palestinians.

The reverse is shown when a Palestinian character takes her hair down, dons a pair of tight jeans and easily passes as an Israeli woman in a Tel Aviv bar.

In this way, Fauda makes sure the tragic irony of two peoples who are at once wretchedly divided and closely related, is keenly felt, regardless of one's politics. ■

Local authors featured at Jewish Book Festival

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Gail Benick

Alison Pick

Keeping in sync with some 300 Jewish community centres across North America that have designated November as Jewish Book Month, Toronto's Prosserman JCC and the Schwartz/Reisman Centre in Vaughan are presenting the third annual Jewish Book Festival, Nov. 15 to 29.

Thirteen newly published books are being celebrated at both locations in 15 days. What evidently makes the Toronto-area festival unique is the preponderance of local authors being highlighted, such as Alison Pick, whose rousing, high-profile memoir Between Gods won a Canadian Jewish Literary Award last month.

Several other of the local authors have also written on the Holocaust, a theme that was all but ignored for the first two decades of the postwar era but has increasingly come to dominate Jewish literary culture ever since.

Mordechai Ronen, a Holocaust survivor and veteran of the Israel Defence Forces discusses his memoir, I Am a Victor, co-written with Steve Paikin of TVO's The Agenda.

Also, Eli Rubenstein, director of March of the Living Canada, makes a presentation on his book Witness: Passing the Torch of Holocaust Memory to New Generations; (see page 44) and Gail Benick discusses The Girl Who Was Born That Way, a book about a Jewish family that tried to bury its Holocaust past.

Toronto-based television news correspondent Martin Fletcher makes a return visit to the festival to discuss The War Reporter, a book about his journalistic experiences in Sarajevo, Bosnia and Serbia; and Torontonian Isme Bennie recounts the experience of growing up Jewish in South Africa in White Schooldays: Coming of Age in Apartheid South Africa.

Festival director Gustavo Rymberg and committee chair Sara Dobner worked for six months to organize the festival, which also features book sales and involves partnerships with various community organizations and retirement homes.

"We started working on this in May," Rymberg said. "We attended the conference of the Jewish Book Council in New York and we met with 254 new authors. It was a good opportunity to meet them and to decide if their books would be of interest to our community."

The festival opens with a presentation by Joshua Muravchik on his book Making David into Goliath: How the World Turned Against Israel, which traces the trends that shaped world opinion on Israel from 1967 to today and the new paradigm of leftist orthodoxy that turned the table against Israel. (Schwartz/Reisman, Nov. 15, 10 a.m.)

Other authors and books being celebrated are: Katja Goldman and Lisa Rotmil and their cooking book The Community Table; Leah Lax's book Uncovered, How I Left Hasidic Life and Finally Came Home; Robin Berman's Permission to Parent, How to Raise Your Child with Love and Limits; and Jessamyn Hope's novel Safekeeping.

There are two free events for kids: Laura Gehl presents her children's book Hare and Tortoise Race Across Israel; and Anna Levine presents Jodie's Shabbat Surprise, about a dog that stumbles upon an archeological find near Jerusalem.

The Ventanas Trio performs a free closing concert featuring an energetic fusion of flamenco, Sephardic, North African, Balkan, Turkish and Greek influences. (Schwartz/Reisman Center, Nov. 29, 7 p.m.)

Tickets for paid events are $5. The festival schedule is accessible via its website, http://welcome.srcentre.ca/books/ ■

Isolation and loneliness inherent in late filmmaker's work

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When Belgian filmmaker Chantal Akerman was 24, she wrote and directed an ambitious, nearly 3-1/2-hour film. It had an unruly title: Jeanne Dielman, 23, quai du Commerce, 1080 Bruxelles. The drama focused on the long, dull, monotonous days of a bored French housekeeper, played by Delphine Seyrig.

The response to Jeanne Dielman was polarized. The long takes, slow pace and repetitive plotting inflamed audiences. Critics, on the other hand, championed the drama. The Village Voice would later name it one of the 20 best films of the 20th century.

Today, many film schools would be incomplete without showing Jeanne Dielman, or another of the director's films. Akerman's work is challenging to watch, often filled with languid plotting and ambiguous characters, but it is always thematically rich. Many of the stories focus on people, both real and fictional, living in exile.

That isolation and loneliness inherent to many of her best films is especially bitter to recall in the wake of Akerman's death on Oct. 5. She died of a suicide at the age of 65. It was less than a month after her final film, No Home Movie, premiered at the Toronto film festival.

No Home Movie will also screen at this year's Montreal International Documentary Festival (RIDM). With Akerman's death still lingering in the minds of film fans, RIDM organizers are paying tribute to the late filmmaker.

Chantal Akerman COURTESY RIDM

> Today, many film schools would be incomplete without showing Jeanne Dielman

Alongside Akerman's final film, the festival will also have the North American premiere of I Don't Belong Anywhere, a biographical film of the late Jewish filmmaker.

RIDM organizers had already planned to show these titles before her sudden death, says festival programmer Bruno Dequen.

"We were working on having Chantal come to Montreal," he says. "We knew maybe mid-summer... that there were troubles in her life. We couldn't talk about it."

I Don't Belong Anywhere, directed by Marianne Lambert, plays in Montreal on Nov. 18 and 19. Akerman's still-topical 2002 documentary From the Other Side, about Mexican migrants crossing the U.S. border, will screen Nov. 14.

Meanwhile, No Home Movie (screening on Nov. 15 and 20) is one of the filmmaker's only works to deal with aspects of her Jewish identity. (The title No Home Movie has a double meaning, also referring to how the filmmaker felt like she had no home at all.)

The doc is a portrait of the last months in the life of Akerman's mother, Nelly, a Polish Jew who was a survivor of Auschwitz and later suffered from chronic anxiety. (Akerman's father also survived the Holocaust.)

In the documentary, Akerman tries to find out more about her mother's harrowing experiences, knowing that time is fleeting.

"It's never in your face in Akerman's work," Dequen says of the filmmaker's Judaism. "[No Home Movie] might be the first time ever that she's really trying to ask those questions. Her mom is not the most talkative person... but Akerman keeps asking those questions."

Akerman's thorny relationship with her mother is a key facet in her early films. The 1977 doc News From Home consists of letters Nelly wrote to her daughter when Akerman moved to New York, recited via voice-over.

"They don't really talk all that much, but you can feel that she's always thinking about her mom," Dequen says of that relationship in No Home Movie, although the statement could also apply to News From Home.

Meanwhile, the passive mother (and title character) of Jeanne Dielman was considered to be a representation of Nelly – a creative decision the director later admitted was ungrateful on her part.

With her unconventional techniques and explorations of lesbian and feminist themes, Akerman's work has influenced countless artists and filmmakers. Directors like Claire Denis, Gus van Sant and Todd Haynes all wrote eulogies in the wake of her death in October.

Still, Akerman's films continue to find an audience. Besides the tribute at RIDM and the new documentary, a retrospective of her work recently played at the Institute of Contemporary Arts in London.

That's not bad for a filmmaker whose works elicited boos from film festival crowds 40 years ago. Regardless, the screenings at RIDM are guaranteed to get rousing applause, in memory of one daring, powerful, singular artist. ■

Women are central characters in book on Bible stories

MARTIN LOCKSHIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Like it or not, the Bible is a male book. The authors of the biblical books were most likely men. The expected audience is male, too. For example, as Prof. Judith Plaskow once pointed out, when Moses turns to "the people" just before the giving of the Torah, and instructs them "Do not go near a woman" (Exodus 19:15), obviously "the people" he is addressing are the men.

Michal Lemberger, who has taught the Bible as literature at several American universities, contributes to the growing number of women-friendly versions of biblical stories with her first book, After Abel and Other Stories.

Each story has a biblical woman at its centre, sometimes a famous woman like Eve or Miriam, at other times less well-known characters, such as Zeresh (Haman's wife) or Peninah (more on her below). Sometimes the stories are written in the voice of a biblical woman, but even when they are not, they centre on a woman or women. In The Watery Season, Hagar is the central character, and our matriarch, Sarah, is referred to only as "her mistress." Abraham is simply "the old man," a bold twist on the Bible's habit of omitting the names of women characters.

Some of the stories explore the marriage of a man to two wives, one who is beloved while the other produces babies. This type of ancient ménage à trois interested the classical rabbis, too; they portrayed it disparagingly as a sign of a corrupt society. (See for example Rashi's commentary to Genesis 4:19.) Lemberger's chapter "Shiloh" rewrites the biblical story of the marriage of Elkanah to both Hannah and Peninah.

In the biblical account (I Samuel 1-2), Elkanah's wife Peninah had many children while Hannah was barren. Elkanah "loved" or preferred Hannah. Hannah, however, was not satisfied with this role; she wanted to be a mother. She prayed to God for a child and vowed that she would return the child to God if her prayer was fulfilled. Her prayer was answered with the birth of her son, Samuel. She took care of him until he weaned and then handed him over to the care of Eli, the head of the shrine in Shiloh. God rewarded Hannah and she subsequently gave birth to three more sons and two daughters. Meanwhile, Samuel grew up in Shiloh, took over from Eli, and became a venerated leader of Israel.

In Lemberger's version, told in the voice of Peninah (who never speaks in the Bible), a very different story emerges. Peninah had grown up in a polygamous home where the wives got along and worked happily together. When she was told that she was to become the second wife in the home of the childless Hannah and Elkanah, she was hopeful that she would also find sorority with her co-wife, but she was roundly disappointed. Beautiful Hannah and Elkanah had what appeared to be a deeply caring relationship, while plain Jane Peninah was the lonely "breeder," who produced children for Elkanah but could establish no deep relationship with him and even less so with Hannah. In this story too, Hannah eventually gives birth to a son to whom she is, not surprisingly, extremely devoted. But Elkanah is unhappy about having to share Hannah's affection with their son and the baby's life appears in danger. Hannah hands her son over to the care of the authorities in Shiloh to ensure his safety and to save her marriage.

Lemberger's Elkanah is a narcissistic, moody, inconsiderate male and, in fact, hardly any of the men in the book are positive characters. The exception is Palti ben Laish, to whom the Bible dedicates three verses (I Samuel 25:44 and II Samuel 3:15-16). In the Bible, he never speaks, but Lemberger gives his story a 50-page chapter, much of it in his voice. In another telling contrast with the original, Lemberger omits Hannah's devotion to God, and indeed removes the divine from most of the stories.

After Abel and Other Stories, by Michal Lemberger

(Prospect Park Books)

> This book is not Bible commentary. Reading it will not give readers new insights into the Bible stories.

This book is not Bible commentary. Reading it will not give readers new insights into the Bible stories. Can it be called midrash? Dara Horn, a popular author who is quoted on the book's website, thinks so: "This is a beautiful book of modern midrash – the ancient Jewish tradition of telling the stories between the Hebrew Bible's lines." A reviewer in Lilith magazine goes further: "Calling the biblically themed stories in the new collection by Michal Lemberger midrashim is like calling champagne a carbonated beverage." Actually, calling the stories in this book midrashim is like calling a bicycle a carbonated beverage.

While midrashim may considerably expand a biblical story, often surprising us by reading so much between the lines that we hardly recognize the story, they never erase central parts of biblical stories. When Lemberger's Sodom goes up in flames without divine involvement, the story cannot qualify as midrash.

Yet the book is riveting and well-written. It's a collection of riffs on the Bible that will be enjoyable for those who know their Bible, who are sympathetic to women's perspectives, and who are willing to look beyond the desacralizing liberties taken by the author in order to savour the unusual experience of seeing ancient women at the centre of the action. ■

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Documentarian Danae Elon has a very complicated relationship with Israel. She has fond memories of her childhood in Jerusalem. When away from the country, she misses the vast desert just outside of the city. At the same time, she disagrees with many of the policies of the Israeli government, believing their actions do not represent her Jewish values.

"I was, like many Israelis, suffocated in my own environment," she says of her adolescence there.

At 20, after completing her army service, Elon left Israel for film school at New York University. Regardless, the creative path she walked along only led her back to Jerusalem.

Her newest film, P.S. Jerusalem, chronicles a more than three-year period when Elon moved back to the Holy City, with her husband, two sons and a baby on the way.

P.S. Jerusalem chronicles more than three years. COURTESY OF TIFF

After bids in Haifa, southern Israel and Toronto, P.S. Jerusalem will screen at the Montreal International Documentary Festival (RIDM) on Nov. 17 and 21. Elon, who now lives with her family in Montreal, will be in attendance.

Throughout the doc, Elon points her camera at her eldest boy, Tristan. In Jerusalem, he attended the bilingual Hand in Hand school, where Jewish and Arab children study together.

In P.S. Jerusalem, Tristan groans when his mother points her camera his way. Nevertheless, many of his responses to things such as learning Arabic and pondering over whether or not he is Jewish are spontaneous and fascinating to watch.

"I want my kids to have an identity that is clear," Elon tells The CJN, "and be able to understand their sense of history, of who they are and where they come from."

While the film features the director asking Tristan and younger brother Andrei a lot of questions, she hoped the experience would provide answers to the things her children would ask her.

In one scene, Tristan learns about the "Nakba," the displacement of Palestinians in 1948. Elon narrates that nobody spoke about that when she was a student.

Elon says the decision to film her sons was not easy, and this caused some tension between the family members.

"You basically have to speak to them in a certain way so they understand you as a person and as a mom, and then ultimately you will manage to extract the information [you want]," she says.

"Just ask the questions so they can be curious. [Tristan] doesn't know what Israel and Palestine is. But he does know that his friend from school lives very far in the desert."

The director's move back to Israel went against the wishes of her father, outspoken Israeli writer Amos Elon, who died in 2009. Amos moved away from Jerusalem with his wife in 2004 to live the rest of his days in Italy.

Amos pleaded with his daughter not to return. However, Elon says she never quite felt at home anywhere else.

Growing up with a distinguished author in her home, as well as one that frequently criticized Israel, meant that Elon was exposed to a multitude of political opinions.

"My father was a very inquisitive man," she says. "We were always on. We always had to think about what we were saying and why we were saying it."

Elon's third child, born in Jerusalem a few months after the family's arrival, was named Amos, in his late grandfather's honour.

P.S. Jerusalem explores Israel in its many moods, from peaceful Memorial Day ceremonies to encounters with xenophobic men on the city streets.

The doc was filmed with a Canadian crew, under the supervision of Montreal producer Paul Cadieux. Elon credits the extra Canadian funding as a vital factor in making her film. She is now working with Cadieux on another Jerusalem-set doc.

Elon says she is intrigued about speaking with the audience after the RIDM screenings. The film already stirred up some controversy in Toronto, when some criticized the film for being too pro-Palestinian. In comparison, she says that festival audiences in Israel were more receptive.

The director says that people who attack her film for its politics miss the point.

"We should be able to look at stories and... see films, and not judge them on political terms," Elon says. "I think you can actually experience it profoundly, even if you don't agree with it politically." ■

When life hands you lemons

SUE EPSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The son-in-law of one of my good friends is a lemon farmer here in Israel, and I have often been lucky enough to be the recipient of large quantities of lemons. So what do I do with all those lemons? I zest and juice them and freeze the juice in one-cup portions in small freezer bags. I also keep one or two whole lemons in the freezer to grate over chicken dishes or salads.

To make lemon zest, simply grind up the coloured portion of a lemon peel or thinly slice it using a sharp knife or a peeler. Be sure to avoid the white pith underside, which is bitter and will give whatever food it's added to an unpleasant aftertaste. If you're having trouble peeling the rind or plan to make a lot of lemon zest, you can pick up a tool called a zester to help.

Picking good lemons isn't hard. They should be bright yellow in colour, firm to the touch, smooth and heavier than you might expect considering their size. (Chilling lemons makes them harder to juice and zest, but you can roll one back and forth with your palm on the counter, as you would a rolling pin, or pop it into the microwave for a few seconds to release the juice and soften the rind, making it easier to squeeze.)

Aside from the usual lemon pie, lemon squares, lemonade, etc., lemons are the key flavouring in countless recipes, and are almost as indispensable as salt for seasoning and enhancing dishes. Sometimes I'm asked what is in a dish that I've made – a delicious taste that they can't quite put their finger on. It's very often lemon. Adding lemon juice or zest can change the flavour and add extra zing to a dish.

Here are some excellent ways to use lemons:

• When cooking fish or chicken, place slices of lemon under it in the pan. It will add flavour and keep the fish or chicken from sticking.

• Replace vinegar with lemon juice in your home-made salad dressings (usually 3 tbsp. of lemon juice to 1 tbsp. of oil).

• Use lemon juice to marinate meat, poultry and fish. Use anywhere from 1 tbsp. to 1/4 cup lemon juice for marinades, depending on how much meat you use, how tender you want it to be, and how strong you want the lemon flavour to be. Allow poultry to marinate for 30 minutes to about four or five hours. Chicken is less dense than beef and it can usually pick up flavour within the first 30 minutes to an hour. Do not marinate fish any longer than 60 minutes.

• Serve fluffier rice by adding lemon juice to the water as it cooks. Boil the rice in water and squeeze in 1 tsp. to 3 tbsp. of lemon juice. If you want the fluffiness lemon juice provides while minimizing the amount of lemon taste that comes through, stick with 1 tsp. of juice.

• Add lemon juice in toward the end of the cooking process to prevent loss of flavour.

• Add a drop of lemon juice to your ice cube trays. Halve a fresh lemon, then squeeze it into the water when you refill your ice cube trays. A few hours later, you'll have the perfect addition to any cool drink.

• Squeeze into soups, sauces, drinks. Bake into cakes, muffins and add to anything that contains mayonnaise.

Lemon-pistachio Israeli couscous

Based on a recipe by David Lebovitz, this is a delicious and unusual side dish.

- 1 lemon, fresh or preferably preserved
- 1/2 cup chopped, fresh flat-leaf parsley
- 2 tbsp. salted or unsalted butter, at room temperature
- 1/2 cup diced dried fruit (any combination of cherries, cranberries, apricots, prunes or raisins)
- 1/2 cup unsalted (shelled) pistachios, very coarsely chopped (almost whole)
- 3/4 tsp. sea salt or kosher salt
- 1/4 tsp. ground cinnamon
- 1 1/4 cups Israeli couscous or another small round pasta

Finely dice the lemon and discard seeds. Place in a bowl along with the parsley, butter, dried fruit, pistachios, salt and cinnamon.

Bring a pot of salted water to a boil over high heat. Add the couscous and cook according to the package instructions. Drain and add it to the bowl of fruits and nuts, stirring until the butter is melted and all the ingredients are well mixed. Season with black pepper and serve. Makes 4-6 servings. ■

There are no faint hearts in Fort Worth, Texas

MICHAEL STAVSKY
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

It's only 10:30 a.m. and the thermometer reads 40 C. Standing in the shade of a tall tree provides minimal relief on this cloudless morning. Several large fans blessedly blow mist nearby, ever so slightly taking the edge off the heat.

While downing countless water bottles, my family and I stand alongside a cobblestone street in Fort Worth, Texas, as the crowd begins to build around us. Lined up along the sides of East Exchange Street, people of all ages and backgrounds come to the Fort Worth Stockyards to watch the Fort Worth cattle drive. This vestige of the Old West repeats itself twice daily, much as it has for over a century.

With cameras and phones at the ready, several hundred people have come to witness the spectacle, oblivious to the scorching heat. At promptly 11 a.m., we're ushered onto the curb by Fort Worth police in 10-gallon cowboy hats, who warn us not to walk out in the street.

Within a few minutes, the crack of whips travelling faster than Mach One can be heard nearby. Ever so slowly, the herd is arriving.

Marching down the street, some 20 steer stay together. These half-ton Texas longhorns are an impressive sight, with sets of horns measuring nearly seven feet across. Responding to commands from cowboys and their whips, the herd passes by and is led back to the holding pen for their march later in the day.

This scene epitomizes Fort Worth. Very appropriately nicknamed Cowtown, the Old West depicted in movies and television shows of yesteryear lives on here. From the downtown mural depicting the legendary Chisholm Trail to circa 1908 Cowtown Coliseum, Fort Worth relishes its historic past.

When visiting Fort Worth, you might expect the city's residents to ride horses and use spittoons. While Old West culture is cherished, the city has embraced modernity without losing its identity. Tree lined streets complement the modern downtown area with remarkable beauty. And while comparisons with nearby Dallas are inevitable, Fort Worth has a solid edge in history and overall appeal.

Endless western wear clothing stores line the streets, some with very high-end designer apparel. The ubiquitous souped up pickup trucks roar along Houston Street every night, oblivious to the racket that can be heard for blocks away. Residents just take it in stride. Chances are they have a loved one that drives a Ford F-150 or the coveted Dodge Ram Texas Edition.

Approaching someone on the street for directions, you're likely to receive a suspicious glare followed by "Can I help you?" in a deep Texas drawl. In a place that flies its state flag from every possible corner, and school children recite the pledge of allegiance to the flag of Texas every morning, initial suspicion of outsiders is hardly surprising.

What we found, was, initial greetings aside, Texans quickly warm to visitors with genuine southern hospitality.

Our visit included a stay at the Hilton Fort Worth. Formerly known as the Hotel Fort Worth, it was here that former U.S. president John F. Kennedy spent his final night, prior to his assassination in nearby Dallas the following day. During a speech given in front of the hotel that rainy morning in November 1963, Kennedy remarked "There are no faint hearts in Fort Worth." A statue of Kennedy and memorial to his legacy stand in the spot where he stood that morning.

Visiting Billy Bob's Texas – the World's Largest Honky Tonk is a surprising amount of fun. Occupying several buildings adjacent to the historic Stockyards, Billy Bob's offers mechanical bull riding, endless pool tables, arcade games and is even a concert venue. Country music acts regard playing at Billy Bob's as akin to playing the Grand Ole Opry. Dozens of country music stars have lent handprint moulds that grace the walls of the entrance area.

Of course, being the gateway to the Old West means that Fort Worth has a legendary rodeo. Every week, cowboys from all over North America descend on the Coliseum to compete in bull riding and steer roping competitions. The competitive nature of these events, along with cash prizes, entices participants to lay it all on the line while risking life and limb. These daredevils are often carried out with broken bones while seeking their eight seconds of fame.

Fans that appreciate a little less excitement will enjoy Pawnee Bill's Wild West Show. With its roots in Wild Bill Hickok's show of the same name that toured North America and Europe over a century ago, Pawnee Bill delights fans with shooting competitions, horseback riding and lassoing events.

With much to experience, Fort Worth offers a rare glimpse into a past that's very much alive in the hearts of many Americans. ■

Michael Stavsky acknowledges the assistance of the Fort Worth Convention and Visitor's Bureau in arranging his family's trip to Fort Worth.

SENIOR SIDE OF LIFE

The role of the substitute decision-maker

Dr. Michael Gordon

It is a recurring theme: A family member, usually one of the children assigned by the parent as the substitute decision-maker (SDM), appears to the professional staff to be "taking over" decisions in a way contrary to the patient's wishes as currently or previously expressed.

An example is a patient with a serious stroke, the latest in a series of them, who has a feeding tube inserted by her SDM children. After the event, a clearly written advance directive or "living will" is found, and it stated clearly that she would not want a permanent artificial feeding tube. Despite that clear directive, the family manages through legal means to keep the feeding tube in place: an apparent contradiction between the parent's expressed wishes and their belief systems.

A more common scenario is seen when a frail elderly person is admitted to a rehabilitation unit following a fall that led to a fracture or after a severe, potentially life-threatening medical illness and the family feels that he or she needs a "more protected" environment. With that in mind, they take it upon themselves to seek arrangements to have a parent admitted to a protected living environment, without necessarily consulting the parent.

If the parent is apprised of the proposed plans and refuses to co-operate, the SDM may forge ahead, trying to make the plans despite the parent's refusal. If a member of staff explains to the SDMs that they cannot make such plans without the parent's consent, the SDMs may accuse the health-care professional of acting un-professionally and may use terms such as: "I am the SDM and therefore I am in charge of decision-making."

They may use terms such as: "I have to protect my mother, and the fact that she objects should not matter as I am now in charge."

What many SDMs do not realize, even when it's explained to them, is that being an SDM only comes into effect when the person they are appointed to act for is deemed to be "incompetent" or incapable of making such a decision. For that to be determined, there is usually a need for some sort of clinically relevant evaluation by a physician knowledgeable in the field of mental and cognitive function who is in a position to certify that the person in question is not capable of a particular level of decision-making.

> Make sure you know the wishes of your family member and act accordingly

The current approach is no longer one of universal incapacity, but rather capacity for specific types of decisions. For example, people may not be able to direct their stock portfolio because they no longer "understand and appreciate" the implications and consequences of their decisions (the legal definition) but can decide what they want to eat for breakfast.

The law (in Ontario, the Health-Care Consent Act) provides the rules for who can make decisions, and when an SDM can do so, and also defines the basis of such decisions: previously expressed wishes or preferences if known, or best interests if the patient's previously held beliefs or wishes are unknown.

What the SDM has, in fact, is not the "right" to make the decision, but the "right" to fulfil his or her duty as an SDM – to act according to the law and the expressed wishes or best interests of the patient – not as often erroneously believed, the wishes or beliefs of the SDM, no matter how strong.

For those responsible for health-care decisions, when SDMs do not seem to be following their mandate under the law, one option is to apply for a Consent and Capacity Board hearing in which one result could be the removal of the SDM from that role and the assignment to another suitable and eligible person or the Public Guardian and Trustee.

The message for families is: make sure you know the wishes of your family member and act accordingly, no matter how hard that may be – it is their right and your duty. ■

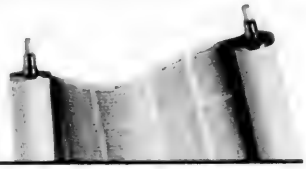
Toldot | Genesis 25:19-28:9



Yacov Fruchter explains why kids learn more from their peers than from their teachers
Rabbi Shalom Spira investigates the historical status of prenuptial agreements in Jewish law
Rachael Turkienicz says if we ask God for meaning, we must be prepared to deal with the answer

Yacov Fruchter

"I have learned much from my teachers, and from my friends more than from my teachers." (Ta'anit 7a)

We recently discussed the above text as part of a beit midrash program at Robbins Hebrew Academy where the students explore Jewish texts in a chevrutah (small groups). The 40 grade 6 and 7 students who participated almost unanimously agreed with this statement. They noted that they learn from their teachers "what their teachers want them to know," while they learn from their peers "real life skills and lessons."

Though the existence of group-think and peer pressure is certainly not new, I was surprised by the bluntness with which it was said. Why would an 11-year-old believe she has more to learn "about life" from a fellow 11-year-old with limited life experience, than from someone who was once 11, and since then has had many important life experiences and training in teaching kids? If this is what they truly believe, it highlights the power and importance of peer-led initiatives such as Jewish youth groups and summer camp.

Even Sarah and Rebecca knew about the negative influence of the wrong peers. As we read last week, Sarah demanded that Ishmael be banished so that her precious son, Isaac, would not be influenced by him. This week, Rebecca too is concerned that her beloved Jacob will be bullied and ruled over by his twin brother, Esau. God comforts her, explaining that "the older shall serve the young," or, in other words, Jacob will be able to hold his own.

The challenge for us parents is that we lack the assurance from God that our kids will be OK and withstand negative influences. Being a helicopter parent is not the answer. We have no choice but to teach our kids to be resilient and make good Jewish and moral decisions, and make the most of our opportunities to teach them "real life lessons." ■

Rabbi Shalom Spira

"Please go to the flock, and take for me from there two good kids" (Genesis 27:9). Citing the Midrash, Rashi places the following ethical justification in Rebecca's mouth: "'They are actually mine.' For so wrote Isaac in her ketubah, that she may collect two goats every day." The matriarch lawfully earned this livestock as her daily culinary allowance.

The enhanced alimony that Rebecca received is offered as a practical halachic option by the Mishnah, Ketubot 101b, which explains that any groom before kiddushin (marriage vows) can voluntarily commit to such an enterprise.

The specific talmudic example involves an agreement to feed one's stepdaughter (who, in the absence of a prenuptial stipulation, would have to support herself, or depend on soup kitchens), but the concept can be transposed to any bride, even if she does not enter marriage with a pre-existing daughter.

Rabbi Jacob Kamenetzky encouraged the Agudath Israel of America to employ precisely such an agreement before every chupah, in order to champion the welfare and prestige of the righteous ladies of Israel. His idea was not implemented with any measure of frequency during his physical lifetime, but is now available with some diamond-polishing on the web.

In 1993, the Beth Din of America capitalized on Rabbi Kamenetzky's proposal by drafting a prenup that requires a husband to pay his wife maintenance for every day after their domestic residence ceases.

However, a recent responsum by Rabbi Moshe Sternbuch (cyber-publicized on Aug. 2) challenges the Beth Din of America's extrapolation, since an agreement to pay the wife after she leaves the home is not necessarily the equivalent of Rebecca's ketubah, which granted her extra money while she remained at home. Presumably, then, the optimal solution to deflect Rabbi Sternbuch's objection would be to employ the formulation on scrib.com. ■

Rabbi Spira is a research assistant at the McGill AIDS Centre in Montreal.

Rachael Turkienicz

This week's parshah, Toldot, describes the birth of Jacob and Esau, twins who will struggle forever. We are so focused on the twins that we miss a crucial moment between their mother, Rebecca, and God. While pregnant, Rebecca demands that God explain why she feels such a struggle within her womb. God reveals that these are not two infants within her, but two nations whose destinies are to reverse their birth order – the elder will serve the younger.

What is crucial about this moment is that Rebecca is the first of our ancestors to initiate an inquiry with God. Previously, our ancestors were given information at God's discretion. Rebecca introduces a foundational concept in Judaism: reach out and start the conversation with God.

But we are also aware that God has answered her question, and perhaps she has too much information. Are we meant to know the destinies of our children? Can they thrive and grow if we channel them toward a preordained path? Can they gain our favour if they choose differently?

Rebecca is in a terrible predicament because God did not specify if this destiny was descriptive or prescriptive – will this happen on its own or must she take action to ensure the outcome? Throughout the lives of her children, Rebecca is silent until one day when Isaac is on his deathbed and intends to bless Esau, the eldest. Knowing this is not their Divine destiny, Rebecca desperately initiates a ruse and disguises Jacob as his brother, Esau. She does not know that the boys have already switched their inheritance rights and she need not take action.

Rebecca teaches us that if we ask God for meaning, we must be prepared to deal with the answer. More importantly, she shows us that the words of God must be interpreted to be understood. Judaism is about a dialogue with God in which we initiate, discuss and interpret. Even the words of God are not absolute. ■

Dion reiterated Liberals' support for two-state solution

In the end it did not help: Coulon lost the Liberal stronghold to Thomas Mulcair, only the second New Democrat MP ever elected in Quebec.

As Liberal leader, Dion reiterated his belief that Canada should restore aid and normal relations with the PA after the dissolution of its Hamas-led government and ascendancy of President Mahmoud Abbas. He was also opposed to extending the Canadian combat mission in Afghanistan beyond what was then a February 2009 limit.

He continued to contend that the Harper government's foreign policy was in step with the Bush administration, which had hurt Canada's reputation on the international stage.

"Canada, despite its long legacy of mediation and expertise in the Middle East, has not even been invited to the table [of a new round of peace talks]. Because what can Canada bring to the table if at present our foreign policy is a carbon copy-in-the-making of American foreign policy?" he said at fundraising dinner for the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations.

Reiterating his party's support for a two-state solution, he said the Liberals "urge all parties in the region to respect international humanitarian law and avoid at all costs the targeting of innocent civilians and civilian infrastructure."

On the other hand, in 2005, Dion, as minister responsible for Parks Canada, oversaw the recognition of the 1919 founding of CJC as an event of national historic significance.

> "Any threat to Israel's right to exist is an attack on the values of every democracy."

And although it was implemented by the Harper government, Dion is credited with proposing increased subsidies to enhance the security of religious and other community institutions at risk, which was motivated by the UTT attack.

As party leader, he attended the big Israeli independence day rallies in downtown Montreal.

In 2007, Dion accused then-Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of "inciting another Holocaust" and said the defence of Israel should be the concern of all democracies. "Any threat to Israel's right to exist is an attack on the values of every democracy. Israel's struggle for peace and security is our struggle."

Likewise, combating anti-Semitism should be the concern of all people, he said.

Under Dion, the Liberals voted against the Conservative government's beefing up provisions of the Anti-Terrorism Act, introduced after 9/11. The party's human rights critic, Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler, however, abstained from the House of Commons vote, saying he favoured the motion, but did not think it provided adequate safeguards against abuse of power.

Despite this break with party ranks, Cotler insisted he and Dion, as former fellow academics, remained good friends.

It was Dion who created the new position of human rights for Cotler within his shadow cabinet. The two collaborated on such issues as combatting the slaughter of innocents in the Darfur region of Sudan.

In more recent years, Cotler and Dion found themselves allies in fending off Conservative accusations made in flyers distributed in areas with significant Jewish residents in 2009 and later during the 2011 federal election.

The Conservatives insinuated that the Liberals were ready to deal with Hamas and were complicit in such anti-Semitic forums as the 2001 UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa.

The flyer charged that Dion "personally demanded that Canada increase funding to the Hamas-led [Palestinian Authority.]"

Dion rose in the House of Commons to defend his leadership, stating, "The Liberal Party never supported that funds would be sent to the Hamas-led [Palestinian] government. What we were asking was whether the funds would reach the people of Palestine. This point of view was the point of view of the government of Israel at the time."

Cotler, who castigated the flyer as false and malicious, said it libeled Dion and he demanded an apology – which the Tories never made. ■

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein said members of City Shul wanted to get involved, because "Jewish values propelled us to 'know the heart of the stranger, for you were strangers in the land of Egypt,'" she said in an email interview with The CJN.

Though the shul has only "200 membership units," 70 have volunteered to help and an equal number have provided funds, she stated.

Following her Yom Kippur sermon on the issue, City Shul members raised more than $80,000, including one donation of $27,600, some in the $2,000 to $5,000 range, and many between $18 and $1,800.

Rabbi Goldstein doesn't know who the shul will be sponsoring, though "we hope, [it will be] a large family with both parents and grandparents."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl said one of his High Holiday sermons at Beth Tzedec focused on the Syrian refugee issue.

The synagogue's executive and board of governors agreed to take up the cause during the summer. The shul made contact with the relatives of an Ismaili Muslim family who have relatives who fled Syria and were living in Turkey.

The Ismailis practise "a liberal, tolerant brand of Islam," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said. "We think this might be the family we will be sponsoring.

"Our focus is on family re-unification and while we are not looking at specific ethnic and religious groups, some ethnic, religious groups are more endangered," he said.

So far the synagogue has raised close to $27,000.

"I think in general there was a sense there was a mitzvah we had to do. For the Jewish community in particular, this is a bigger ask. We have a lot of concerns about Jewish-Muslim relations and Syrians in their relations to Israel, and we are concerned as a community over security issues."

Some members of the congregation wanted to focus the synagogue's efforts on Yazidis and Christians, he said.

In bringing a Syrian family to Canada, the aim is not to benefit the Jewish community, but to do so because "it is the right thing to do at this time." ■

Raheel Raza: Speaking out for Muslim women's rights

SUZANNE WINTROB
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Raheel Raza has been outspoken ever since she was a little girl growing up in Pakistan. Today, the award-winning journalist, author of Their Jihad, Not my Jihad and president of The Council for Muslims Facing Tomorrow is especially vocal about fighting women's rights abuses, particularly forced and underage marriage, honour killings and female genital mutilation (FGM) – all happening not only in Muslim countries, but right here in Canada.

Though Raza, a Sunni, has been tackling these issues since moving to Toronto in 1989 with her Shiite husband and two young sons, it wasn't until last year's release of the documentary Honor Diaries that she's finally seeing real change. The film, produced by Paula Kweskin of the Clarion Project, features Raza and other women's rights advocates as they engage in dialogue about gender inequality. Following public and private screenings around the world, Honor Diaries has taken on a life of its own and created what Raza calls "a movement."

On Nov. 19 and 20, the Honor Diaries team and the Global Women's Institute are hosting the first-ever Censored Women's Film Festival at George Washington University in Washington, D.C. Four powerful documentaries will be screened, with filmmakers, experts and activists like Raza leading discussions. The CJN spoke to Raza, 65, before the festival.

What was life like growing up in Pakistan?

I grew up in a middle-class, moderate Muslim family. My father was in the army, my mother was a teacher. We grew up with Islam, but nothing was thrust down our throats, no extremism of any sort. I did my entire schooling in convent colleges run by Irish Catholic nuns. But in 1977, General Mohammed Zia-ul-Haq came to power and was very influenced by the Wahhabi/Salafi ideology from Saudi Arabia. That's when we saw the beginning of religious extremism that later morphed into violent extremism. My husband and I married that year, and soon after, left for Dubai. We both had rebellious natures and activist streaks of questioning the status quo. It wasn't kosher for a Muslim girl to ask questions, to ask why. I was always questioning and always in trouble.

What prompted you to get so passionate about championing human rights, particularly underage marriages, honour killings and FGM?

I grew up in a culture where women were supposed to be seen and not heard. Although I didn't see any direct abuse in my family, the honour culture permeated. It was all about, "Be careful what you say and do because you can dishonour the family." When I came to Canada, I found my voice. I found my freedom. All of these barbaric practices are happening here under the radar. They're hard to track and they're difficult to report. For instance, FGM has not been tracked in term of statistics in Canada, but we know it exists. In the U.S., close to half a million women are at risk of FGM or have had it. In Canada, there have been 23 honour killings reported as such since 1999. When it starts happening here to young innocent girls, it's absolutely frightening.

Raheel Raza

With migrants from Syria and Africa making their way to Europe and North America, should we be concerned that they will bring their tribal practices with them?

Yes, it is a worry, but it shouldn't sideline our compassion for the humanitarian cause. It's a very fine line to walk. In the wave of Syrian refugees that have gone into Europe, not all of them are genuinely Syrians. Some of the bad apples will blend in with them, and with that, there's always worry about these practices. No matter what crisis strikes the world, it's always the women who suffer the most. Syrian girls are being bought and sold, there's rape and abuse, their lives are at risk. So yes, there's a worry for both the humanitarian cause as well as our own welfare.

You're in favour of a "barbaric cultural practices" hotline. How would it differ from traditional methods of reporting crimes, such as Crime Stoppers or 911?

Since Honor Diaries was released, I get an email or phone call almost once a week from some girl right here who is distressed. I'm not a social worker, I don't have the qualifications to give someone the legal help they need. It's not just domestic violence. This is specific. If a woman calls police and says, "I fear that my family will take me home for a visit and force me into a marriage," the police can't do anything because a criminal act has not been committed. We need to train our law enforcement agencies, our legal system. The action part is not over yet. There's still a long way to go.

How do we educate the next generation, particularly women at risk and the men who may exert power over them?

A lot of it is about how mothers bring up their sons. I'm the mother of two sons. They're young Muslim men. It's up to me to have taught them how to respect women. Young men who grow up in patriarchal cultures where they're not taught to respect women have great difficulty in dealing with these issues. It has to be at a grassroots level.

You have a fatwa on your head. How do you sleep at night knowing that people want to silence you?

There are a lot of people who'd rather see me shut up. I have a fatwa from a cleric in Saudi Arabia, I've had death threats, I have hate mail. But if it's all coming to me, then it's bothering them. They know it's happening. They know there are women who are speaking out. I'm very fortunate that I have the support of the men in my family. My sons used to stand as bodyguards while I spoke. They'd love to give me pepper spray and make sure that I can protect myself. But it's not something that I want to think about because if I do, then I can't do the work that I do. Backlash against me is a very small drop in the ocean of the work that has to be done. I just literally don't think about it.

What's the big deal with the niqab – if a woman wants to wear it, why should we care?

The niqab should be banned in Canada because it's symbolic of the Islamist political ideology. Look at which parts of the world support the niqab. I grew up in the Islamic state of Pakistan with no niqab; we just draped a scarf over our head. Niqab comes from Saudi, it's an Al Qaeda symbol, a Taliban symbol, it's ISIS, al-Nusra. It starts off with this very small minority pushing for these little accommodations and then it just goes on and on. This is only an addition to a series of unreasonable accommodations that we have seen the Canadian government giving in to. It's scary because this is how the sharia zones were established in the U.K. and Europe. All we have to do is look at what has happened there and take a lesson from it.

Some say the niqab issue and the plight of Syrian refugees are hints of a fifth column trying to turn Canada and the rest of the world into a caliphate. How do you feel about that?

The fifth column is already here. Where do most Muslims get their direction and instructions? Either the Muslim Brotherhood or Al Qaeda or Khomeinism. None of these are ideologies that are friendly to the West. The Muslim Brotherhood says clearly that the West is evil, go there, infiltrate, assimilate and then weaken them from inside. It's not a message of "respect your neighbour," "love your neighbour," "live and let live," "follow your faith." It's that you must impose your ideology, their version of Islam, and establish a caliphate wherever you go. For people like ISIS, there are no borders, no nation states, no boundaries. They believe the whole world is for them to invade and to implement their ideology. The sooner Westerners get their minds around this, they will be more alert to what's happening.

When will moderate Muslims rise up against the minority of violent Muslims?

Some don't speak out because they're influenced by these ideologies. The moderate Muslims don't care because they just want to go to work, educate their kids and have a good life. When my children were growing up, we told them that this is our country by choice, this is the country we have adopted, this is your land. But this is not the general message that's given. It's always "us and them." These are messages that come from the mosques, which are troubling. They're also saying, "Don't talk to Jews and Christians." When you hear that over and over again, it creates a mindset.

Are you optimistic at all about your grandchildren's future?

I don't expect to see change overnight, or even in my lifetime. But we're trying to sow the seeds of change through this documentary, through our actions, through our outreach, and hope that this change will take root. I don't know how many generations it will take to bring about change, but what we can do is empower and support those women, communities and organizations that are speaking out. My husband and I laugh that we're two retirees trying to fight the world on our pensions. But that doesn't stop us from speaking out. My kids sometimes say, "Why don't you just give up and become a full-time grandmother and not do this?" But it's my own conscience, I have to sleep at night knowing that I did my bit. That's all that matters. ■

Can non-Jews achieve eternal bliss?

Backstory

JONATHAN L. MILEVSKY
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In 1773, Moses Mendelssohn, a Jewish philosopher and major figure in the Jewish enlightenment, corresponded with Rabbi Yaakov Emden, a respected rabbi and traditionalist based in Altona, Germany. At issue were the implications of a section in Maimonides' Laws of Kings which states that non-Jews who observe the Noahide laws, which include prohibitions such as murder, incest and theft, only attain a share in the world to come if they do so because God has given those commandments through Moses. This ruling was approved by the noted halachist Joseph Karo (d. 1575).

Mendelssohn could not accept that a community which had not received revelation, or which did not believe in the Torah, should nonetheless have no opportunity for salvation. Mendelssohn's piercing words, as translated by Michah Gottlieb, are as follows: "Shall all the inhabitants of the earth from east to west, except for us, be cast into a pit of annihilation and be abhorrent to all flesh if they do not believe in the Torah, which was given as an inheritance to the congregation alone?"

Mendelssohn added that the Noahide laws are seemingly not learned by exegesis – there is no clear-cut Biblical reference to them – but only through the Jewish tradition. He therefore asked, "What then shall be done by the nations on which the light of the Torah has not shone at all?"

Gottlieb explains that Mendelssohn sent the letter because he saw in the rabbi a kindred spirit. Nevertheless, Mendelssohn would find no comfort in the words of Emden. The response by Emden attempted to prove that Maimonides' position was borne out in the Talmud, though without specifying where, and ignored the concern at the heart of the question. In fact, Emden wrote (as translated by Steven Schwarzschild) that "all the justice and kindness which idolaters practise are sinful, because they act in this manner only in order to magnify themselves." As Shmuel Feiner writes, Emden was sceptical about the ideas of the Enlightenment. Certainly we could detect signs of that position in the rabbi's response.

> What then shall be done by the nations on which the light of the Torah has not shone at all?

The immediate significance of the exchange, of course, is its historical context and the way the enlightened view of the capacity of reason, particularly when it comes to creating moral systems, is in conflict with the view that the tradition provides all the answers. Indeed, even someone like Emden, who, as Jacob Schacter and others have explored, had moderate views when it came to Christianity, was not on the margins when it came to the issue of the requirements for attaining a share in the world to come.

The broader impact of this discussion, however, should reverberate among religious devotees everywhere, and it is a question that is arguably more relevant now, since the ideas of natural theology – the view that religious precepts can be ascertained from nature alone – are no longer tenable. Maimonides concludes his discussion of how Jews are to treat non-Jews in order to practise "ways of peace" by adding a verse from Psalms 145:9: "God is good to all, and his mercy extend to all His creations."

Certainly, more than one religion submits to a kind and just God, so this paraphrase of Mendelssohn's question has a bearing on other religious traditions as well: How are those who never received revelation – not to mention those who have never even been educated within the confines of a religious tradition but who live a righteous life by all accounts – supposed to achieve eternal bliss? What about them? ■

Jonathan L. Milevsky is a PhD candidate in Religious Studies at McMaster University in Hamilton, Ont.

A hate ruling in B.C., and a Chanukah present you can't buy anymore

Anti-Semite convicted

A B.C. Supreme Court jury last week convicted Roy Arthur Topham of Quesnel, B.C., for promoting hatred against Jews on his website. Topham, 68, was charged in 2012 for postings on radicalpress.com that the Crown said demonize Jews and promote anti-Semitic conspiracy theories. He was convicted on one count for material from 2011 and 2012, but found not guilty for posts from 2013. Victoria resident Harry Abrams, a former B.C. representative for B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, alerted hate crimes investigators to the site, which also hosts texts like The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion and The Biological Jew.

Actress converts for love

Chalk up another win for the tribe: actress Zooey Deschanel has reportedly converted to Judaism. Deschanel, the daughter of a Quaker and a Roman Catholic, made the switch just before marrying producer Jacob Pechenik last June. Us Weekly broke the news (though it didn't reveal what denomination of rabbi supervised her conversion). The pair married a month before their daughter, Elsie, was born. "Zooey converted to Judaism for Jacob," an "insider" told the magazine. Deschanel, 35, stars in the Fox sitcom New Girl. Her films include Failure to Launch and (500) Days of Summer.

Zooey gets Jewsy

Offensive sweater pulled

U.S department chain Nordstrom pulled a women's Chanukah-themed sweater from its stores and website last week amid heavy criticism on social media that the item perpetuated negative stereotypes of Jewish women. The blue sweater featured the words "Chai Maintenance" knitted on top and "Hanukkah J.A.P." on the bottom. J.A.P. stands for the pejorative "Jewish American Princess." A men's version with "Mazel tov" on the front and "Oy vey" on the back remained on sale. "Cute and kitschy is one thing, but perpetuating negative stereotypes as supposedly cute or fun holiday wear is disgusting," said one poster on the chain's Facebook page. Meanwhile, Amazon.com continues to sell the women's version, but without the J.A.P. reference. ■

The moderate Rabbi Kaplan

The great question for Diaspora Judaism in our time has been how much to segregate and how much to assimilate. A Judaism that is unwilling to make bold, even counter-cultural, statements about the world and about society is a Judaism lacking in leadership. At the same time, a Judaism which sets the bar of integrity too high will lose the hearts and minds of its people. The trick is to find the balance and to moderate the two forces in our communal life.

It does not take much analysis to figure out which force of this tension keeps winning out in the non-Orthodox movements. David Weinfeld's article ("Intermarrying rabbis: punchlines or prophets?" Nov.5) is yet another call to lower the religious bar further and accommodate rabbis married to non-Jewish spouses. Weinfeld resurrects the same old arguments, but should be cautious summoning the thought of Reconstructionist Judaism's founder, Rabbi Mordechai Kaplan.

Rabbi Kaplan was one of the most influential teachers at my alma mater, the Jewish Theological Seminary.

In particular, Rabbi Kaplan was a staunch opponent of intermarriage, referring to it as a breakdown of the basic covenant of Judaism and against the nature of being Jewish as God intended. No doubt he would be appalled at the assimilationist tendencies in all of the liberal movements as of late. He did want an evolving religious civilization, but not an acquiescing one.

Today the call must be to re-examine and reinforce our religious principles and, in particular, to pay attention to those customs and traditions that sustain Jewish preservation, and not those that threaten it. We need to make room in our hearts to accept notions that may be controversial, but that are essential to the richness and depth of our tradition. Let's embrace the conflicts and tensions of Jewish living before we seek to redefine it. I have no doubt that about this, Rabbi Kaplan would be in complete agreement.

MPs and Jewish interests

I hope readers are not misled into thinking that just because an MP has a Jewish background, or Jewish mother, or goes to shul on Yom Kippur, or whatever it is that defines a Jew these days, that the MP will effectively represent Jewish interests in Parliament ("Six Jewish MPs head to Ottawa," Nov. 12). It is nice to read about the backgrounds of these individuals, but there is nothing there that guarantees Jewish, or Canadian interests for that matter, will be served effectively. The proof is in the actions and activities of these people and the governing Liberal party.

It should be noted that Peter Kent, who represents Thornhill, the largest Jewish constituency in the country and is not Jewish, and Stephen Harper's Conservative party by and large, represented Jewish interests quite well during their term in office. I am sure that Kent will continue to do so, even though the Conservatives no longer form the government. Conversely, Mark Adler, a Conservative who is Jewish, did not serve Jewish interests very well with his antics, proclaiming his need for a photo-op during Harper's visit to the Western Wall in Jerusalem. He was, rightfully, not re-elected.

The new Parliament hasn't convened yet, but we will have to wait and see what unfolds.

Question of the week

The new Liberal cabinet has been sworn in, and now the work of governing begins. How well will the government of Justin Trudeau handle foreign policy issues?

When someone in your family passes away, you want everything to be done right, according to Jewish tradition. When my mother died, I didn't know half of what these things were. Benjamin's spent time with our family, explaining the significance of every sacred ritual. More than that, they made it ours. It was a beautiful way to honour my dear mother's life.

RABBI·2·RABBI

The social media congregation

Are Facebook and Twitter avenues to generate a broader audience, or do they divert energy from conventional synagogue responsibilities?

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER
CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Scheier: The recent conversation about Orthodox women's ordination and titles has dominated my inbox and Facebook wall. As I read the many articles, posts and rabbinic proclamations, one aspect strikes me as significant: it seems that a disproportionate number of participants in this conversation are rabbis who do not have traditional pulpits. These rabbis share opinions not because they have been hired or elected by Jews seeking leadership, but simply because they have a keyboard and an Internet connection.

The result is revolutionary: communal norms and policies are being influenced by rabbis who are most active in social media and not necessarily by those community rabbis who, we like to believe, have their finger on the pulse of the Jewish world.

Perhaps there is an aspect of meritocracy to this – those with the best ideas and means of expression are heard loudest. On the other hand, this may represent a shift in rabbinic influence that leaves traditional community rabbis out in the cold.

What do you think about the new rabbinic landscape? Does social media give disproportionate weight to some voices over others?

Rabbi Cutler: It is absolutely true that social media has changed the landscape of influencers, rabbinic or otherwise. Those who write most often and share most widely will influence most greatly.

Social media does somewhat level the playing field, or at least lower the barriers to participation in important public conversations. But rabbis have a responsibility to share their vision. Facebook, Twitter and Instagram are just modern iterations of communications platforms.

Rabbi Scheier: I am not certain if social media levels the playing field, as you write, or creates an entirely new playing field. This doubt feeds into my struggle with social media's grasp on my time and attention. On the one hand, I am aware of social media's powerful ability to expand the reach and diversity of the audience. On the other hand, I am aware that even when one of my Facebook posts generates scores of "likes" and "shares," come Shabbat morning in the synagogue, very few of my regulars will be aware of or tuned in to the conversations that have dominated social media.

In Rabbi Jonathan Sacks' 1992 essay "Creativity and Innovation in Halakhah," he warns of the sociological divide between the centres of Jewish law – the yeshivot – and the centres of congregational life.

I adapt this concern to a new reality: the sociological divide between those whose Jewish thinking is primarily influenced by their Facebook feed versus those whose Jewish thinking is primarily influenced by the pulpit or the Shabbat table discussion. At the very least, this divide will influence the allocation of time, efforts, and output of 21st-century rabbis.

Do you feel the tension between energies devoted to maintaining a social media presence and those dedicated to conventional rabbinic responsibilities?

Rabbi Cutler: Social media invites the question: who is our congregation? Of course, we both serve synagogues with a defined membership. Yet at the same time, we are looked upon by the wider community to share our words (if not our wisdom). The wider community, and indeed many within our own congregations, are not in shul on Shabbat. Social media is another avenue to generate a broader reach – within our membership and beyond. Indeed, my more popular posts find a larger audience than a Shabbat sermon.

Facebook, in particular, also facilitates conversation, expanding upon what was once the purview of kiddush and Shabbat lunch. If I want to not only share, but have people engage in a dialogue, social media has advantages over the traditional sermon. I particularly enjoy seeing friends from outside Toronto comment on my posts. They don't have the opportunity to hear me speak in shul and often have tremendous insight (if not expertise) in the topics about which I am posting. My local friends and congregants who see my posts and the comments that are generated gain tremendously from my network of some very bright commenting people.

I see social media as one more piece in the matrix of rabbinic responsibility. There is no more tension between traditional rabbinical responsibilities and social media than between visiting the sick and preparing for a class, or writing a sermon and planning an event. ■

After Paris, a lesson for Israel

In the days since Paris was attacked by the Islamic State (ISIS), many have sought to compare France's predicament to that of Israel. No doubt, there are clear connections between the terrorism Israelis face on a near-constant basis and the brutal ideology that fuelled the Nov. 13 multi-site rampage in the City of Light. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu made the point over the weekend, saying, "In Israel, as in France, terrorism is terrorism, and the force standing behind it is radical Islam and its wish to destroy its victims." An image going around social media puts it more succinctly: "Paris 11/13; New York 9/11; Israel 24/7."

The crisis facing France and other western democracies certainly mirrors the long-standing conflict in Israel, and yet the ramifications are nonetheless different. The radicals who attacked France do not pose an existential threat, at least not in the near term. When French military jets embarked on bombing campaigns against ISIS targets in Syria Sunday night, that point was made clear: for France, the battleground is far away. True, there are issues on the home front – among them, local radicalization and the challenges of immigration – but the real enemy is in Syria and Iraq.

Israel's enemies, by contrast, are but a stone's throw – literally – away. The geographical space between Israelis and those directly trying to kill them is minuscule. In many cases, they live in the same cities, they see each other every day. And so it is a very different kind of terror – more immediate and easier to quantify, though that doesn't mean it can always be detected and defended against.

But even with the significant differences between the threats facing France and Israel, and even if the stakes are dissimilar, the path to defeat the enemy is one and the same. The goal must be to root out fundamentalism in all its forms, to hit radicals in their home bases, to hinder their ability to transmit an ideology of hatred into western nations, block their political and financial supporters, and impress upon civilians, especially those of a younger generation, that there is a better way forward for all.

And in that monumental endeavour, there is a real opportunity for France and Israel – for all western democracies – to work together. Shock and grief are natural in the immediate aftermath of such a bloody spectacle, but in order to defeat the enemy, it is necessary to quickly move forward, to resolve to fight back, to not be cowed into a spiral of fear, which is what ISIS, Hamas, Hezbollah and every terrorist organization desperately wants.

Here, the Israeli experience is perhaps most instructive. When terror strikes, as it has so often in recent weeks, Israelis respond in two distinct ways: they fight back by identifying the enemy and rooting him out, and, at the same time, they do their best to move on and get back to normal life, as odd as that sounds. They know the war can't be won in a single day or battle, but they are resolved to see it through, and to retain their humanity in the process. That's a lesson the whole world could use right now. ■ — YONI

Celebrating women's graduation as spiritual leaders

Martin Lockshin

Amid all the troubling concerns about safety and security in Jerusalem, a good news story unfolded here on Oct. 20 at Midreshet Lindenbaum, a post-high school institute for women's learning. Over 300 people gathered to celebrate the graduation of Meira Welt Maarek and Chani Klein Ravhon from the Susi Bradfield Women's Institute for Halakhic Leadership (WIHL). Like me, much of the crowd was there to celebrate an auspicious historic event.

These two women (who are actually the third and fourth graduates of WIHL, preceded by Idit Bartov and Anat Novoselsky) completed a rigorous five-year course of full-time study of Talmud and Halachah, covering kosher food, Sabbath laws, family purity, mikvot, mourning, marriage and conversion. In other words, they mastered a curriculum identical to that of the men training for rabbinical ordination and passed similar examinations. Thus they are equal in knowledge and skill to their male rabbinical counterparts. (Full disclosure: when I was ordained as an Orthodox rabbi 40 years ago, I was tested on a significantly narrower range of areas of Jewish law than these women.)

Why was this event so significant?

Many of us remember the vast number of areas of advanced study that used to be closed to women. A century ago, women had virtually no opportunities to study and become doctors, lawyers or professors. Happily, society has changed and intellectual areas of study are no longer the exclusive domain of men. Women's intensive study of Jewish legal texts has expanded greatly in the same period, but not at the same pace as in the secular world.

Just as people used to assume that women were not cut out for secular intellectual fields of study, many Jews assumed that Talmud cannot be properly understood by a woman's brain. A hundred years ago, even teaching women Hebrew was felt to be unimportant in some circles.

Sixty years ago, there were still no schools where a woman could pursue high-level intensive study of the Talmud and codes of Jewish law. But society's attitudes to women's intellectual capabilities changed, and Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, the acknowledged 20th-century leader of American Orthodox Judaism, gave his blessing to women's Talmud study back in the middle of the 20th century.

Since Rabbi Soloveitchik's time, excellent schools and programs for women to study Talmud rigorously have opened, mostly here in Israel but also in the United States. (Sadly no such programs exist in Canada.) Many Canadian, American and Israeli Orthodox young women (including two of my daughters) were introduced to intensive Talmud study right in the study hall of Midreshet Lindenbaum, the same place where the ceremony took place on Oct. 20.

Jewish tradition has always encouraged the idea of Torah lishmah, the study of Torah for its own sake, not for any title or certificate. Most men and women who study Talmud intensively study lishmah.

But halachic Jews also need certified religious leaders who are experts in Talmud and Halachah, marriage counsellors who deeply understand Jewish tradition, texts and values, and spiritual leaders to bring us appropriate Jewish messages when we mourn or when we are sick. Women who have the proper training serve in such roles as effectively as male rabbis.

Furthermore, every halachic Jew needs to have a person to whom he or she can turn for rulings on complicated questions of Jewish law. Whenever halachic Jews follow a rabbi's ruling, they are relying on the fact that the rabbi was "ordained," i.e. was declared to be a moreh horaah, a person who has passed the tests and is thus deemed reliable to rule.

A few decades ago, again here in Jerusalem, at an institution called Nishmat, an innovative program was begun to give women intensive instruction in the rules of "family purity, on the reasonable assumption that a woman questioner would feel freer discussing her intimate life with another woman than with a male rabbi. The graduates of that program pass tests and receive the title yoatzot Halachah (halachic advisers), thus certifying that a questioner could rely on the ruling of that yoetzet.

The event here in Jerusalem on Oct. 20 is simply the next logical step. Two brave women, who had already spent many years studying Torah lishmah, decided to dedicate five more years to full-time study. They passed the customary tests and were given the titles manhigah ruchanit (spiritual leader) and morat horaah (the feminine form of moreh horaah, i.e. a woman whose halachic rulings may be relied on).

Naysayers still abound. Recently, after a heated and lengthy debate, the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) decided by majority vote to reject the idea of women serving in rabbinic positions, even if they are not called rabbis.

But in Israel, many rabbis are more open. Dozens of Orthodox rabbis attended this graduation. The speakers deserve special mention: Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, chief rabbi of Efrat and head of the Ohr Torah Stone (OTS) network of educational institutions, which includes Midreshet Lindenbaum and the WIHL; Rabbi David Stav, chief rabbi of Shoham, head of the Tzohar rabbinical organization in Israel and newly appointed co-chancellor of OTS; and rabbis Yehoshua Reich and Shmuel Klitsner, who run the program.

They are all to be congratulated for standing up to opposition to bringing Orthodox Judaism into the 21st century, and primarily for giving the halachic community two excellent new spiritual leaders. And let us hope that Torah will go forth from Zion and will have an influence on the Orthodox Jews of North America, too. ■

Trying to make sense of the senseless

As the violence continues in Jerusalem, Israelis look for answers and a way to move forward

YAIR LOOTSTEEN

It's now several weeks into the current round of another seemingly endless, relentless cycle of violence, and I find myself disconsolate, not knowing where this will lead. For those of us who endured the first and second intifadahs there is an uneasy, disheartening air of déjà vu, but also a feeling that this time is different.

Until the security wall was completed, during the last intifadah, most Israelis were wary of suicide bombers, who most frequently made their way into Israel from the West Bank. This time around, things have not come to that. Credit that to the much maligned, but highly effective, security barrier, as well as to the IDF, police and Shin Bet, who continue their often Sisyphean efforts to contain West Bank terrorist elements, and to the ongoing security co-ordination between our forces and the Palestinian Authority's (PA) security forces acting in the West Bank, which continues on the ground efficiently, despite tensions between Israeli and Palestinian political leaders.

These are uneasy days. We're experiencing terrorism writ large. Violence and intimidation aimed at sowing fear among Israelis, in an apparent pursuit of political purposes. Young Palestinians carrying out random acts of hatred knowing full well they could die in the process. They are not affiliated directly with specific terrorist organizations. When they stab or bludgeon bystanders arbitrarily, or use their cars to run over innocent victims at bus stops or on sidewalks, they are acting alone. And the local nature of their crimes makes it harder for Israel's intelligence community to prevent such actions before they occur.

Other differences exist between this uprising, this intifadah, this round of violence – call it what you will – and those that preceded it. In previous cycles, east Jerusalemites and Israeli Arabs mostly stayed out of the physical fray. Now, young east Jerusalemites are taking active roles.

Social media and smartphones are also a big difference. Young, would-be perpetrators gobble up incitement and are egged on to act through Facebook and the like. Photos and videos of every terrorist act and its outcome go viral. Push notifications provide blow-by-blow accounts of every incident.

Experts are proffering their opinions as to why this violence is happening now: the Palestinians perceive a change in the status quo on the Temple Mount; rabid incitement by PA officials, including President Mahmoud Abbas; Israel's continued settlement activity in the West Bank; the lack of progress in the peace process; almost 50 years of Israeli occupation of the West Bank; genuine feelings of disenfranchisement among young Palestinians in the West Bank, east Jerusalem and, to some degree, within Israeli Arab society; and the contempt these same young people feel for their own Palestinian leadership. But whatever the motivation, no excuse can be made for wanton bloodshed.

While it might not to be popular to admit it, people here are scared. Businesses are suffering. Hotels announced cancellations for the Chanukah, Christmas and New Year holiday season. Folks are going out less. Those who do, watch their backs.

On a beautiful Tuesday morning in mid-October, I was working out with my friend Meir in Armon Hanatziv, a neighbourhood in southern Jerusalem. Like many liberal, open-minded Israelis, over the last decade or so, Meir has shifted politically from left of centre – from someone willing to make painful concessions to the Palestinians in anticipation of real peace – to someone who now sees himself in Israel's political centre.

He believes Israel has bent over backward to accommodate the Palestinians, to come to an equitable resolution of the conflict. Former prime ministers Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres, Ehud Barak, Ehud Olmert all were willing to make far-reaching concessions, only to have those overtures rejected out of hand and met with unacceptable violence. For people like Meir, all trust in the Palestinians and in the Oslo process has dissipated, and before Israel can be expected to return to the negotiating table, they believe Palestinian violence must cease and their leaders must call upon their people, in Arabic, to accept Israel and to put down their swords in good faith.

As we walked that morning along the promenade with one of the most spectacular views one can get of the Old City, Meir and I continued an ongoing discussion of how things should be resolved, with my own views being farther to the left than his. We also talked about whether we should continue working out along this promenade, which is frequented by many Arabs from nearby east Jerusalem neighbourhoods, and if so, what precautions we might take.

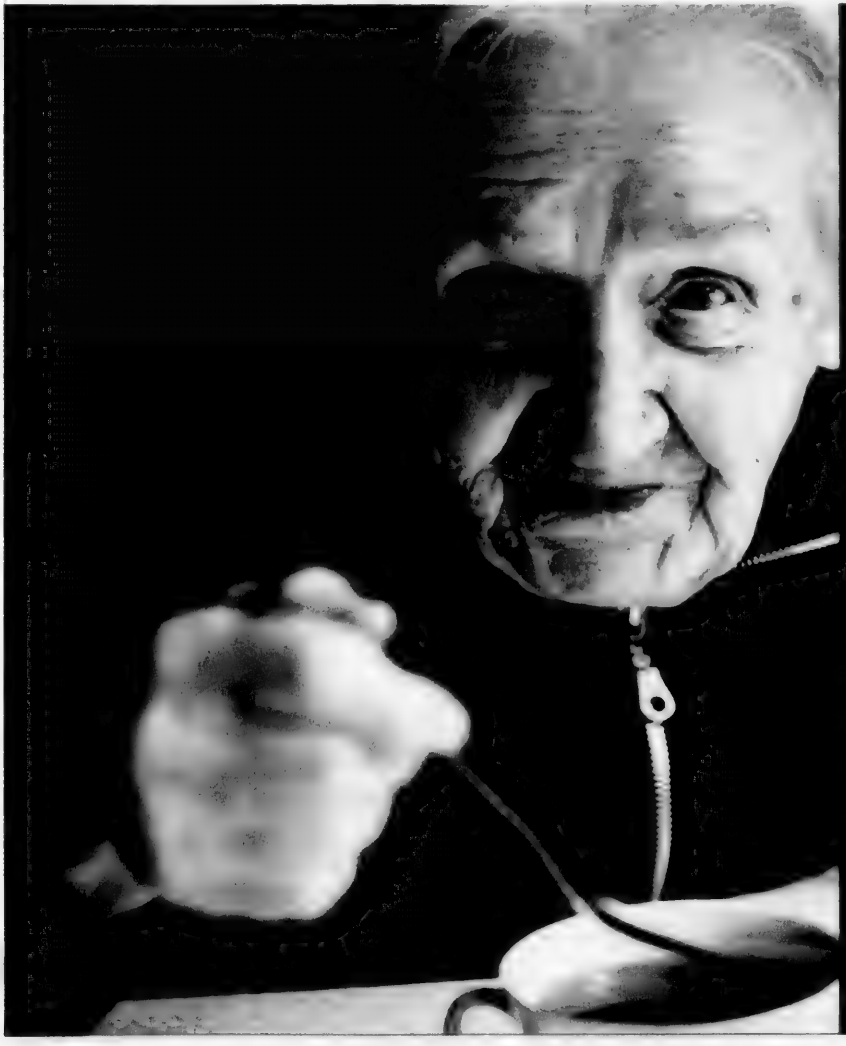
Helping each other restore hope



Where would you go if you couldn't pay your rent and were on the brink of losing your housing? What would you do if your children were hungry and you couldn't afford to pay your electric bill and still feed them dinner? How would you carry on if you were elderly and alone, isolated and unable to leave your apartment?

24,000 members of our community live below the poverty line and face these challenges every day. But they are not alone. UJA Federation and a coalition of community agencies are joining forces to fight Jewish poverty. We are bringing together communal resources to have a greater impact. We will create new partnerships, embrace and listen to community members living with poverty, we will work with government, philanthropists, and civic leaders so that together, with your help we can end Jewish poverty.

I trust our prime minister to stick to his word

Gil Troy

Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's impressive victory has many in the pro-Israel community worrying. Former prime minister Stephen Harper was such an enthusiastic friend that the concerns are logical. If we're often told in government to follow a strategy of "better the devil you know" than the unknown, it is really hard to let go of an angel. But Trudeau spent the campaign insisting on his warm support for the Jewish state and criticizing Harper for turning Israel into a "political football." Now is the time both to take Trudeau at his word and make the case why candidate Trudeau was correct when he praised Israel's and Canada's "enduring bond of friend, rooted in our shared commitment to peace and democracy," when he called Hamas a "terrorist organization," with no dilly-dallying during the Gaza conflict, and when he has denounced the boycott movement so eloquently.

The first step, is reassuring Trudeau that support for Israel remains a popular, core grassroots all-Canadian, all-party commitment. In the battle over deciphering the election returns, it's essential to stress that this campaign focused on domestic issues mostly and that Harper lost because of Harper fatigue and Trudeaumania, not because of Harper's support for Israel. Israel's enemies will be quick to say: Harper supported Israel and Harper lost, therefore, Harper lost because of his support for Israel. They followed a similar logic when Canada did not win the seat on the United Nations Security Council, and to this day, despite impressive proof that the issue had more to do with UN politics than anything else, many point to Canada not being on the Security Council as the "cost" of supporting Israel.

Trudeau was right throughout the election to insist that the Liberal party has a proud history of supporting Israel. It's one of those happy corners in the political word where doing right makes for good politics. While I was grateful to Harper and his team for their ardent support for Israel, I agree with Trudeau that support for Israel should be seen as a common value uniting all Canadian parties and not a wedge issue.

Now, of course, comes the hard part: translating the poetry of the campaign into the prose of governance, as former New York governor Mario Cuomo once put it. Already, Trudeau's new foreign affairs minister, Stephane Dion, triggered some concerns with his call for Canada to return to its historic role as an "honest broker." Trudeau must make it clear that being an "honest broker" is not a fig leaf for going back to the bad old amoral days of former prime minister Jean Chrétien, when Canada feared taking clear moral stands against terrorism and dictatorship at the UN and elsewhere. An "honest broker" that is open to all, but can draw the lines morally between democracies and dictatorships, between terrorists and victims, is essential in today's topsy-turvy world.

Trudeau could benefit from a tutorial with another charismatic liberal leader, former U.S. president Bill Clinton. As I show in my new book The Age of Clinton: America in the 1990s, Clinton evolved on foreign policy. He started by dodging conflict and muting his moral voice. But his passivity failed to stop the Rwanda genocide. Eventually he realized that he had to stand strong morally – and sometimes even violently – because the world abhors a vacuum. And, on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Clinton understood two important lessons that candidate Trudeau said he learned. First, Israel needs to feel loved, secure, supported, especially by leading democracies. And second, when Palestinians turn to terror, excusing them is not being an honest broker, but an enabler. When necessary, Clinton confronted the Palestinians – and gave Israel $100 million in funds to fight terror.

In today's world, Canada cannot retreat in the fight against terror – and I trust Trudeau to stick to his word. ■

Using the past to build bridges

Sara Horowitz

It wasn't Holocaust Education Week in Montana. But in the midst of the extensive remembrance programing on-going in Toronto, I flew westward. I joined half a dozen other professors of Holocaust studies to begin a conversation with colleagues whose work centred on aboriginal studies, African-American studies, gender studies, and other forms of historical or contemporary oppression.

At a symposium exploring the dimensions of historical trauma, scholars and researchers on the Shoah shared perspectives with professors, psychologists, and others who have knowledge and experience with other peoples who have experienced (and continue to experience) oppression and victimization. Part of a series of partnered events initiated by the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in collaboration with ethnic studies programs at North American universities, the symposium brought together people who may not be in frequent conversation with one another and demonstrates what they – that is, we – have in common and what we might learn from one another.

Audience members were definitely not the "usual suspects" – folks we encounter again and again at Holocaust education programs. Although roughly half the presentations addressed Holocaust memory and survivors' experiences, only a small percentage of the audience was Jewish. This was simply a reflection of the demographics of the region. People from the local shul came, and one Jewish couple drove 12 hours from their home in North Dakota to attend. But many in the audience had little previous knowledge of the Holocaust. They were drawn to the symposium because of other interests, out of cultural curiosity or – as one student put it – because an education should push you outside your comfort zone, transform you, push you to think about things that matter deeply.

One important function of Holocaust remembrance is to create a space and time for the people targeted by the Nazis to look inward – to mourn losses and to celebrate survival. An equally important function, however, is to reach across ethnic, cultural and religious divides to engage in conversation with others. As the distinguished Israeli historian Yehuda Bauer has noted, the Holocaust is a "starting point" for thinking broadly about genocide and the impetus for taking action to resist genocide.

Instead of pitting communities against one another in a contest of comparative suffering, the conversation in Montana acknowledged the differences in historical experience by giving each history its due and looking at the details that distinguish one set of experiences from another. But it also emphasized that one can use one's own collective memory to create bridges of empathy with others and to foster understanding rather than suspicion.

Because of the geography and history of the region, a significant number of participants were native Americans whose professional work centred on the challenges facing aboriginal people; the abysmal legacy of policies, practices and attitudes that tore apart communities and families; and suppressed communal practices. While the circumstances of indigenous peoples in the United States and Canada in some ways differ, they share much. The material, psychological and cultural impact of the historical policies of both countries' governments continue to shape people's lives and the communities they inhabit.

When I was a child, my father taught math and history in inner-city schools in New York. He chose to work in these schools rather than in more affluent neighbourhoods because he believed students there needed teachers who cared about them. I remember him working on weekends to compose musical plays that he would have his students perform, to persuade them of the importance of math or to engage them with history. He would write extended lyrics set to popular Broadway tunes. If he were alive today, he would probably rap. He was drawn to these students because, like them, he had been the target of prejudice. What I learned by watching him, and what I saw in Montana, is that we're most ourselves when we reach across communities and claim our common ground. ■

Why Justin Trudeau's Canada should concern us

Michael Taube

Justin Trudeau and the Liberals, to their credit, ran a very effective campaign during the recent federal election.

Briefly, the party's political vision resonated with people. They had few errors or political gaffes to speak of. They convinced Canadian progressives that they were the best choice to replace Stephen Harper and the Tories.

When you put it all together, the Liberals deserved to win on Oct. 19. End of story.

This doesn't mean I agree with the decision of 39.47 per cent of Canadians to give the Trudeau Liberals a majority government this year (184 out of 338 seats), of course. The same way many people didn't agree with the decision of 39.62 per cent of Canadians who gave the Harper Tories a majority government four years ago (166 out of 308 seats).

That's the nature of an election in a democratic society like Canada. The voters are always perceived as being right, even when many of us think they're wrong.

As an aside, we've only had a small handful of prime ministers elected with more than 50 per cent of popular support in 42 federal elections. This short list is composed of Sir Wilfrid Laurier (1900, 1904), Sir Robert Borden (1917), William Lyon Mackenzie King (1940), John Diefenbaker (1958) and Brian Mulroney (1984). So, there's always going to be some voter disenchantment after the fact.

None of this matters, however. Trudeau is Canada's 23rd prime minister, and we'll soon find out what the new government's economic direction is. Parliament will be reconvened Dec. 3, and the speech from the throne will be released the following day.

For Canadian conservatives (yes, there are still a few of us around), the early indications are nothing short of disastrous. The size of government will substantially increase, more taxpayer dollars will be wasted, and certain components of Harper's informal 10-year plan to build a "Conservative Canada" will quickly disappear.

Don't believe me? Let's cherry-pick a few items.

The Liberals have committed to running three straight economic deficits. They'll establish a new 33 per cent tax bracket above $200,000 in taxable income. They're going to eliminate "Stephen Harper's tax breaks for the wealthy," including recent increases in contributions to tax free savings accounts. Education and textbook tax credits will be cancelled. The CBC will receive $150 million per year in new funding. Green infrastructure projects will be allocated $20 billion over 10 years. Hundreds of millions of dollars will be re-established for projects related to health care, climate change and aboriginal programs.

Look, there's no question that the Harper Tories were imperfect on the financial file. As I've mentioned many times over the years, I was often frustrated by this government's lack of commitment (at times) to fiscal conservatism.

This frustration will seem like a cakewalk compared to the Trudeau Liberals, however. Unless the two fiscal thinkers in cabinet, Finance Minister Bill Morneau and Treasury Board President Scott Brison, have some influence over the new prime minister, wasteful public spending is back in vogue in Canada.

It doesn't stop there.

There will also be massive changes to the anti-terrorism act, Bill C-51. The small, symbolic role Canada had in the war against ISIS will be ended. Trudeau's proposal to somehow bring in 25,000 Syrian refugees (a decent, but costly move) is still on the table.

We shouldn't forget Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion's declaration that Canada will, once again, be an "honest broker" in relations with Israel. Canadian Jews certainly don't have to be told what this means. They know damn well what's going to happen.

To make a long story short, Canada's widely respected leadership role under Harper in foreign policy and the war on terror will fall by the wayside. The progressive peaceniks are back in charge, alas.

If that's the Canada you want, you got it. I'll pass on the celebrations, if you don't mind. ■

Learning the lessons of political partisanship

Bernie Farber

With the election a month behind us, it's time to take stock. For the past decade, Canada has been governed from the right. The Conservative party's style was of a kind we've never seen before. Some pundits have described Stephen Harper's political management as negative and divisive. Harper himself has been called, a micro-manager and a control-freak who wanted to turn Canada hard to the right.

This mattered little for much of Canada's Jewish community. Why? Because Harper was one of the world's strongest supporters of the State of Israel. I have said of Harper that he was the best prime minister Israel never had. In this there was a kind of seduction. Historically, Canadian Jewry's advocacy groups – Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada-Israel Committee, and even B'nai Brith and Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center – always understood the first lesson of government relations was to swim in all political swimming pools. But with the advent of a prime minister who spoke so lovingly of Israel, only one swimming pool seemed to have any water.

During the last four years of Harper majority government, there was no longer even a pretense of non-partisanship. For example, last March, Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau – in an attempt to highlight Islamophobia in Canada – invoked the 1930s memory of Canada's "none is too many" mindset. Indeed, politicians must be careful when using what some would view as Nazi analogies, and we must make this clear from time to time. However, Trudeau was discussing indifference to genocide, not committing genocide itself. But the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) would have none of it, and tersely rebuked him in a harshly worded press release.

Two days later, CIJA made a complete about-face when it came to Conservative Holocaust analogies. Discussing the same anti-terror bill, then-public safety minister Steve Blaney noted that "The Holocaust did not begin in the gas chambers, it began with words" – a blatant use of the Holocaust to advance controversial, partisan legislation, focused directly on the act of genocide. CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel rushed to Blaney's defence, declaring that, in this case (given ISIS' extremism), the comparison was "not entirely out of place."

> During the last four years of Harper majority government, there was no longer even a pretense of non-partisanship

A few months later, in June, when this same government's anti-terrorism bill was given royal assent, CIJA chose to be the only organization in Canada to lend its name to a government press release supporting the legislation. Never in my memory has any Jewish advocacy organization been so obviously partisan in support of such controversial legislation. Even though many in our community may have supported it, surely a CIJA media release would have sufficed. Joining the government's official media statement was over the line.

Indeed, even during last month's election, when Trudeau and the Liberals were repeatedly vilified by some significant members of our own community with the silly notion that the party had been infiltrated by Islamic extremists, CIJA refused to counter these calumnies. It explained in an email – seen by many – that the "CRA [Canada Revenue Agency], Elections Canada and the LRA [Lobbyists Registration Act] prohibit CIJA from commenting on such things." CIJA declined to correct the record on the basis that it would be "partisan" to do so. This was clearly not the case, as CIJA well knew.

There you have it: a brief history of blatant one-sidedness that must now be undone. I'm confident Prime Minster Trudeau understands the necessity of communal engagement and will continue to participate in constructive dialogue with our community, despite the partisanship of the past. I also believe that many of our community's leaders must now realize that their understandable dedication to Israel and the Jewish People sometimes got the better of them. Hopefully, the most basic lesson has been learned by our community's advocacy professionals: there's more than one swimming pool in this country, and we must swim in them all. ■

B'nai Brith sells Alzheimer's residence

B'nai Brith Hillel of Toronto has sold One Kenton Alzheimer Centre for Excellence (One Kenton), a residence for patients suffering from various forms of dementia, as part of a restructuring that has allowed both to avoid bankruptcy – at least for now.

The 45-bed facility, which is less than half full, was acquired by One Kenton Memory Care Limited Partnership, a new entity headed by Avi Gottlieb, the president of Avcon Construction, the company that built One Kenton. Gottlieb said he has put a team in place, including Manny and Shael Simon of Eldercare Equities, who will operate the facility, and Isaac Weinroth, who will serve as its executive director. Weinroth held the same position at One Kenton when it first opened.

"I saw this as a great opportunity to give something back to the community," Gottlieb told The CJN. "It is something that is greatly needed in our community and in the general community. The facility is state of the art – I know, because I built it."

Gottlieb said he expects the new management will offer cutting-edge technology and focus on new programming, treatment and activities to ensure a high quality of life for the residents.

"The key for me is to ensure that everybody is treated with dignity and respect and that there is a seamless transition for them," Gottlieb said.

Avcon was contracted to build One Kenton, which opened in December 2013, but the company had to take a second mortgage in May 2014 when B'nai Brith Hillel ran out of money and was unable to pay them.

"They more or less forced my hand," Gottlieb said, adding it was either take the mortgage or walk away.

The second mortgage was valued at $1.6 million and was held by Avcon, Claude Ayache and Norel Electric.

The Bank of Nova Scotia (BNS) held a first mortgage of $8 million on the property, of which more than $7 million was still owing.

B'nai Brith Hillel, which shares the same Hove Street address as B'nai Brith Canada, owns the property at 1 and 3 Kenton, while One Kenton Alzheimer Centre for Excellence operates the residence.

One Kenton's financial difficulties reached a head in June. It was rapidly running out of money to pay its debts and facing the prospect of being petitioned into bankruptcy, B'nai Brith Hillel sought court protection from creditors.

In an affidavit filed in court, Michael Mostyn, who serves as CEO of One Kenton, B'nai Brith Hillel and B'nai Brith Canada, said One Kenton was facing "a liquidity crisis."

Altogether, B'nai Brith Hillel had debts in June totaling $10.9 million while One Kenton owed creditors more than $90,000. At the time, B'nai Brith Hillel and One Kenton had $67,000 in cash, but were spending $50,000 per month.

One Kenton and B'nai Brith Hillel each filed a notice of intention to make a proposal under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, which, when approved by the court, provide an automatic stay of proceedings against the creditors. A. Farber & Partners was named proposal trustee and tasked with finding a buyer of One Kenton and managing the facility's financial affairs. At the same time, BNS extended a credit facility to allow One Kenton to continue to operate.

Court has been asked on several occasions to permit extensions of the stay period. The most recent lasts until Nov. 23, when B'nai Brith Hillel and One Kenton are expected to present proposals to their creditors.

Gottlieb would not reveal the purchase price, saying only that he acquired it "free and clear."

A. Farber & Associates did not respond to email questions by The CJN's press time, and Mostyn also did not respond by press time to queries.

In acquiring One Kenton, Gottlieb acknowledged he's not an expert in running a home for Alzheimer's patients, which is why he assembled an expert operations team. But he's had personal experience of the heartache it can create. His father is experiencing the onset of dementia, and it has made him "more sensitive to it and created a bond with the family members" at One Kenton.

Looking at it from a business perspective, he said, "It's important to create a new image for the facility" and to try to close in on 100 per cent occupancy.

When One Kenton was first conceived in 2002 by former B'nai Brith Canada CEO Frank Dimant and B'nai Brith donors, it was envisioned as a 24-bed home for Alzheimer's patients. But after an adjacent property became available, it was acquired in 2006 and plans were amended to make it a 45-bed facility, Mostyn stated in an affidavit filed in court.

The facility was expected to be a state of the art, personalized facility with a staff to resident ratio of three to one.

Despite its lofty ideals, One Kenton opened with only four residents. During 2014, there were never more than 17 permanent residents in the building, and it's currently home to 19 people. To break even, the 45-bed facility would need 33 or 34 residents, Mostyn stated in an affidavit. ■

CIJA renews effort to alleviate school funding squeeze

sshefa@thecjn.ca

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) will push for public money for Jewish day schools through a newly launched task force meant to help address the affordability crisis in Jewish education.

Although lobbying the government for public support for all faith-based schools is not a new concept, Noah Shack, CIJA's director of public policy and chair of the Affordable Jewish Education Task Force, said the group will not take the same approach that has failed in the past.

"There is a recognition that core funding for Jewish education is not going to be forthcoming from the public sector any time soon, and we need to look at different near-term objectives," Shack said.

"Those can include funding for health and social service-related activities that the schools are engaged in, or security expenses that the schools have – those are the types of things we think there could be some space for the public sector to really help to alleviate the cost borne by schools and parents and to make Jewish education more affordable in that way," he added.

"Unfortunately, there is a lot of experience with initiatives to try to make education more affordable that have failed. We want to bring together as many people as possible from diverse viewpoints from across the community to co-ordinate a strategy that makes the most sense for the most people, to work together to achieve some results."

One of the groups CIJA is consulting is Grassroots for Affordable Jewish Education, formed earlier this year to help parents who can't afford Jewish education for their children.

Former CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat, a co-founder of the group, said he's encouraged the organized Jewish community is putting affordability back on the agenda. "We're going to help them if we can. It doesn't matter to us who moves the ball up the hill, as long as it's moving up the hill," Ben-Dat said.

Shack said that as the advocacy agency of the Jewish federations, CIJA will focus on the issue from a public sector perspective. "We're looking at what support the government can give to our educational institutions – what budget areas for our schools can we secure some funding for. It's not going to be for the core curriculum, but maybe for the other things that can help lower costs for the schools and lower tuition for students."

Noah Shack

Ben-Dat said one area CIJA could tackle has to do with children with disabilities attending private schools, noting that the province may not provide funding for all students who need it.

"We have two sets of regulations – one under the health act and one under the education act. Under the health act, the government pays for health support services for disabled children in private schools."

The province's School Health Support Services program includes nursing, physiotherapy, occupational therapy, speech-language pathology and dietetics.

Ben-Dat explained that when a child has a stutter, the government will pay for treatment under the health act, but if a child has a different speech impediment that's determined to be a learning disability that's categorized under the education act, the private school would be forced to cover any extra costs.

"This is an opening for us. It makes no sense to have two sets of regulations... Here we have disabled children in our backyard, and it is unconscionable that if you're under the health act, you get something, but if you're under the education act, you do not," Ben-Dat said.

"If CIJA can help recover or abate the costs for schools in this area... then that is tremendous."

Shack said the first meeting, which will be held at the end of the month, will be an opportunity to hear from community experts about how best to move forward.

"Our expectations are muted, because of our previous experiences, but the failures of the past have galvanized the people who have been involved in this struggle. I think more and more people are on the same page about how to move forward and the need to move forward in concert, together. There may not be uniformity in terms of people's opinions, but there is unity of purpose, and I think that is the key to achieving results here," Shack said. ■

JSpace panellists differ on where to draw boundaries

JODIE SHUPAC

People in the Jewish community who try to silence others who hold disparate political views about Israel was the main topic of a panel at JSpace Canada's 2015 biennial conference.

Entitled "How do we talk to each other? Do we even have the same language?" the session was one of several at the event, held Nov. 14-15 at the University of Toronto's Multi-Faith Centre.

JSpace calls itself a Jewish, pro-Israel, pro-peace group that provides "Canadians with a fair and balanced alternative to the rigidly pro-Israel right and the anti-Israel left."

Several dozen people attended the panel, moderated by Walrus editor Jonathan Kay. It featured Joan Garson, chair of the New Israel Fund of Canada (NIFC); Sara Lefton, vice-president of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA); Mira Sucharov, associate professor of political science at Carleton University and a contributor to Ha'aretz and The CJN; and Jacqueline Swartz of the Canadian Friends of Peace Now (CFPN) executive.

The speakers addressed the hostile environment during the recent federal election and the tensions that flared between supporters of former prime minister Stephen Harper and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud party, and those who vocally criticized the latter.

Though the speakers differed on whom they'd engage in discussion about Israel, they agreed that negatively labelling Jews from different positions on the political spectrum harms the community.

Garson referenced a recent incident that she said exemplified "the kind of oppression that can impair open discussion."

She said the NIFC was recently asked to organize an event in a Canadian city on the topic of pluralism. When right-wing U.S. blogger Pamela Geller heard about it, she called those involved "traitors," and the shul cancelled the event. "They were bullied," Garson said.

Kay said to Lefton that CIJA is accused of being "monolithic" and asked her about censorship in the community. Lefton said she's regularly accused of being "a shill for the Conservatives, a shill for the Liberals and a shill for the NDP."

She said CIJA was similarly concerned about the divisiveness and abusiveness during the election, and said it seemed "everybody felt they were being attacked."

Kay replied that he sensed it was people on the left who felt particularly attacked due to "the combination of the Tories being in power and the mainstream, muscularly pro-Zionist community being empowered by that," as well as "the rhetorical factors that created the line of 'If you're not for Netanyahu, maybe you're on the wrong side of the war on terror.'"

Sucharov said CIJA has been accused of partisanship because of "the tone it has helped promote – though CIJA didn't create the tone – which says there's only one way to engage with Israel and to be a loyal Jewish community member," and that CIJA tapped into the Conservatives' "binary view of the world," which included a "Likud-led Israel as the right way to proceed."

Sucharov, who said she's often called "a self-loathing Jew," noted "quiet corners of shunning" in the community, such as when parents in a bar and bat mitzvah group she recently organized told her they didn't feel comfortable with having her in their home because of a column she wrote on Israel.

Lefton said CIJA encourages diverse opinions, but draws a line at boycotts, divestment and sanctions (BDS) against Israel. "Our starting point is that we want to work with groups who believe in the existence of Israel as a Jewish state, and we won't work with groups who threaten that," she said.

Swartz said Peace Now opposes BDS, but supports labelling goods from the territories, which it sees as "a counterweight to BDS, because then we clearly demarcate sovereign Israel from the occupied territories, and we want people to buy goods from Israel." ■

Anti-domestic violence group names first male chair

sshefa@thecjn.ca

For the first time in its history, Act To End Violence Against Women (ATEVAW), a non-profit organization that serves women victims of domestic abuse, appointed a man to sit as chair of the board.

Mark Anshan, a lawyer with more than 25 years experience helping government agencies, non-profit and for-profit organizations, said having a man serving in this role sends a message to the community that this is more than a women's issue.

"This particular subject is a societal issue. It is not an issue that only women should be concerned about. We should all be concerned about it and involved in it. Since, I think, in some sectors of our society and life it is somewhat male-dominated in terms of policy making and influencing outcomes, it is important for men to step up and get involved in issues that are causing severe heartache and problems within our community," Anshan said.

Penny Krowitz, executive director of ATEVAW, which works mostly, but not exclusively, with Jewish women and operates a kosher women's shelter, said that although this is a noteworthy development, Anshan's appointment didn't raise many eyebrows within the organization.

"We all recognize that men need to be involved, walking with women and working with women, to solve this issue," Krowitz said.

"One of the huge skills that Mark brings to the table, in addition to his vast community involvement – currently he's on boards of other organizations – he has also worked in government on policy. He has a number of connections to government, and understands how government works. In the coming months we hope to meet with different ministers and different people in government whose roles will have, or could have, an impact on the issue of violence – the minister of justice, the minister of health."

Krowitz added that she is confident Anshan will help ATEVAW advocate for women who are victims of domestic violence and educate people who have influence in the government to better understand what it is like for people who are struggling to break free from a life of violence.

"There's a cost to society when it comes to violence against women. I think the government is becoming sensitive to it. There is a huge cost to society in terms of welfare agencies and social services and health care," said Anshan, who served as director and treasurer for the Micah Homes Non-Profit Housing Corporation owned by Holy Blossom Temple, during the planning and construction of a housing project for disadvantaged single-parent families.

He said educating the community about violence against women and removing the stigma associated with it is essential to solving the issue.

"Think of other social issues that have occurred over decades or generations, for example, homosexuality. There was a time when that was taboo and no one talked about it. People who were gay felt they were living in an unsafe environment and couldn't come forward. Now that has changed dramatically," he said.

"It's the same thing here. When people feel like they have a safe environment and a safe society, they can come forward and seek help and deal with their issues, and the greater community is accepting that this needs to be dealt with. That probably goes a long way to solving the problem earlier on, with early intervention, so women aren't physically or psychologically hurt for a longer period of time. The sooner you can help them, the sooner they can get on with their lives."

Krowitz said although leadership roles within the group are now open to men, the focus of its work is still solely on women. "I don't deny that men are abused. That is a fact and we know that, but our expertise and our work is with women."

Anshan said his goal is a society that doesn't need this kind of a service. "If we could ultimately solve the big problem that we're dealing with, organizations like this shouldn't have to exist. Governments shouldn't have to expend resources to bring in new policies, new legislation, for this very serious problem. So until you get there, we have to do all we can to get to that point, which means advocacy, education and helping on an individual basis." ■

Reform to focus on inclusion, social justice, leader says

jshupac@thecjn.ca

"Audacious hospitality" and social justice are among the key priorities that the Union for Reform Judaism (URJ), which represents and supports Reform Jewish congregations and communities primarily in North America and Israel, is focusing on going forward.

On the heels of its 2015 biennial meeting, held in Florida in early November and attended by about 5,000 Reform Jewish leaders from around North America and Israel, the president of the New York City-based URJ, Rabbi Rick Jacobs, will be visiting Ontario Nov. 20 to 22.

He'll be meeting with several local congregations and sharing some of the highlights of the biennial, which establishes the URJ's agenda for the year, and what he said were "critical and exciting opportunities we have to strengthen Jewish life here in North America."

In addition to finding ways to keep people already involved in Reform Judaism engaged across generations, Rabbi Jacobs said the movement will be looking for avenues to open doors to those interested in becoming involved.

For example, Reform is conscious of being inclusive of those who might not otherwise feel included in Jewish institutional spaces such as synagogues. "The idea of 'audacious hospitality' extends to LGBT people, millennials, people with disabilities, and looks at how we can help move people from the periphery to the centre, to meet people where they are," he said.

Further, he stressed the movement's intention to welcome interfaith couples and families. He pointed to recent research from Brandeis University showing that millennials raised in interfaith families who've been brought up in synagogues and Jewish youth movements often show a strong commitment to, and knowledge of, Judaism.

"So interfaith inclusion and outreach works. It changes the demographic trajectory for a Jewish life. Since the late 1970s, our movement has showed that when we do outreach to interfaith families well, it succeeds," Rabbi Jacobs said.

He clarified that the URJ supports the right of individual rabbis to make up their minds about officiating at interfaith weddings, and while in Canada, Reform rabbis have largely decided not to do so, in the United States, it's a question that each rabbi confronts.

"We're clear that no matter a rabbi's stance on officiating, there are concrete ways that we as a Reform community can draw close [interfaith] families and not make them feel they're outside of Jewish life," he said.

Rabbi Rick Jacobs

In addition to inclusion, Rabbi Jacobs emphasized social justice as a fundamental URJ priority, one that both brings people into Jewish life and fulfils the Torah obligation to "love thy neighbour."

American Reform congregations have been part of the push to get the U.S. Congress to raise the number of refugees it allows into the country, he said.

When the Syrian refugee crisis became a major public issue earlier this year, Rabbi Jacobs said Canadian Reform congregations were "visionary in their response," showing a real commitment to sponsoring refugee families.

"I've spoken about, and will speak in Canada about, tikkun olam as the largest gateway for most Jewish people to come into Jewish life... We're looking at how Jewish life doesn't just make social activism possible but can really inspire it... Like, say, if a commitment caring for refugees is sustained by a Shabbat experience that renews one's optimism and commitment to Judaism."

He said traditional Judaism too often leaves out tikkun olam, and the URJ believes it's important to integrate the latter into spiritual and communal Jewish life.

"It's sometimes only about not leaving chametz out or kashrut... But we're looking at, how do we make society kosher? We want to be engaging not just to young people searching for spiritual identity but also to people looking for more meaning and depth in their daily lives."

Rabbi Jacobs will be giving a keynote address at a community Shabbat Nov. 20 at Temple Sinai Congregation. On Nov. 21, he'll be at Solel Congregation in Mississauga to install Rabbi Audrey Pollock as its new senior rabbi. Later that day, he'll travel to Temple Anshe Sholom in Hamilton, and on Nov. 22, he'll speak at Holy Blossom Temple, and later in the day, he'll visit Oakville's Shaarei Beth-El. ■

Jewish man wins rights case against Jewish boss

JANICE ARNOLD

The Quebec human rights commission has upheld a Jewish hairdresser's complaint that he was discriminated against by his Jewish employer because he was forced not to work on Shabbat.

It's believed to be the first time the commission has ruled on, or possibly even heard, a case of a dispute between parties of the same religion.

Richard Zilberg, who was a stylist and colourist at Spa OraZen on Queen Mary Road, went to the Quebec Human Rights and Youth Rights Commission after he was fired allegedly for not complying with the owners' demand that he cease coming in to work on Friday evenings and Saturdays.

The business is open at that time, but its observant principal owner Iris Gressy, who is named in the complaint, does not work there on Shabbat.

The commission recommended on Oct. 6 that Zilberg be compensated by the spa for damages totalling $2,000 to $12,500 for material damages for loss of income and other hardship, and $5,000 for moral damages. An additional $2,500 was also awarded for punitive damages for intentional violation of his civil rights.

The spa owners didn't comply with a subpoena to appear before the commission and didn't otherwise respond to its investigators, said Fo Niemi, executive director of CRARR (the Centre for Research-Action on Race Relations, a non-profit organization founded in 1983 to advocate for victims of discrimination and promote tolerance.)

The spa did not pay Zilberg the recommended damages by the Oct. 23 deadline, and the case will now go before the Quebec Human Rights Tribunal, which is a court.

Zilberg appeared with Niemi at a Nov. 10 press conference to discuss the case. CRARR has been helping Zilberg navigate the commission process.

"When I as a Jew am discriminated against by another Jew, to the point of losing my job, income and dignity, that is completely intolerable," Zilberg stated. "There is no excuse for discrimination based on religion, even if that person is of the same faith."

Zilberg, who has about 30 years experience in hairdressing in Montreal and Ottawa, was hired by the spa in October 2011. He worked an average 30 hours a week, usually including on Saturday, because it was one of the busiest days.

He told the commission that in July 2011 the owners (Gressy had a partner at the time) told him verbally he was no longer allowed to work on Shabbat because he's Jewish, and Jews aren't permitted by their religion to work at that time. They justified keeping the spa open on Shabbat to him by saying that profits were given to charity. Non-Jewish employees continued to work as before.

Zilberg, who stressed that he is proud of his Jewish faith, although he is not Shomer Shabbat, said he was shocked and angered by this change in policy. It meant a reduction in his working hours as well as an affront to his religious freedom. He complied in order to keep his job.

He alleges his dismissal a month later was because he expressed his feelings of unfairness to several of the spa's numerous Jewish customers. He understands that at least one of them then mentioned this disapprovingly to the owners.

The owners, he said, had warned him not to discuss this matter with the clientele and to just say Saturday was now his day off.

He is aware of only one other Jewish employee at the spa during the time he was there, he said, a young woman assisting in the tanning salon. She apparently was also told not to come in on Shabbat, so she quit, he said.

Zilberg said that not only did he lose his job, but also most of his clients. Today, he works at another salon. He filed the complaint with the commission in December 2012. He initially didn't know where, or if, he should take action against what he believed was a clear case of discrimination on the basis of religion. "Deep down I knew this was not right, but I didn't know the law or what my options were," he said.

Zilberg said his dismissal hurt him financially and psychologically, and even affected his health. He said he agreed to speak out publicly because he wants others to know about their rights and recourse if they are infringed upon.

Niemi, a co-founder of CRARR, said this is the first case of "intrafaith" discrimination he is aware of coming before the commission. It's also be one of the few cases involving Jewish individuals brought before the tribunal in the last 20 years, Niemi said.

The tribunal will likely first try to mediate a settlement, Niemi said. If it can't, the case will go to trial and it will probably be months before a decision is reached. ■

Kristallnacht event marks Philippine rescue of Jews

On Nov. 9, Winnipeg's Jewish community once again commemorated Kristallnacht – the "Night of Broken Glass – the infamous night in 1938 when the Nazis ratcheted up the violence and persecution of Germany's Jewish community to a new level. But this year, the program focused on a different part of the world: the Philippines.

"At a time when everything looked so bleak, particularly for the Jewish communities in Germany and Austria, when all countries doors were closed to them, there was a light in the East," said Shelley Faintuch, community relations director for the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and associate director of local partner services for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs. "It was only the Philippines that was prepared to offer a haven to Jews fleeing Nazi persecution."

It was a full house as the Jewish community was joined by 50 representatives of Winnipeg's 70,000-strong Filipino community at the Berney Theatre to commemorate Kristallnacht and thank the Philippines for saving some 1,200 to 1,300 German and Austrian Jews in 1939.

The short version of what happened – as shown in the documentary Rescue in the Philippines – was that the rescue was a joint effort of Manuel Quezon, the first president of the Philippines; American High Commissioner Paul McNutt, who defied the U.S. State Department by issuing U.S. visas to Jews trying to leave Germany and Austria; Col. (later Gen.) Dwight Eisenhower, the U.S. military commander in the Philippines (which had been under American rule until about five years earlier); and five Jewish American brothers – the Frieder brothers, who were based in Cincinnati, but had extensive business interests in the Philippines. The brothers were also the recognized leaders of the pre-war Manila Jewish community, which numbered about 50, mainly American, families.

While the Philippines was prepared to welcome many more Jewish refugees – up to 30,000, as the documentary noted –rescue efforts ended suddenly with the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor on Dec. 7, 1941, and subsequent Japanese conquest of the Philippines. Fortunately for the Jewish refugees, their German and Austrian passports protected them from the Japanese forces, who viewed them as citizens of an allied country. Their lives were only endangered when the Japanese went on a killing spree near war's end.

The hour-long film was the central feature of the Kristallnacht program. It was preceded by short remarks by Jewish Federation of Winnipeg president David Kroft and Orli Marcelino, consul general of the Philippines in Winnipeg. As well, memorial candles were lit prior to the screening.

The Philippines' role in providing a safe haven for German and Austrian Jews has been little known up to now, not only in the wider world, but even among Filipinos. "I could find very few articles about this," said Faintuch, who organized the Kristallnacht program with assistant Rhonda Prepes.

Even Rod Cantiveros, co-chair for the evening along with longtime friend Larry Vickar, didn't know about the episode until long after coming to Canada in 1975.

"I taught history at the University of Santo Tomas in the Philippines before coming to Canada," said the founding editor of Winnipeg's Filipino Journal. "I knew that the Japanese had turned the university into a concentration camp and that some Jewish refugees were interned there. But the rescue of Jewish refugees was never taught as part of Philippine history. It is a missing chapter in our history."

Cantiveros first learned about the rescue efforts in the 1990s, when his late wife wrote an article about it. He has since read a memoir by one of the children of those Jewish refugees. He noted that in the 1990s, a monument was erected in Rishon Lezion to mark the Philippines' rescue efforts, with the grandson of Manuel Quezon in attendance.

Vickar, a business and community leader, has long been a supporter of Winnipeg's Filipino community and has also funded projects in the Philippines (and Israel). "The Jewish community owes the Philippines a vote of thanks for being righteous among the nations," he said.

The evening concluded with Vickar and Cantiveros jointly unveiling a plaque recognizing the Philippines for providing shelter to German and Austrian Jews in 1939. ■

GUEST VOICE

It's time to bring back Canadian Jewish Congress

Zach Paikin and James Gutman

In the recent federal election, we witnessed the continuation of a trend that has been apparent within Canada's Jewish community for the past several years: division between the left and the right.

Division isn't a bad thing when it is accompanied by meaningful and respectful dialogue. The problem today is that our community is in the midst of a dialogue of the deaf. There is very little overlap between the policy priorities, general worldviews and public pronouncements of the Canadian Jewish left and right.

Our community is in need of a political institution that can unite Jewish Canadians from across the spectrum. Instead of polarization and cacophony, we need a vehicle that truly reflects our community's diversity. That is why we are calling for the re-establishment of an elected Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

For most of its history, the CJC was a truly democratic and representative organization. Just like Canada itself, the organization was a parliamentary democracy formed of several regional components. Each region was allocated a certain number of representatives based on the size of their local Jewish population.

Every three years, elections would be held, in which every member of the Jewish community – above the age of 18 and in good standing with their local United Jewish Appeal – would vote for their representatives on the CJC executive. The executive was, in effect, the Canadian Jewish community's parliament.

In its heyday, the executive boasted nearly 160 individuals. On a triennial cycle, it would meet in a plenary session to vote for the CJC's officers, which included a president, a chair and sitting representative officers of each region. This smaller group of officers ran the day-to-day affairs of the CJC, while ultimately remaining accountable to the executive.

Later on in its history, after the CJC was incorporated into the umbrella organization that would eventually become known as the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), its democratic component largely faded away. This was an unfortunate development, as it gave grounds for many to criticize the organization as being too focused on progressive causes and not enough on Israel- and Jewish-specific issues.

Similarly, many progressive and centrist Jews believe today that their community's leading advocacy organizations are too Israel-centric and thus unrepresentative of the political diversity of Canadian Jewry. This is why the re-establishment of an elected, democratic CJC is so important. We need to build a Jewish community in which all feel welcome.

If we fail to bring our community's present-day polarization to an end, there could be significant long-term consequences. Growing numbers of Jewish Canadians will feel increasingly alienated from their community's leadership and institutions, an alienation they may pass on to the next generation. Some may end up feeling the divide so strongly that they will fail to give their children a Jewish education.

In much of the Diaspora, preserving and nourishing Jewish identity is one of our community's paramount and most difficult challenges. Community is one of the bedrocks of Jewish life. We cannot let our personal ideological preferences get in the way of building a Canadian Jewish community that will remain strong, welcoming and forward-looking over the long term.

Do not misunderstand our position: the work that CIJA does on Israel-related and other issues is professional, important and needs to continue. The connection between Canadian Jewry and Israel is strong, and we need an organization that will help to ensure that the Canada-Israel friendship remains a durable one.

But ultimately, for the sake of the long-term health of the Canadian Jewish community, we need to establish an advocacy organization that is democratic, multi-faceted and representative of our community's many voices and passions. Our community can band together to tackle domestic and international issues, in accordance with both spiritual and secular values. Our love for Israel and our devotion to other causes need not be mutually exclusive.

The choice with which our community is presented is clear. If both left-leaning and right-leaning Jewish Canadians continue to place ideology over unity, then public perception of our community will worsen, and the pillars that support it will weaken. We need to recognize and embrace our community's diversity of opinion, and channel that diversity into something rich and positive with the help of a truly representative institution.

We need to bring back an elected, democratic Canadian Jewish Congress. ■

Zach Paikin is a columnist for The Hill Times. James Gutman is a Jewish educator and community organizer.

Kamloops JCC organizes activities for community

Kamloops kids decorate masks for Purim.

First of a six-part series on small Jewish communities across Canada.

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Kamloops, a town of about 90,000 people in the arid interior of British Columbia, boasts a first-class hospital, a university, dozens of churches, but no synagogue or rabbi, despite the presence of probably hundreds of Jews in the region. Seven years ago, about 50 local Jewish families joined together to form the Jewish Community Centre of Kamloops.

The JCCK has no bricks-and-mortar headquarters, but it has plenty of enthusiasm. Its president is Heidi Coleman, a fundraising professional who arrived from Montreal three years ago when she accepted a professional posting as CEO of the Royal Inland Hospital Foundation. When JCCK members found that she has a strong Jewish background and could read Hebrew, they asked her to become president.

Jews in large cities may find it difficult to imagine living without the Jewish infrastructure we usually take for granted. But in Kamloops, those who want a kosher brisket may have to drive to Kelowna or Vancouver, two and four hours away, respectively.

The Target store in Kamloops used to sell dreidels at Chanukah, but it closed, so there's no local supplier for dreidels – nor for menorahs, Shabbat candles, Hebrew books or other necessities and accoutrements of Jewish life. People travel frequently to Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal and Israel, and bring back supplies. Kosher wine, however, may be ordered locally at British Columbia Liquor Commission outlets.

The Jewish community arranges Friday night dinners, Shabbatons and communal holiday meals in people's homes. "For the High Holidays, we just did a nice Rosh Hashanah dinner at a couple's house," Coleman said. "The focus is very much on the kids. The parents want their children to learn about and understand what the holidays are about, and why we blow the shofar and dip the honey.

"On Yom Kippur, people were on their own. We didn't have a formal break of the fast. People who wanted to go to synagogue drove to Kelowna."

On Sukkot, the Jewish families organized a meal in a sukkah on a farm – "definitely different, but great." Last Passover, they made a seder in a restaurant that brought in matzah. In years past, various people have shared in the cooking. "One guy wanted to do a Passover seder on campus with his friends, so I lent him some Haggadot."

A former director of UJA in Ottawa and a more recent fundraiser for a Montreal hospital, Coleman said that the Royal Inland Hospital has attracted a number of Jewish doctors from Toronto and Vancouver, and Thompson River University has likewise attracted a range of academics from various cities.

"Kamloops is just a small town with no traffic. A lot of people come here to get away from the rush of the big city, the housing prices and the traffic."

The JCCK executive meets monthly to plan cultural events such as Jewish-themed lectures and movie screenings. They're no less active when it comes to tzedakah and tikkun olam. Recently, the Jewish community began fundraising with other groups to support two families of Syrian refugees at a cost of $15,000 per family. They're due to arrive within four to six months.

Coleman hasn't encountered any local anti-Semitism, but says there is an anti-Israel campaign emanating from the large Arab contingent at the university. "UIA Canada has brought in good lecturers, and the lectures are well attended. Pro and anti people go and ask questions. Overall, I find there's a great love of Israel here. You do see some anti-Israel expression on campus, but nothing strong and nothing that permeates the city."

As JCCK president, she has been asked to lecture on "Judaism 101" to a seniors group later this year. She's also assisting a Catholic church group to plan an interfaith trip to Israel. "We're much more visible in the community in the past three years, so I've been told," she said. ■

Holy Blossom panel to explore Jewish-Muslim relations

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Karen Mock, former CEO of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, former national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada and a member of Holy Blossom Temple, says her email inbox is often full of messages from Jewish people who "spread stereotypes and promote fear of Muslims and Arabs, and of Islam in general."

Jews know the impact of prejudice and stereotyping probably more than any other people, Mock stressed, so, "recognizing and countering Islamophobia – the Muslim equivalent to anti-Semitism – should be a priority for our community."

Mock is one of several speakers who will be participating in an interfaith panel at Holy Blossom Nov. 26 about Jewish-Muslim relations.

Titled "We Refuse to Be Enemies," the event is being presented by Holy Blossom and The CJN. In addition to Mock, it will feature Holy Blossom's associate rabbi, Michael Satz; CJN editor Yoni Goldstein,; Shahid Akhtar, founding co-chair of the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims; and Alia Hogben, executive director of the Canadian Council of Muslim Women.

Rabbi Michael Satz

Mock, who helped the synagogue co-ordinate the event, said she recommended Akhtar and Hogben as speakers because of their experience with, and commitment to, interfaith dialogue, as well as to ensure gender balance on the panel.

She said planning for the event began as anti-Muslim feeling in Canada spread, triggered by the recent debate about women wearing the niqab during the Canadian citizenship swearing-in ceremony.

Rabbi Satz said Holy Blossom has a long history of working with other religious groups and wants to show that Muslims and Jews in Canada are "in this together" and need to find common ground in order to make the community and the world a better place.

Hogben, whose organization promotes equality and empowerment for Canadian Muslim women, said it uses education, interfaith programming and distribution of resource kits to fight issues such as domestic violence and to help Muslim women integrate into mainstream Canadian society.

Further, it seeks to educate people about the organization's interpretation of Islam as a religion that believes in equality, social justice and compassion.

"I'm honoured to be invited to the synagogue. That they would invite and welcome a Canadian Muslim woman, I think that's pretty wonderful, and I think it's crucial that people of faith come together. There are differences between us, but it's important to build on the similarities and see what we can do to work together," Hogben said.

Mock emphasized that while anti-Muslim feelings in the Jewish community sometimes occur in response to events in the Middle East, the conflict in Israel is "political, not religious," and that for Jewish-Muslim dialogue programs to be effective, it's important to put aside political issues initially, until people have developed a relationship.

"Later, we find ways to help non-Jews understand the centrality of Israel to many Jews in the Diaspora and at the same time acknowledge that criticism of Israeli policies and practices is not anti-Semitic. We help both sides to understand the contexts [of where the other is coming from] and also how to recognize when that criticism becomes vilification and crosses the line into anti-Semitism."

Ultimately, she said, it's important for people of all faiths to work together to defeat terrorism and the promotion of all forms of discrimination and hatred.

"Jewish people have been at the forefront of this kind of work and should take a leadership role in assisting people to know their neighbours and to promote the idea that most Muslims hold the same ideals we do. It's the extremists that we need to marginalize – in all communities," Mock said. ■

Ve'ahavta gala honours leaders and humanitarians

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Until a few years ago, Bob, 40, never imagined he would be homeless, but a personal crisis launched him into a tailspin that saw him experience serious psychological and financial straits, including homelessness.

A housing counsellor recommended he apply for the Ve'ahavta Street Academy (VSA), an eight-week program geared to marginally housed and vulnerable individuals. One of a number of programs Ve'ahavta runs to help vulnerable people, the VSA provides pre-employment and life skills as a way to reduce marginalization, social isolation and long-term unemployment.

Bob said he'd been looking for "a positive way out," and the VSA, which he completed last year, gave him just that.

By the time he graduated, he had secured stable employment as venue support staff at an event space, a job he still holds today.

Bob was one of more than 600 guests who attended Ve'ahavta's Starry Nights Tikkun Olam Awards Ceremony, held at Koerner Hall Nov. 12 to celebrate individuals the organization has identified as community leaders and humanitarians, and raise money for Ve'ahavta programs.

"I came tonight because I wanted to be in touch with the organization that has helped me so much and see what kind of role I can play with them in future," Bob said.

The event included a dinner reception, addresses by community figures such as Bernie Farber, Ve'ahavta chair; Consul General of Israel DJ Schneeweiss; and Avrum Rosensweig, president and CEO of Ve'ahavta, as well as a live auction, the presentation of various awards and performances by bands Digging Roots and Jaffa Road.

The master of ceremony for the evening was Shad, a Canadian hip-hop artist and host of the CBC Radio One program q.

The recipients of the Tikkun Olam awards were as follows:

- The Emerging Leader award went to Laura Grosman, a young woman who, at age 18, drafted a private member's bill in Parliament to have Canada build a national Holocaust monument.
- The Humanitarian award went to Kathy Laszlo and Susie Sukol, co-founders of DANI, an organization that creates opportunities for young adults with physical and/or cognitive challenges.
- The Bridging Community award went to Patti Falus, president of CEO of Barter Network, a business-to-business trading network.
- The Lasting Legacy award went to Holocaust survivor Hedy Bohm, who has shared her story of survival with thousands of young people.
- The Community Visionary award went to Michael Dan, a philanthropist and former neurosurgeon who in 2014 donated $10 million to the University of Toronto's Dalla Lana School of Public Health to create an institute that will study health issues in Canada's aboriginal population.

Rosensweig, who founded Ve'ahavta, said the gala helps raise about one-third of the organization's overall budget, and this year it raised around $550,000. "When you have a gala like this... it becomes like a family where you're all celebrating the same thing – in this case that's tikkun olam – repairing the world – and Ve'ahavta... To see that something I started up 19 years ago still exists and that it exists in such a beautiful way, that's so special to me personally," he said.

Shad told The CJN that the gala was the first Jewish community event he's hosted.

"I'm a religious person myself, so I always appreciate when people make that connection between their faith and where they came from and the world at large, as well as seeing the imperative to contribute something positive." ■

GUEST VOICE

An eight-point plan to help Syrian refugees

Michael Diamond

There are considerable risks in bringing large numbers of Syrian refugees to Canada without due care. Those risks arise from the fact that these refugees would be chosen from a group that has lived in a part of the world where many have been taught to despise the West, Israel, Jews and Christians and to consider violence an acceptable approach to achieving one's goals.

And while our hearts naturally go out to the innocents among them, especially the children who are the biggest losers in the Syrian debacle, it is not just children we are looking to include in the 25,000 refugees Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has committed to bringing into Canada over the next short period. It is adults, too, most peace loving and good people, some perhaps not.

The government requires institutions or individuals who wish to adopt a refugee family of four to raise $27,000 to cover first-year costs. Those costs do not include medical and dental care, nor the costs of education and the like. Accordingly, the cost to support a refugee family of four will be many times higher than $27,000 per annum over time. Canadians appear to be open to that investment, but should be made aware of the costs.

Given the moral and now political inevitability of accepting refugees, the question becomes: how can the federal government do so in a way that reduces the risk of discord and danger to Canadian citizens?

We only need to see the impact of massive immigration, poorly managed, in Europe – the costs in terms of dollars, social upheaval, discord, and in some cases death and injury are material and only getting worse. To avoid that outcome, I believe a focus on risk reduction is required. The responsibility of any government is, first, to the security and safety of the people it represents, and only then to humankind in general. This government intends to admit large numbers of refugees – it has an obligation to take our security into account in how it does so.

The government should follow these rules to reduce risk:

1. Don't be in a hurry. Do the job properly, or don't do it at all. It benefits no one – and it endangers Canadians – to bring refugees to a new place and cast them adrift without a clear plan of integration.

2. Choose only families with young children. Their children are at the greatest risk, present the least risk, and have the most to gain from a move to Canada.

> The responsibility of any government is, first, to the security and safety of the people it represents

3. Review the background of adult refugees, including parents, carefully. Look for associations with jihadist or extremist groups. If identity is unclear, avoid those people. Any sense of bad association must eliminate the possibility of admission to Canada.

4. Do not afford refugees the right to bring additional family members to Canada. Let's not "double up" with a commitment to add to the challenges if things don't go well. If things go well, those rules can always be relaxed.

5. Ensure that every family is adopted by institutions or individuals. An adopted family is far more likely to be successful in Canada, and therefore happy and productive, not angry and/or violent.

6. Reduce the $27,000 barrier to adopting a family of four. The government should match moneys raised dollar for dollar, in order to achieve the desired outcome of maximizing the number of adopted families.

7. Choose from groups that are most at risk. Yazidis, Christians and Kurds are at the greatest risk, because they are aggressively persecuted by the Muslim majority in many refugee camps.

8. Where refugees are Muslims, ensure they specifically agree to live among Jews and Christians under Canadian, not sharia, law.

We need a refugee program that is sensible, that involves Canadians directly (as was the case with the Vietnamese boat people), that provides government support, and that moves only at a pace which allows for processes that minimize the risk. If we do this properly, Canada can set the example for the world. If we do not, we must hold this government accountable for putting haste ahead of our safety. ■

Early marriages seen in talmudic times, expert says

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Tirzah Meacham

Marrying off young girls occurred among Jewish families in the mishnaic and talmudic periods.

Tirzah Meacham, associate professor of near and Middle Eastern civilizations at the University of Toronto, made the point Nov. 10 at a conference titled "The Jewish Family," sponsored by the Jewish Law Association, U of T's Anne Tanenbaum Centre for Jewish Studies and York University's Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies. It was held at U of T and attended by several dozen people.

Meacham's was among the handful of presentations by academics from around North America who gathered to discuss intersections between Jewish and civil law, including gender relations, marriage and divorce.

Meacham, whose research includes talmudic and rabbinic literature, and Judaism and feminism, discussed conflicts between Halachah and civil law on the age of marriage.

She countered an argument made by Bar-Ilan University professor Adiel Schremer, who claimed that in Jewish Palestine of the Hellenistic and Roman periods, girls married well into their teens, while in surrounding cultures, such as Babylonia, they married around age 13.

Meacham said Schremer's study relied on tombstone inscriptions found in Rome, Hellenistic Egypt and Palestine, which noted a woman's marital age. This evidence is problematic, Meacham argued, because graves of middle and lower class Jews were likely marked with less detail, limiting the "sample size" to wealthy families.

She said the Torah says a Jewish father had the right to marry off his daughter from her day of birth until what was considered the age of majority – "12 years, six months and a day." Only if a daughter became widowed or divorced did a father lose the right to marry her to another man.

The multitude of mishnaic and Toseftim texts that discuss issues related to the marriage of female minors – including virginity, hymeneal and menstrual blood – indicate, Meacham argued, that "we must conclude that marriage of younger girls existed in the mishnaic and talmudic periods."

She said the typical age of betrothal, if not marriage, was probably before 12-1/2. After that age, a father lost the authority to annul his daughter's vows and the legal right to her handiwork or profits she brought to the household, including the bride price.

"Because a father was obligated, at least morally, to provide a daughter's dowry [even beyond age 12]… it's likely that in situations of marginal economics, the father would use the bride price to help dower his daughter," Meacham said. This means that families not part of elite or rabbinic circles likely married off daughters before 13, and rabbinic discussion suggests that even some in the latter camp sometimes did.

Meacham said the problem has persisted, in some ways, in contemporary Israel, noting some ultra-Orthodox groups' resistance several years ago to Israel changing its legal age of marriage from 17 to 18.

She closed with a question: "What do we do about an ancient legal practice that's halachically binding but against civil law and all norms about child welfare?" ■

Canada's oldest Reform shul celebrates 165 years

ABIGAIL CUKIER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, HAMILTON

At 165 years old, Temple Anshe Sholom is Canada's oldest Reform congregation, and its clergy and lay leadership weren't going to let the anniversary pass without a celebration.

The Hamilton, Ont., synagogue started over a store on James Street South in 1850, when the city's 16 Jewish families formed the Hebrew Benevolent Society Anshe Sholom of Hamilton. They purchased land for a cemetery and incorporated in 1863. In 1882, they built the city's first synagogue at 143 Hughson St. S. In 1952, they raised funds and built a new shul at the corner of King Street West and what was then called Cline Crescent. They added a new wing, including a school section, in 1963.

Temple Anshe Sholom still stands there today.

"There have been challenging times, but that vision of coming together as a congregation has always been important," said Ginny Jones, who has been a member for 27 years. "To come together and learn together is our mandate. There is a real commitment to being a community, being a congregation."

Jones is on the committee for the temple's anniversary celebration, to be held Nov. 21. It will include a 3 p.m. service in the main sanctuary with guest Rabbi Rick Jacobs, president of the Union for Reform Judaism, followed by a kiddush. At 6 p.m., will be a black-tie optional evening of cocktails, dinner and dancing at Liuna Station at 360 James St. N. The gala will also celebrate the 95th birthday of Rabbi Bernard Baskin and Rabbi Jordan Cohen's 25th year as a pulpit rabbi. Proceeds will benefit the temple, including the dedication of the main sanctuary in honour of Rabbi Baskin's birthday.

Rabbi Baskin led the congregation from 1949 to 1989, and under his leadership, the congregation grew from 100 to 475 families. Rabbi Baskin, a former long-time CJN books columnist, is widely recognized for his interfaith work, for which he received a B'nai Brith Humanitarian Award. He was also voted into the Hamilton Gallery of Distinction, and received an honorary doctor of laws degree from McMaster University and an honorary doctor of divinity degree from Hebrew Union College - Jewish Institute of Religion. As the temple's rabbi emeritus, he has remained very active in the community and is a highly respected speaker and writer.

Hamilton's Temple Anshe Shalom

"So many have looked to Rabbi Baskin over the years as not only an inspiration, but a bit of a guide," Jones said. "He has an enormous following, and not just in the Jewish community. He has tremendous intellect but always made his messages very simple and accessible."

After Rabbi Baskin retired, Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz followed. During his tenure, he hired a full-time educator and worked to revitalize the school. He introduced the increased use of Hebrew, as well as innovations to make services and ritual observance more engaging for people of all ages and backgrounds.

Nine years ago, Rabbi Jordan Cohen took over the pulpit. He leads with the values of education, social justice, egalitarianism and congregational participation in prayer and leadership. The congregation stands today at about 350 families.

"There is a strong sense of the temple's history. We have five-generation families and members who have grown up here. There is a wonderful sense of connection," Rabbi Cohen said. "History can be weighty, with the mindset of 'we've always done it that way' while battling changes in Reform Judaism. We have to try to facilitate the exciting and progressive changes in our movement while honouring that history."

And while celebrating this momentous anniversary, the temple isn't resting on its laurels. Jones said a vision committee has worked with the congregation to create a 10-year plan for the synagogue.

"We are intentional about working toward that vision, of being inclusive, active and engaging," she said. "We really have a lot of reasons to celebrate." ■

Cancer survivor raises funds for chemotherapy research

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When Yaron Panov was diagnosed with an aggressive and rare form of cancer, he was given six months to live.

In searching for treatment options for his soft tissue sarcoma, Panov and his wife, Dr. Rochelle Schwartz, discovered Champions Oncology, an innovative, precision chemotherapy program based in Baltimore and Israel.

Champions implanted Panov's tumour cells and surrounding tissue into mice avatars, and then different chemotherapy drugs were tested on them. The course of treatment most effective on these mouse tumours was then used for Panov.

Fast forward 5-1/2 years, and Panov was telling his story at a fundraiser on Oct. 28 that kicked off the campaign for the Panov 2 sarcoma research initiative at Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto.

"Against all odds, I saw my sons graduate," Panov told the 85 people who gathered at the home of Barry and Varda Feiner that evening. "Maybe I'll see my sons get married and I'll even meet my grandchildren."

Many of the people in attendance were major donors to the first Panov program for targeted chemotherapy. They were on hand to celebrate, because the campaign to raise $1 million for the Panov Program for Precision Chemotherapy had just reached its goal, and its first clinical research initiative was about to get started.

Yaron Panov and Dr. Rochelle Schwartz

The study, which will identify precision chemotherapy treatments for hard to treat soft tissue sarcomas, will be run at Mount Sinai Hospital in partnership with Champions Oncology.

Dr. Albiruni Abdul Razak, a leading sarcoma oncologist, will head the Mount Sinai team that will investigate new personalized drug treatments that can target with precision the different variations of soft tissue sarcoma.

Schwartz joked about her first encounter with key members of Mount Sinai's sarcoma team – Razak and Dr. Jay Wunder, surgeon-in-chief. They met at a sarcoma foundation dinner two years ago.

"I was ranting and raving about how Champion's Oncology saved Yaron's life," Schwartz recalled. "You said to me, 'If you can raise $1 million we'll bring this cancer technology to Mount Sinai'... Well we did it!"

Indeed, she and her medical partner, Dr. Sharla Lichtman, raised the money through their friends and family. Lichtman, who served as MC for the evening, announced that she and Schwartz were building on their fundraising success by launching the next Panov program campaign of $1 million to advance Mount Sinai's sarcoma research program.

Panov 2 will provide seed money for various research projects that can be leveraged to attract major federally funded research grants, she explained.

The flagship study will be on the early detection of liposarcoma, cancer of the fatty tissue, which is the type of cancer former Toronto mayor Rob Ford was diagnosed with earlier this year.

The study will be an international collaboration between Dr. Alona Zer of the Davidoff Cancer Center-Rabin Medical Center with the Weizmann Research Institute, the Ontario Cancer Institute and Mount Sinai's sarcoma department headed by Wunder.

Zer, who finished a two-year fellowship at Mount Sinai and the Princess Margaret Hospital this year, said the joint research project will focus on premalignant cells. She said they will study healthy cells and trace their progression to malignancy with the goal of turning off the genetic switch that causes the cells to become cancerous.

Wunder said the Panov 2 research program will include a series of research projects that will increase the curability of soft tissue sarcoma, which is more challenging to treat than osteo or bone sarcomas, the type of cancer that Terry Fox had.

Wunder pointed out that during Fox's lifetime, the survival rate was just five per cent, but today, Mount Sinai's surgical oncology interventions cure 75 per cent of osteosarcoma patients. ■

CHAT parents to get tuition discount for learning

lsarick@thecjn.ca

TanenbaumCHAT has in the past offered classes to adults, taught by faculty and based on the courses offered in the high school.

A pilot project that will give parents a discount on their tuition in exchange for taking Jewish studies classes will be launched at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto next school year.

The program, which will only be open to families who are new to the school, offers a $5,000 discount on tuition for parents who commit to a 24-week course of Jewish studies, taught by TanenbaumCHAT's own faculty.

The initiative, called Scholars' Circle, will be open to parents, regardless of income, but will certainly assist those who find tuition steep, said head of school Rabbi Lee Buckman. Tuition for 2015-16 is $26,500.

Scholars' Circle is also intended to give parents a greater understanding of what actually happens during the school day. Parents generally only spend a few minutes a year meeting their children's teachers.

"If parents have a deep connection with our teachers and the quality of our teaching, they'll be stronger ambassadors of the program," Rabbi Buckman said.

The program will demonstrate the importance parents place on Jewish studies and give parents and children a common background to discuss what is being taught in school.

"My hope is that it will create conversations among parents and kids that will enrich the Jewish experiences of the child," he said.

A version of the program was first initiated by the Kohelet Foundation in Philadelphia, a private foundation that explores how to improve day school education. Rabbi Buckman implemented a variation of it at Atlanta's Greenfield Hebrew Academy, where he was head of school before coming to TanenbaumCHAT two years ago.

In Atlanta, about 60 parents participated, but both the time demands and the tuition subsidy were smaller.

Donors Dov and Nancy Friedberg, who are underwriting the program here, wanted the bar to be higher in terms of the Jewish studies requirement.

"The donor was clear that [instead of] just giving away money, we could leverage that money and get something back that was more valuable and enriching to a child's education," Rabbi Buckman said.

Funding has been provided for 16 families to participate in the 2016 academic year. Parents will be required to participate in 24 weeks of 90-minute-long classes on Jewish history, Tanach (Bible) and Jewish ethics taught by faculty from both the north and south campuses. Twice a year, before Chanukah and Passover, parents and students will study together.

The tuition discount for families who complete the program will be applied the following year.

The Scholars' Circle initiative fits into the school's strategic plan aimed at increasing enrolment, enhancing education, tightening expenses and intensifying fundraising.

After a few years of declining enrolment, the school has shifted to actively recruiting new students, rather than simply managing applications, Rabbi Buckman said.

Enrolment at both campuses is 1,035 students. This year's Grade 9 class was slightly larger than the previous year's, he said.

As well, a group of 35 parent ambassadors has been formed to promote the school. It's anticipated that participants in the Scholars' Circle program will also bolster efforts to promote the school.

TanenbaumCHAT has also stepped up its fundraising efforts. In addition to the funding for the Scholars' Choice program, a $1.5-million donation from Anita and Daniel Chai was recently announced for a new robotics and engineering program. ■

NCJW plans Jewish addiction rehab centre in Winnipeg

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Two events a day apart last month marked a clear break between the past and future for the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Winnipeg section.

On Oct. 15, NCJW Winnipeg revealed its next big project, which president Cindy Lazar unveiled on the occasion of the opening of a new Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada exhibit celebrating NCJW Winnipeg's 90 years of service to the community.

That project is the Winnipeg Jewish Recovery and Resource Centre, potentially Canada's first such service for members of the community who are struggling with addictions. (Lazar noted that other communities are also working on plans for similar centres.)

The centre would be modelled on the Shalom Residences – Jewish homes for developmentally disabled adults, similar to Toronto's Reena homes – Lazar said. The NCJW-supported residence, operated in conjunction with Winnipeg's Jewish Child and Family Service, would provide a home environment with a Jewish atmosphere that would be open to both Jewish and non-Jewish residents with addiction issues.

"We are not sure yet if the home would be for sober living or people struggling with addiction, or both," Lazar said. "It depends on the need."

She said the project is still in the planning stages. "We are putting together a business plan and a fund development plan. It will be a multifaceted campaign."

Meanwhile, on Oct. 14, NCJW Winnipeg section officially cut its last ties with the project that it has been most widely identified with for the past 60 years.

At a press conference at the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre, Lazar and Gwen Secter president Karen Grant jointly announced that a buyer has been found for the building that the Jewish seniors drop-in centre has called home for more than 25 years.

An anonymous donor – rumoured to be a former Winnipegger now living in the United States – has come forward with $900,000 to buy the building, as of the end of October, from the NCJW in order to allow the seniors centre to remain in operation.

NCJW had been involved in supporting seniors since 1949, when the Winnipeg section founded the Golden Age Club, the first seniors' drop-in centre in Canada. For many years, the seniors centre operated out of the NCJW building in the old Jewish neighbourhood in Winnipeg's North End.

Cindy Lazar, left, of NCJW Winnipeg; Jeff Gilbert, centre, president of Jewish Child and Family Service (JCFS); and Al Benarroch, JCFS executive director, promote the new Winnipeg Jewish Recovery and Resource Centre.

In 1986, with the Jewish community having largely moved further north (and south), NCJW purchased a former tire store further north and converted it into its new seniors centre, which was renamed after the late Gwen Secter, an NCJW leader for many years. Through various fundraisers and government grants, the building was renovated and officially opened in May 1989.

For the next 20 years, Lazar said, NCJW paid all the operating costs for the seniors centre, primarily with funds generated by its thrift store in the Fort Rouge area of the city. Due to a cutback in funding stemming from the store's closure in 2010, a new lease was arranged, with the Gwen Secter Centre assuming operating expenses and maintenance, but continuing to pay no rent.

"The lease was extended in 2012," Lazar said, "giving the centre four years' notice of NCJW's intent to sell the building at the end of the extended lease. NCJW Winnipeg received temporary funding from the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg for its operations, on the premise that it would be able to sell the building by May 2016 and repay the loan.

"The sale of the building will ensure the future of the centre, which we founded and supported," Lazar said. "It will also enable us to meet our commitments and new challenges in the community."

She also said NCJW's membership in Winnipeg is growing again after years of decline. "We have two new chapters starting up this year," she said. "Younger women are looking for an opportunity to make a difference in the community. NCJW provides that opportunity." ■

Prof lauded for role in 1979 refugee crisis

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Members of the local Vietnamese community paid tribute to Prof. Howard Adelman for his leadership in bringing Vietnamese refugees to Canada, and to Holy Blossom Temple for its sponsorship role during the Vietnamese "boat people" crisis back in 1979.

More than 200 people from both communities gathered at Holy Blossom on Remembrance Day to celebrate the successful resettlement of Vietnamese refugees in Canada.

Adelman's initiative led to the arrival of 60,000 refugees in this country. They were among the two million Indochinese people who fled Communist rule after the fall of Saigon in 1975.

Ron Atkey, minister of immigration in 1979, said that just weeks after taking power, the Conservative government of Joe Clark committed to taking in 50,000 refugees through a matching program of public and private sponsorship. "It was so successful, the private sponsorships outnumbered the government [ones], and so we raised the quota to 60,000."

That success can be traced to Operation Lifeline, a national campaign launched in the summer of 1979 by Adelman, then a York University philosophy professor. Operation Lifeline, which promoted the private sponsorship of Vietnamese families, helped resettle 30,000 refugees.

At the Holy Blossom event, the local Vietnamese community announced the establishment of a humanitarian award, the Thoi Bao Community Howard Adelman Award, in Adelman's honour.

Adelman said that on a night of remembrance, it was important to acknowledge the refugees who died during the crisis. "At least 200,000 Vietnamese drowned at sea. That should not be forgotten."

He was also quick to credit the efforts of other people who propelled the campaign forward. "I was one element of a big collective effort."

He noted that under Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, Temple Emanu-El sponsored 100 refugees. Adelman also praised Atkey and his department for their support. "The leadership of the government made such a big difference."

He said the two civil servants that Atkey sent to the first meeting of Operation Lifeline discreetly steered the group towards private sponsorship.

Sen. Ngo Thanh Hai, who was also a Vietnamese refugee, lauded the compassion of Canadians and stressed the need to help Syrian refugees.

In fact, Le Luong of VOICE (Vietnamese Overseas Initiative for Conscience Empowerment) said the Canadian group will be sponsoring four families. "We are paying it forward. We will carry your torch."

Steven Garmaise, chair of JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Service) Toronto, said the agency is working closely with Operation Lifeline Syria. So far, 25 groups from the Jewish community are sponsoring 11 families.

Members from both communities shared their memories and their connection to Operation Lifeline in 1979. Dr. Khoi Nguyen recalled fleeing Vietnam on a boat struck by typhoons and pirates.

A highlight of the evening was hearing from Nam Nguyen, 17, the 2015 Canadian national male figure skating champion and son of a Vietnamese refugee. He said his father was an inspiration to him, and if he wins gold at the 2018 Olympics, he will dedicate his medal to the Jewish community.

Helen Poizner said: "Sponsoring the refugees was the best thing Temple Emanu-El ever did."

David Hertzman was among 13 groups from Holy Blossom who sponsored 66 individuals. "Nobody felt heroic," he said. "We were happy to help."

Fred Zemans, a past president of the temple, accepted the award for Holy Blossom, presented by Kyanh Do, president of VOICE, Canada. "It was an incredible opportunity to deal with social justice," Zemans said. "It is something built into our religion."

His words echoed those of Rabbi Yael Splansky, senior rabbi of Holy Blossom. Looking out for the stranger and treating the stranger well is the commandment most repeated in the Torah, she said. "It is our sacred duty to do so joyfully. It is a sacred commandment done wholeheartedly." ■

Three-step plan for facing down Islamist terrorism

DAVID HOROVITZ
JERUSALEM

Holding mass solidarity marches, and vowing, stern-faced, to fight back against the Islamic State just isn't going to do it. Islamic extremist terror groups, and the states that sponsor them, are seeking to destroy open, democratic, egalitarian Western society and impose their bleak, bloody, perverted version of Islam.

Facing them down will obviously not be simple. But it will be impossible unless the reality of the threat is genuinely internalized and the fight back mounted in earnest.

If the West continues to delude itself about the scale of the challenge, those who delight in the divine gift of life will find themselves becoming increasingly constrained and terrified by those who assert an imperative to kill and be killed in the name of God.

The struggle to maintain fundamental Western freedoms involves a three-step process.

1. Name and acknowledge the enemy. The killers who struck in Paris – like those who brought down a Russian civilian airliner in the Sinai, and who carried out suicide bombings in Beirut last week, and who struck at Charlie Hebdo and the Hyper Cacher in Paris in January, and in London on July 7, 2005, and on Sept. 11, 2001, in New York, and who blew up the AMIA Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires in 1994, and, yes, who killed hundreds of Israelis in suicide bombings in the second intifadah, and on and on and on through an endless list of outrages worldwide – are not vague "militants." They are Islamic extremists, adherents of that toxic kill-and-be-killed Islamist ideology.

And their actions are not mere "violence" but terrorism – killing in order to terrorize, in order to weaken and cow their opposition, the better to impose that rapacious ideology.

People place flowers and light candles near the Bataclan theatre Nov. 14 in tribute to the victims of the Paris terror attacks. LAURENCE GEAI/FLASH90 PHOTO

At a deeper, strategic level, it means a far more resolute fight against the terror groups and their state sponsors in their home headquarters, and effective support for those people in our part of the world who seek to rise up against extremist oppressors and rulers. Take Syria, Iran and Egypt, for example.

Trying to keep the Middle East at arm's length, Europe now has the region's most extreme elements opening fire in its museums and magazine offices, at its restaurants and in its concert halls.

At the start of the uprising against Bashar Assad in Syria, there was a secular, relatively moderate opposition. But the West did little to help it, and in time, it was marginalized by murderous Islamic extremist groups, and Syria became a battleground in which there was no "good" side for the West to assist.

Rather than facing down the world's chief sponsor of terrorism, Iran, the world powers this summer legitimized the ayatollahs' nuclear program, and paved the way for a massive influx of funds that Tehran is already using to stir up more unrest in the Middle East and more terrorism worldwide. In 2009, when the people of Iran sought to oust the mullahs, the West chose not to lift a finger to help them. Right now, in Egypt, President Abdel-Fattah el-Sissi is publicly urging the advance of moderate Islam, warning that his religion is now perceived globally as a faith predominantly interested in killing. Sissi came to power violently, ousting a democratically elected president. But the Muslim Brotherhood would never have held another democratic election, and Sissi is trying to prevent his country's descent into Islamic extremism. Rather than seeking to create conditions in which it could help heal the Egyptian economy, and enable Egypt to feed and employ its 80 million people, much of the West – emphatically including the United States – seems content to stay away. The West's desire to avoid being dragged into new wars in our part of the world is understandable. Israel – despicably battered and demonized internationally as it battles Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah and other purveyors of Islamic extremist terror – deeply shares the desire to avert further conflicts. But Islamic extremist leaders are not going to be talked into compromise. They must be faced down.

And only if they are faced down is there a hope that new generations will grow up in a functional climate, with some prospect of decent education, opportunity and a life worth living, making them less vulnerable to the Islamist recruiters.

3. Prevent the recruitment of new waves of Islamist terrorists. Islamist killers are not born Islamist killers. They are (mis)educated. Indoctrinated. Filled with hatred and false prophecy. They are skewed by parents and teachers, politicians and spiritual leaders, books and websites, conventional media and social media.

The long process of reversing the rising tide of hatred requires international co-operation toward grassroots change. Fund moderate educational hierarchies and websites and media outlets, and close those that peddle extremism. Help moderate spiritual leaders gain greater resonance and prominence (and replicate this small example a few thousand times) and prosecute those who preach murder.

Extremists are brainwashing too many of the children of Islam, wooing them to a death cult. Those who value life need to get to them first.

The toxic Islamist ideology that encourages followers to kill and be killed in the name of Allah spews from innumerable websites and social media outlets with ever-increasing sophistication. There is self-evidently no shortage of hate-filled adherents, some of them returning to the West from the battlefields of the Middle East, ready to act on the perverted Islamist ideology. And therefore, amid all the now familiar vows from Western leaders to strike back effectively against Islamist terrorism, the dismal truth is that the West is going to be hit again and again and again with acts of unspeakable evil such as befell Paris on Friday unless it adopts a far more serious, strategic approach to tackling Islamist terror.

On Charonne Street in Paris, moments after Islamist gunmen had opened fire, eyewitness Sebastian Jagreau told the Associated Press he saw a woman slumped at a table. "I thought she had a bump, but then we realized it was a bullet in her head, and not a bump. She was stretched on the table with her beer next to her," he said. "Then I see a guy crying because his wife was dead."

If we want to avoid a world plunged ever-deeper into the darkness of Islamist terrorism, now would be a good time to begin the strategic counterattack. ■

Liberals, Israel and the lessons of history

Gerald Steinberg

Israel and the chaos of the Middle East are unlikely to be high on the agenda of the Liberal government, which is good, since this is a region where they should tread slowly and carefully. Although Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and his team will be pressed to take positions, make pronouncements and allocate taxpayer money under the labels peace, human rights and humanitarian aid, there are important lessons from the failures of 10 years ago that should be considered first.

In contrast to former prime minister Stephen Harper's very independent stance, the Liberal "old guard" clings to an intense faith in discredited international institutions such as the United Nations and the International Criminal Court. This is also the legacy of former Liberal prime minister Lester Pearson and the model (or myth, according to critics) of Canada as a "third power" and "honest broker" on issues of war and peace. Such misplaced faith is reinforced by European policies, although their initiatives, particularly regarding Israel, have never proven wise or successful.

Indeed, within days of the Liberal victory, advocates of this failed approach began to lobby Trudeau and his new foreign minister, Stéphane Dion – who brings gravitas and experience to this position. On Israel, Dion is indeed a friend – I had a number of discussions with him in Jerusalem about 15 years ago. But he and others in cabinet and Foreign Affairs will be pressed by less friendly voices, pitching grand plans based on good intentions that are easily manipulated.

The disastrous 2001 UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, remains a case in point. The Liberal government at the time was a major sponsor of this ostensibly moral initiative, but the reality was an anti-Israel hate-fest that led the United States and Israeli diplomatic delegations to walk out in protest.

It was at the Durban NGO Forum that groups claiming to promote human rights launched their boycott and demonization campaigns against Israel. And under the Liberals of the 1990s, millions of dollars in Canadian aid funds were given to radical non-governmental organizations (NGOs) that promoted the Durban warfare strategy without due diligence or adult supervision. Harper put an immediate end to this.

A significant portion of the misspent money was channelled through the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA), which then funded NGOs, with little or no supervision. Of CIDA's $2-billion annual budget, one-quarter went to the Middle East, including many grants to radical and anti-Israel NGOs that promoted boycotts. Recipients included Montreal-based Alternatives, BADIL (which exploits the refugee issue for political warfare), Kairos, Medical Aid for Palestinians, Médecins du Monde, the Mennonite Central Committee, and World Vision. The activities of these groups fuelled the conflict, and in 2006, CIDA's budget and activities came under closer supervision, with changes in leadership and funding. (In 2013, CIDA became part of the Department of Foreign Affairs, Trade and Development.)

The Liberal government of the 1990s also funded the Rights and Democracy framework, whose activities were often highly secretive and inconsistent with Canadian values, to understate the case. In 2009, it provided grants to the Palestinian NGOs Al Haq and Al Mezan – two leaders of the NGO Durban agenda. Israeli court documents allege that Shawan Jabarin, who heads Al Haq, was involved with a terror group. These groups routinely accuse Israel of "genocide," "crimes against humanity," "apartheid," "ethnic cleansing," "massacres," and "slaughtering civilians." When these activities were exposed, Rights and Democracy was shut down.

Officials who ran these anti-democratic organizations and benefited from the government's generosity have waited for 10 years to regain the money and influence they had under the previous Liberal government. The question is whether the lessons have been learned, or whether these mistakes and the resulting damage will be repeated. ■

World should also condemn terrorism in Israel, Bibi says

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu drew parallels last Sunday between the massive terror rampage that rocked Paris Nov. 13 and attacks against Israelis, saying the world that had rallied to condemn bloodshed in France must do so for Israel as well.

"It is time for states to condemn terrorism against us like they condemn terrorism anywhere else in the world. It is appropriate that [Palestinian Authority President] Mahmoud Abbas, who condemned the attack in France yesterday, will condemn the cruel terrorism against innocents in Israel and fight the incitement fueling it," Netanyahu told his cabinet meeting.

Referring to a shooting attack the same day as the Paris bombings that left a rabbi and son dead in the West Bank, Netanyahu said the perpetrators had been the same.

"Hours after the murder in Otniel, terrorists went on a ruthless terror attack in Paris and murdered innocents," he said. "In Israel, as in France, terrorism is terrorism, and the force standing behind it is radical Islam and its wish to destroy its victims."

At least 129 people died in the attack in Paris and more than 300 were wounded in a large, co-ordinated shooting and bombing attack claimed by the Islamic State (ISIS), the worst violence to hit the country since World War II.

Approximately 2,500 Israelis gathered in Tel Aviv's Rabin Square on Nov. 14 to express solidarity with the people of France. RONI SHUTZER/ISRAEL SUN PHOTO

There was no claim of responsibility for the Otniel shooting, which came amid a wave of stabbings and other attacks that have left 15 Israelis dead in two months.

Netanyahu has compared Palestinian terrorists to ISIS in the past, with critics responding that he was oversimplifying a complicated threat.

Netanyahu also rejected claims that terror against Israel was linked to policies in the West Bank.

"We are not at fault for the terrorism turned toward us just as the French are not at fault for the terrorism turned toward them. Those to blame for terrorism are terrorists. Not the territories, not the settlements nor any other factor – it is the will to destroy us that keeps the conflict alive and motivates murderous aggression against us," he said.

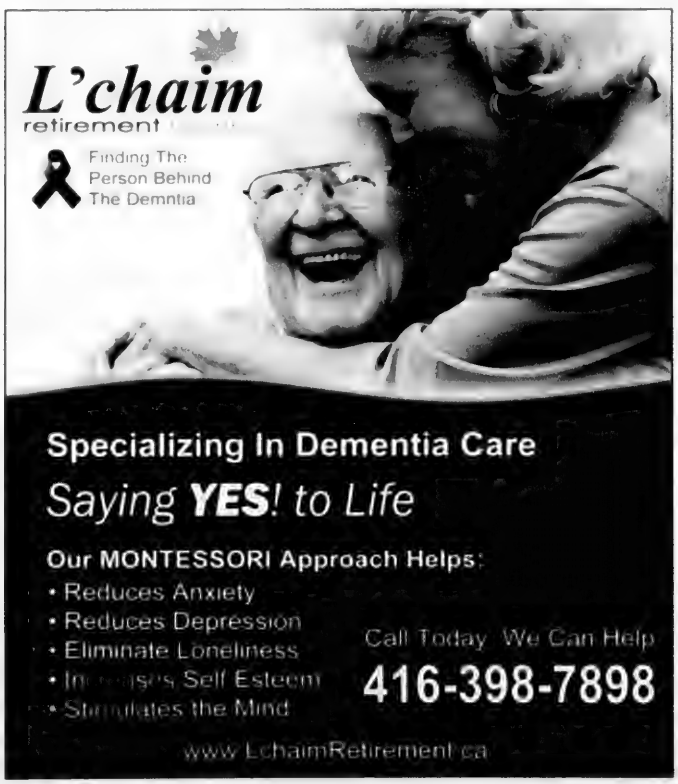
He said Israel's "resolute policy," including "controlling territory, entering villages, demolishing terrorists' homes, disrupting terror networks," were the reasons Israel "many times succeeds in intercepting and preventing more severe disasters."

Other Israelis have also drawn parallels between the terrorism in France and Israel.

"The whole world now understands what we experience in Israel and Jerusalem – murderous terrorism motivated by the same hatred and a mission of death against innocents in the West," Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat said Nov. 14 after attending the funeral for West Bank victims Yaakov and Netanel Litman.

Jewish Home leader and Education Minister Naftali Bennett seemed to say that Europe had received its comeuppance for taking anti-Israel stances.

"I said that if they wouldn't stand with us it will eventually reach them – and now this happened," Bennett told Army Radio. ■



How can Israel help in the fight against ISIS?

ROBERT SWIFT
JERUSALEM

Following massed, co-ordinated attacks against civilians in the heart of Paris, governments around the world are reflecting on what can be done to protect their citizens and to tackle an ascendant Islamic State (ISIS). The ultra-extremist Sunni Muslim group which controls territory in Syria and Iraq claimed responsibility for the attacks which killed at least 129 people and injured hundreds more.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Reuven Rivlin both expressed their condolences and sympathy with the people of France.

"Israel stands shoulder-to-shoulder with France in this common battle against militant Islamic terrorism," Netanyahu said. "I've instructed Israel's security and intelligence forces to assist their French counterparts and their counterparts from other European countries in any way possible."

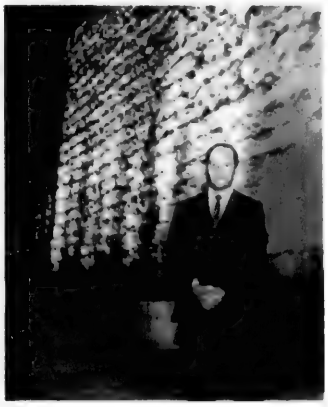
In its campaign against ISIS, American planes generally fly from Germany, as they have not been given sufficient access to use Turkish air bases. If Israeli airbases were to be used to launch U.S. raids, greater force could be brought to bear on ISIS. This would be increased even more if the Israeli Air Force was to join the sorties.

Yet analysts say, that is highly unlikely to happen due to the convoluted politics of the powers in the region. Instead, Israel will offer its Western allies intelligence, as well as its considerable experience in protecting civilian locations from terrorist threat.

The Jewish state will not join the coalition against ISIS due to the sensitivities of Gulf Arab states who are members of the coalition, Meir Elran, a senior research fellow and head of the program on homeland security at the Institute for National Security Studies, told The Media Line. Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, Qatar, and the United Arab Emirates (UAE), have all taken part in attacks against ISIS, and all are countries which are uncomfortable with any visible alliance with Israel.

"There is a resentment on their part to Israeli participation. Israel could have done a lot more if that kind of limitation would be taken off the table," Elran suggested.

Israel could still conduct strikes if it were to do so without advertising the fact, Moshe Ma'oz, a professor of Islamic and Middle Eastern Studies at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, told The Media Line. "Israel could be part of it. Maybe not (overtly) sticking out because it could be a weapon in the hands of ISIS who would say 'you are fighting alongside the Zionists,'" Ma'oz suggested.



Jerusalem's Mayor Nir Barkat stands in front of the Old City walls which were lit up in the French colours on Nov. 14.

For the time being ISIS does not appear to demonstrate a serious threat to Israel. "(ISIS) doesn't have access to the state of Israel, not from the Golan Heights and not from Lebanon. The only place they do have access is the Sinai Peninsula," Nitzan Nuriel, a research associate at the International Institute for Counter-Terrorism at the Inter Disciplinary Center in Herzliya said. The southern city of Eilat, located near the border with Egypt was a particularly tempting target for ISIS affiliates in the Sinai Peninsula, Nuriel added.

The Egyptian military is struggling to contain an insurgency in the Sinai. Although the Islamic State affiliate there has not recently targeted Israel, they are considered a credible threat due to the damage they have inflicted on the Egyptian military, and the likelihood that the group planted a bomb on a Russian airliner last month, killing all 224 people on board.

At least right now, Israel appears to be a low priority target for the Islamic State, although this assessment could change. Western intelligence analysts suggested that the recent attacks on the Russian airline and in Paris show that the group may have pivoted towards conducting attacks outside of its own territory. ■

Israeli officials outspoken against EU labelling rules

JTA
JERUSALEM

Israel's Foreign Ministry suspended dialogue with the European Union to protest the EU's decision to label products from West Bank settlements separately from goods made within Israel's pre-1967 borders.

The ministry froze the dialogue on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict on Nov. 11, saying in a statement that it was pulling out of several EU forums.

"We have suspended the subcommittee on diplomacy, the subcommittee on human rights and international organizations," the statement said. "The remaining dialogues [with the EU] are continuing as planned. Clearly, we won't damage Israeli interests."

EU Ambassador Lars Faaborg-Andersen said the new guidelines concerning separate labelling were "a small technical addition to something that has existed for a very long time: the trade facilitation between products coming from Israel proper, within its 1967 lines, and products coming from beyond the Green Line."

He added that "this is not a boycott."

The separate labelling will be applied not just to products from Jewish settlements in the West Bank, but also to goods produced in eastern Jerusalem and the Golan Heights. They will also indicate whether they originate from Palestinian or Israeli producers.

Israeli officials have been outspoken in their opposition to the new labelling, which was adopted Nov. 11 by the European Commission in Brussels.

The move is "hypocritical and applies double standards, targeting Israel when there are over 200 other conflicts around the world," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in a statement.

"The Israeli economy is strong and will withstand this; those who will be hurt will be those Palestinians who work in Israeli factories. The EU should be ashamed."

Deputy Foreign Minister Tzipi Hotovely said the guidelines were discriminatory and designed to promote a boycott.

Some leftist politicians in Israel, notably opposition leader Isaac Herzog, joined right-wingers in denouncing the plan.

The head of the European Parliament's main body for promoting relations with Israel also announced his opposition to new guidelines on labelling products from the West Bank.

The chair of the European Parliament Delegation for Relations with Israel, said he sides with Israel regarding its criticism of the European Commission's issuing of guidelines requiring such labelling.

"We Europeans have not been the best partner and we are pushing back this partnership," Fulvio Martusciello said in a speech in Brussels before members of the American Jewish Committee. The guidelines, he added, were designed to "stop products from beyond the 1967 Green Line" and to exert political pressure on Israel to push forward peace talks with Palestinians.

European Jewish Congress president Moshe Kantor called the guidelines problematic and a "double standard," pointing out in a statement issued Nov. 11 that there are "no comparable guidelines for any other territorial dispute or what are perceived as occupations anywhere else in the world.

"We see that once again Israel is singled out for special treatment above all other nations of the world and this is clearly discriminatory and stands in stark contradistinction to the EU's own mandate to be fair and free of prejudice," Kantor said.

Human Rights Watch issued a statement in support of the labelling settlement products. "The EU's new guidelines on accurately labelling settlement products are in line with states' duty to ensure compliance with international humanitarian law, under which settlements are illegal."

Gerald Steinberg of NGO Monitor called the guidelines "another act in the ongoing NGO campaign to delegitimize Israel.

"This strategy is also the driving force of BDS (boycott, divestment and sanctions) campaigns, and it is led by EU-funded NGOs that are detrimental to a peaceful, negotiated solution," Steinberg said in a statement.

"For years, the EU has given money earmarked for humanitarian aid and peace-building to political groups that abuse human rights to promote their own agendas. These organizations have lobbied hard for the EU to adopt their ideas, with the rhetoric of 'consumer choice' masking what is clearly an anti-Israel measure," according to the statement. "NGO Monitor research shows that NGOs push labelling as a first step in the BDS process, aimed at all Israeli products and services." ■

'I REALLY MISS BEING ABLE TO SEE THE SKY, ANY SHADE OF THE SKY.'

On November 10, 2012, Yehuda Persi, a Givati Brigade fighter was blinded and severely wounded when an anti-tank missile hit the jeep he was driving near the Gaza border. He was only 23 years old.

"The missile blew up and shrapnel flew into my face. All four of us in the jeep were badly injured."

Over three months, Yehuda underwent numerous complicated surgeries on his head and eyes.

"I had to move back home with my parents and learn to adjust to being blind. Daily tasks became a hardship, but I learned to cope. I can now take a shower on my own, prepare basic meals, and dress myself. The bigger problem is everything outside my house and comfort zone."

"I smile and try to have a positive outlook on life. Until I am given the absolute, final verdict on my vision, I still hope to see again, even if just a little, just a bit. I really miss being able to see the sky, any shade of the sky."

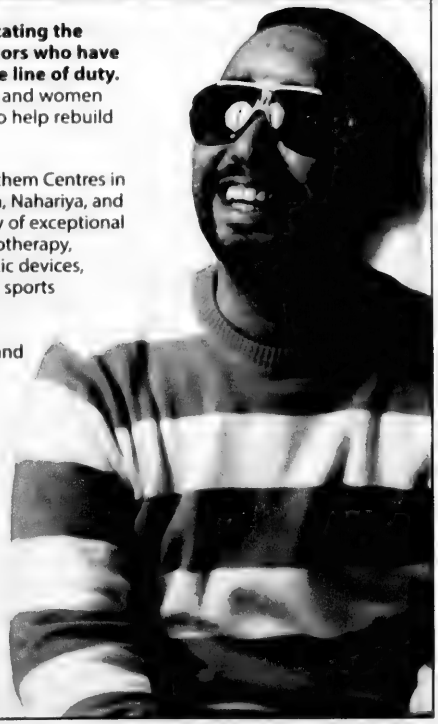
Thanks to Beit Halochem, Yehuda has moved forward, regaining a future filled with promise and possibility. Yehuda spends most of his days at Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv, where he receives physiotherapy and participates in sports and social programs. He works out at the fitness facility and enjoys swimming and running.

Beit Halochem Canada, Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, is committed to rehabilitating the 51,000 wounded warriors who have become disabled in the line of duty. Like Yehuda, these men and women rely on Beit Halochem to help rebuild their lives.

Leading-edge Beit Halochem Centres in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Haifa, Nahariya, and Beer Sheva offer an array of exceptional services including physiotherapy, hydrotherapy, therapeutic devices, scholarships, specialized sports equipment and training, family-oriented programming, creative and cultural activities.

While we long for peace, the battle to defend and secure Israel never ends. Regrettably, the number of Beit Halochem members continues to grow.

Our obligation is to assist those who have paid a painful price defending Israel and her citizens.



With your support, we can rehabilitate, rebuild, and enhance the lives of Israel's 51,000 disabled veterans.

Netanyahu remarks signal shift, Israeli Reform head says

You could say that Rabbi Gilad Kariv, executive director of the Israel Movement for Reform and Progressive Judaism, is leading an insurrection, a popular revolt aimed at upending the status quo that has guided Israel's policy on religious matters since the state was born in 1948.

The Orthodox establishment has had a stranglehold on officially sanctioned religious practices in the country for too long, Rabbi Kariv believes. It has zealously guarded its privileged position, but it's time for it to make space for other branches of Judaism that are legitimate and representative of the vast majority of Israeli citizens. In that regard, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's recent remarks in Washington, D.C., herald progress, he told The CJN in Toronto last week.

Rabbi Kariv was in town to visit representatives of the World Union for Progressive Judaism and ARZA Canada and brief them and local congregations about developments in Israel. His colleague, Rabbi Nir Barkin, also visited Reform congregations in Vancouver and Calgary and was planning other trips to synagogues in Mississauga, Hamilton and Oakville as part of their trip to North America.

Earlier, Rabbi Kariv attended the Jewish Federations of North America General Assembly (GA) in Washington.

Netanyahu recently recognized Reform and Conservative Judaism "as native Israeli phenomena," Rabbi Kariv noted. And in his address to the GA, Netanyahu said, "As prime minister of Israel I will ensure that all Jews – Reform, Conservative and Orthodox – feel at home in Israel."

That signals a profound strategic shift in government thinking, the rabbi believes.

"When the prime minister says he is committed to… strengthening the presence of Reform and Conservative in Israel, that for us is one of the best proofs that our movement is making inroads into the mainstream of Israeli society," he said.

That can have practical implications. "Before Netanyahu's statement, his senior team in the Prime Minister's Office and leaders of the Jewish Agency started a serious negotiation with leaders of Israel's Conservative and Reform movements about practical ways to support the work of our movement with government funds. I hope that within months, the government will match Jewish Agency allocations to [Reform and Conservative] congregations," he said.

That could mean an extra $1 million a year from the government, doubling the annual Jewish Agency allocation, but still amounting to only a fraction of the 2 billion shekels ($685 million) the Orthodox receive from the government.

Rabbi Kariv believes Canadian Jews have a role to play in all of this.

Netanyahu will come under pressure from the Orthodox establishment to walk away from his statement. "We expect Diaspora leaders and our Israeli members and supporters to create a counter-pressure," he said. "It is important that the leaders of the Jewish federations in North America, rabbis and lay leaders of congregations will understand that without keeping the pressure and keeping the prime minister fully accountable for his previous statements, the ultra-Orthodox parties will succeed in preventing this important breakthrough from happening."

Rabbi Kariv stressed that the alternatives to Orthodoxy are growing by leaps and bounds in Israel. The number of Jews who identify as Reform or Conservative has at least doubled in the last 10 years, jumping from four per cent to somewhere between eight and 12 per cent. Whereas earlier generations of Israelis were focused on reviving the Hebrew language and promoting Israeli culture, third- and fourth-generation Israelis are seeking a spiritual attachment to Judaism that is not Orthodox.

"The growth is a result of a growing number of Israeli individual and families, mostly secular, who are interested in strengthening their Jewish identity in a progressive, egalitarian and inclusive way," he said.

Rabbi Kariv believes that as more and more Israelis look to Reform and Conservative alternatives to express their spirituality, they face a significant disadvantage. Their conversions, marriages and divorces are not recognized by the government. Only Orthodox ones are.

As a democratic state, Israel should level the playing field and treat all religious streams equally. It should recognize the conversions, marriages and divorces of all and not permit the Orthodox to have a veto on which practices are recognized by government, he said.

It is crucial "to create a critical mass of Jews in Israel and the Diaspora who say, enough is enough."

There must be a level playing field in which all streams of Judaism can compete for followers in the marketplace of ideas, he added.

"I want to end the Orthodox monopoly," he said. "I don't want to break the Orthodox rabbinate. I want Israeli law not to grant the Orthodox a monopoly on Jewish life." ■

Le Bataclan received threats over pro-Israel events

CNAAN LIPSHIZ
JTA PARIS

Before last Friday's bloodbath at Paris's Le Bataclan concert venue, this centrally located hall from the 19th century had received numerous threats over pro-Israel events hosted there.

From at least 2006-2009, Le Bataclan was the venue for the annual fundraising gala of Migdal, the French Jewish nonprofit group that supports the Israeli Border Police. Last month, the theatre served as the meeting place for a gathering of some 500 Zionist Christians who came there in support of the Jewish state

In one case involving threats against Le Bataclan – which until September was owned by a French Jew, Joel Laloux – approximately 10 men wearing Arab keffiyehs over their faces showed up at the theatre in December demanding to speak to management.

"You will pay the consequences of your actions," one of the men from the group was filmed telling the security guards outside Le Bataclan, his voice electronically distorted. "We came here to pass along a small message. Be warned. Next time we won't be coming here to talk."

The massacre at Le Bataclan Nov. 13 during a rock concert was by far the deadliest of the six simultaneous attacks which French security forces said were perpetrated by at least eight terrorists.

Two terrorists fired at patrons at random but in a calm and deliberate manner, survivors said. Police stormed the building approximately 40 minutes after the killing began. The terrorists were killed in the takeover.

According to the website of Le Bataclan, the venue was run until its sale in September by Jules Frutos and Olivier Poubelle for Joel Laloux, whose father, Elie Touitou, bought the venue in 1976. He owned most or all of the theatre until September, when the media group of the billionaire Arnaud Lagardère bought a 70 per cent stake. Laloux immigrated to Israel recently.

For France's far-right Jewish Defense League, the threats against Le Bataclan are proof that it was targeted as punishment for hosting pro-Israel events. "Pro-Palestinian groups designated it openly as a 'Zionist' concert hall, and now we see the result," the organization wrote in a statement shortly after the attacks. "France woke up to a taste of 'Palestine.'"

Yet Nicolas Shashani, a prominent French pro-Palestinian activist, said that despite the previous threats, Le Bataclan is not generally associated with the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. ■

'This situation is unnerving, but not just for us'

Meir noted he was thinking of buying a pistol, but said his wife had vetoed that option. Instead, he had bought a canister of pepper spray, which he now carries in his pocket when working out with clients in this area. I ventured my concern that ordinary citizens walking around with weapons and other means of self-defence would lead to unnecessary errors and to accidents that would outweigh the benefits of those means.

Driving home from that workout, news bulletins announced a serious terrorist attack in Armon Hanatziv. Two terrorists had boarded a bus, one with a revolver, the other with a knife. By the time police overcame them, they had killed two people and injured nine others.

Soon afterward, I was informed by my shul that the person most severely injured in that attack was Richard Lakin, 76, who had been shot in the head and viciously stabbed in many parts of his body. A longtime member of our synagogue, Richard was the ex-husband and soulmate of one of our oldest regular members, as well as grandfather of several grandchildren, including Shachar, a counsellor in our youth movement. Richard's daughter had served under my command in the military.

After he was hospitalized at Hadassah Ein Karem's ICU, I learned more about Richard than I'd ever known. A devoted lifelong educator and community activist, he had given up a position as principal of a school in Connecticut when he immigrated to Israel with his wife and two children 32 years ago. Since then, he and his wife had taught English to generations of students – Jews and Arabs, Christians and Muslims. Next to Richard's picture on his Facebook page is a photo of two young men, arm in arm, one wearing a keffiyah, the other a kippah, with the word "coexist" above the two of them.

My 15-year-old son, Natan, is also a counsellor in our shul's youth movement. When the kids met later that day for their weekly program, they weren't sure how to handle the news. Should they continue with planned activities, or not? They chose the former. Perhaps it was their attempt to carry on with life normally.

But life doesn't go back to normal so quickly. We've always given Natan lifts to school, and for years he's been getting home using public transportation. After the attack in Armon Hanatziv, we decided to find other ways to get Natan home.

Our 20-year-old daughter is currently serving in the IDF. Since the stabbings began, she has also voiced concern. When in civvies at home, she has no problem going out with her friends to cafés, bars and restaurants, places I'm not overly thrilled about during these times. But in her uniform on the way to or from her base, she feels exposed.

This situation is unnerving, but not just for us. I recently participated in the World Zionist Congress as part of a large delegation of Reform Zionist Jews from around the world. During the congress, our delegates were offered a field trip that included a visit to the Abdullah Ibn Al Hussein Girls' Secondary School in east Jerusalem. It was quite eye-opening, even for me. Most of the mainly Muslim 16- and 17-year-old girls had never met Jews who told them they were interested in finding a peaceful solution to the conflict.

We broke up into small groups, going to different classes. I teamed up with a female rabbi from San Francisco, and, helped by a teacher who translated what we said into Arabic, we read the girls part of Martin Luther King's famous "I Have A Dream" speech and asked them what their own dreams were.

Many spoke of an independent Palestine in which they would have full rights and would not feel oppressed by Israel. One girl described her daily frustrations getting to school – she lives in a neighbourhood not far away, but is almost always late because it takes her hours to get through several roadblocks. Some of the girls described their dream of travelling the world. I was particularly moved by one 17-year-old who told us her dream was to become an astronaut, but that she doesn't believe that dream is attainable, because Israeli authorities won't let her.

Many of the girls, and later the school's principal, mentioned a particularly traumatic experience. A week or so earlier, toward the end of a school day, shots were heard from not far away. It later became clear that one of the girls' schoolmates had been shot as she crossed a main street less than a block away. She had been taken to hospital, and since the incident, neither the girls nor the school's administration had received any official report. The girl's parents had not been allowed to visit her.

> I cannot and will not agree with those among us who claim it is our destiny to forever live by the sword.

That story bothered me. I can't be certain it's connected to the same incident, but on Oct. 30, a 16-year-old Palestinian girl from east Jerusalem's Beit Hanina neighbourhood was indicted for an attempted stabbing attack that occurred two weeks earlier on Ammunition Hill, which is adjacent to the secondary school we had visited.

The last week of October was particularly sobering for me.

Saturday evening, a friend called to tell me Rabbi Chaim (Howie) Rothman, my classmate at Bialik Hebrew Day School and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, had succumbed to the terrible wounds he sustained almost a year ago when two east Jerusalem terrorists broke into a synagogue in Har Nof, an ultra-Orthodox neighbourhood here in Jerusalem, and viciously attacked several men who had gathered for early-morning prayers.

Four worshippers died at the scene, and a Druze police officer who happened to be nearby, died a short while later from wounds he sustained when he tried to help those inside the synagogue. Seven other worshippers were injured in the attack, Howie most severely. He never regained consciousness.

On Tuesday of that week, I was driving home from my weekly workout with Meir as another news bulletin announced that Richard Lakin had succumbed to his wounds.

As details were made public about Richard, including his advocacy for peaceful coexistence between Arabs and Jews, something absolutely vile occurred. Online, hateful people took to media comment threads. A loosely translated smidgen of examples from the Hebrew original: "I don't feel even an iota of sadness. Leftists are like terrorists for me"; "He should be buried in Gaza and his tombstone should be defecated upon"; "May his death be a blessing!!!"

How sad. Forget the Palestinians. Where does this leave us? How do we live with each other? Is this the Jewish state we prayed for and dreamed of for 2,000 years?

At Richard's funeral, Shachar, his oldest granddaughter, spoke heartbreakingly to her tallit-covered grandpa. "I know you would want me to always try to be a better person and do the right thing. You would want me to spread love and happiness everywhere I go.

"I think you wouldn't want me to have not even one ounce of hate in my body, even though what has been done to you."

There was not a dry eye in the house.

I cannot and will not agree with those among us who claim it is our destiny to forever live by the sword. I am not naïve, but for the sake of our children and of our grandchildren – and those of the Palestinians, too – it is incumbent upon us, Israelis and Palestinians, Arabs and Jews, to strive for better futures for all of us.

Along with 100,000 other Israelis, I completed that last week in October by attending a rally in Tel Aviv marking the 20th anniversary of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination. Twenty wasted years. We can't afford to waste any more. I'm afraid we will. ■

Klezmer harp player rediscovers blues

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jason Rosenblatt, who's best known for playing harmonica with the klezmer band Shtreiml, is releasing a CD of original blues and jazz tunes, musical genres his parents introduced him to.

Growing up, Rosenblatt, now 42, listened to his parents' extensive collection of blues and early jazz records and tapes. "My parents were of that generation that was interested in the blues and they passed on that music to me," Rosenblatt said.

At 13, an unenthusiastic piano student, Rosenblatt one day put on an album by Professor Longhair, the legendary New Orleans blues pianist, and played along with it. "It was one of the first times I had ever taken music I was interested in playing and tried to figure it out on my own," Rosenblatt said.

When he was 15, he picked up one of his dad's harmonicas. His father, Bernard, a doctor, played harmonica in a doctors and nurses band.

At first, Rosenblatt practised along with blues records, but at 16 – "a young Jewish kid with braces and a kippah," he remembered – he ventured into Montreal's blues bars.

At one of the clubs, he saw harmonica whiz Jim Zeller. "I would sit in the club and listen, and I would have a harmonica in my pocket, and when he was done with his set, I would run outside and practice the various licks that I heard," Rosenblatt said. He went on to study with Howard Levy, a master of the diatonic harmonica.

"Everything he played on the instrument was radically different, and it went beyond my expectations of what the instrument can do, and I said to myself, 'I have to play like that,'" Rosenblatt recalled.

He pays tribute to Levy on his new CD with the composition C Harp Blues. "I took an exercise he gave me and I turned it into a song," Rosenblatt said.

Since 2002, Rosenblatt has been performing a mix of eastern European Jewish and Turkish music in concert halls and at festivals with Shtreiml. The band's wedding repertoire includes the music of Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, old-time chassidic, modern chassidic, classic rock, Motown, R&B and bluegrass.

Rosenblatt wrote and recorded Wiseman's Rag because blues and early jazz was the first music he loved and because he wanted to get away from his "comfort zone of doing Jewish music," he said.

Some of the songs on his 13-track CD – with Rosenblatt on harmonica, piano, Hammond B3 organ and vocals; Joe Grass on guitar; Joel Kerr on bass; and Evan Tighe on drums – are named after streets in Montreal.

The track Wiseman's Rag, a ragtime piece that pays homage to Jelly Roll Morton, got its title from Wiseman Street in Outremont, where Rosenblatt lives.

Modern Life Blues sounds like a break-up song. In one verse Rosenblatt writes: "You told me many times before/ You'd never walk out the front door/ I guess I didn't really know how bad you were feeling/ My special request for a second chance/ Was denied at first glance."

But the lyrics aren't autobiographical, the father of four said.

"I'm 42 years old, and I have a bunch of kids at home, and things aren't always easy and don't always go smoothly. And when you're writing a blues song, why settle for 'It's not so bad'? Either it's terrible or phenomenal, and I went to the terrible side of things. So it's not autobiographical, thank God."

Rosenblatt added that his lyrical inspiration for the CD is Cole Porter, whose lyrics are known for their wit, sophistication and clever rhymes.

The song Last Plane Out, written in New Orleans blues style, reflects the fact that Rosenblatt has been on the road alone recently, he said. Now that he and his wife, Rachel, who plays trombone in Shtreiml, have four children, aged 7, 5, 3 and 11 months, "she decided she didn't want to come on every tour" with the band, he said, although the whole family joined him for Shtreiml's West Coast tour of folk festivals this past summer. ■

The Jason Rosenblatt Quartet launches Wiseman's Rag at GigSpace in Ottawa on Dec. 12. For more information, visit www.jasonrosenblatt.com.

A unique insight into Jewish life in Imperial Russia

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In Vilna about 1860, a Jewish wife took a position as a domestic servant in the home of a wealthy man, but disappeared after her master sent her to get change for a 200-ruble bill. Eventually the case of "a male agun" or abandoned husband came to the attention of Rabbi Naftali Zvi Yehudah Berlin of Volzhin.

"She [the wife] has been searched for extensively in Vilna, but without success," Rabbi Berlin noted in a responsa. "And her husband is bereft and grieving that the joy of offspring is denied to him. He seeks to marry another wife and to build himself a home."

Seeking a remedy that would not result in the husband committing bigamy, Rabbi Berlin ultimately decided that the man need not continue his futile search for a wife who had deserted him. "In this case, where she has betrayed him and taken herself far from him to the point where he cannot divorce her, he is not obliged to go out and shout at the hills and the like. Rather one may be lenient, and allow him another wife."

Many rabbinical items are among the assortment of translated documents that appear in Everyday Jewish Life in Imperial Russia, a wide-ranging compendium culled from memoirs, rabbinical responsa, court records, police records and other official sources.

The documents were found in archives in Kiev, Odessa, Zhitomir, Moscow, St. Petersburg and Vilnia, reflecting the continuing discoveries that Judaic scholars are making in diverse archives across the former Soviet Union. They focus on a broad spectrum of activities of ordinary Jewish daily life in Russia from the late 18th to the early 20th centuries.

Topics include religious dilemmas, conversions to Christianity, family life, marriage and divorce, health and sexuality, mental illness, marital and extramarital sex, school and university life, commerce and trade, agricultural colonies and farms, factory work, military conscription, anti-Semitism and pogroms, revolutionary movements, Zionism and emigration.

Some of the documents presented, such as Shura Broun's "Petition for a Separate Passport on Grounds of Spousal Abuse (1900)" are so personal and painful that the reader wants to cringe. There is also a report on an illegal abortion in Vilna, petitions to hospitalize various mentally ill patients, a report on attempts to close a Jewish brothel in Kiev, discussion of self-mutilation to avoid military conscription, and a description of a violent night in the tavern.

In 1887, "melamed" [teacher] Girsh Korobochko of Gorodok was accused of teaching children without a melamed's certificate. Although Korobochko argued that he only taught the children at school to recite prayers orally and did not receive any monetary compensation, and that he was unaware he was committing a crime, he was found guilty and slapped with a ruinous fine of 25 rubles, a verdict that was upheld upon appeal.

As other incidents described in the book testify, such difficult bureaucratic struggles and unnecessarily harsh and cruel verdicts seemed all too common in Old Russia. Such episodes put one in mind of the old Yiddish saying, "You could live, if only they would let you."

Everyday incidents are also captured in bedrooms, medical clinics, law offices, synagogues and factories. The editors have privileged us with many telling glimpses of the great frieze that was Jewish civilization in Russia over a period of about 150 years. However, we must remember that we are dealing with fragmented pieces out of context. We must take care that our impressions do not lead us to sweeping conclusions.

Everyday Jewish Life in Imperial Russia: Select Documents, 1772-1914
by Chaeran Y. Freeze and Jay M. Harris, editors

Brandeis University Press

The editors deal with this and other interpretive problems in the preface and introduction, noting that "the focus on the individual, the local, and the singular inevitably raises the issue of typicality." How unique or how typical are the events described in the documents? The editors cite historian Henri Lefebvre, who once noted that even the most mundane act, such as a woman buying sugar, represents "an infinitely complex social event."

The editors also acknowledge that their approach is part of a modern shift away from grand narratives of political history to the everyday aspects of the lives of ordinary people, from making love to making a living.

A good companion volume to read alongside Everyday Jewish Life in Imperial Russia is Yohanan Petrovsky-Shtern's The Golden Age Shtetl: A New History of Jewish Life in East Europe, (Princeton) which received fuller treatment here last year.

Petrovsky-Shtern also uncovered a range of recently accessible archival documents in painting a revised portrait of the Russian shtetl. He argued that for much of its history the shtetl was not the semi-decrepit, decaying village as described in late-19th-century Yiddish literature, but rather a thriving economic centre focused around its market square.

While later travellers would often emphasize the dirt, stench and poverty of the shtetl, reports in the "golden age" often focused on the fertility and idyllic beauty of the countryside. After the Russians exerted a prohibitive set of tariffs, customs duties and protective regulations, bribes and the smuggling of contraband goods became routine and the shtetl began its downfall.

As in Everyday Jewish Life in Imperial Russia, the author of The Golden Age Shtetl uncovers many police, court and other documents revealing unsavoury aspects of Jewish life. Again, one must be careful about drawing conclusions about the "typicality" of such activities and the relative proportion of Jewish rogues and criminals among the general population. ■

New publisher to produce original Jewish-themed books

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Two titans in the realm of Canadian Jewish publishing have been named as co-publishers of the New Jewish Press, an ambitious venture by the University of Toronto's Anne Tanenbaum Centre for Jewish Studies to produce original Jewish-themed books for the general reading public.

The New Jewish Press "is a logical extension of the Centre's core mission, which is to bring Jewish studies to the broader community," said co-publisher Malcolm Lester, a book-trade veteran whose previous credits have included such celebrated works as None Is Too Many, The Riot at Christie Pits and A Good Place to Come From.

Until recently, the other co-publisher Andrea Fochs Knight was managing editor of the Azrieli Series of Holocaust Survivor Memoirs and had previously worked with Lester at Malcolm Lester Books.

The New Jewish Press may launch its first four or five titles in October 2016 with production of another eight or 10 titles in 2017, she said.

"The range of titles will be fiction, non-fiction and literary non-fiction. They're not aimed at a scholarly audience. They won't be full of footnotes. Our goal is to bridge the academy and the community, as we say, to produce books that are of interest to scholars and also be accessible to the public."

The new publishing venture is based on "a different model," she continued, "in that it has many of the characteristics of a trade house but it's operating within the university. It's a model that's funded partly by donations – it's not entirely dependent on book sales. So, in that sense, we've opted to avoid some of the pitfalls that a new trade house might face."

The co-publishers concur that the new venture will be a "niche publisher" that will seek out specific kinds of titles, such as in the field of Canadian Jewish history, that large publishing companies may not care to produce.

Donors who wish to assist the New Jewish Press will receive tax receipts from the Anne Tanenbaum Centre for Jewish Studies. However, donors may not underwrite publication of a specific title. Final decisions about what titles to publish will be made by an editorial committee consisting of the two co-publishers and professors Anna Shternshis, Doris Bergen, David Novak and Harold Troper.

"I'm absolutely delighted to be working with the Centre on this timely new publishing venture," said Lester, while Fochs Knight said she was excited at the prospect of bringing "a broad new range of Canadian Jewish voices" into print. ■

There's a lineup snaking around the block to get into Toronto's Bloor Hot Docs Cinema. Hundreds of young people are huddled together; some have been waiting outside for hours despite the cold and rainy mid-November weather. No, it's not TIFF. Comedian Nathan Fielder is in town for back-to-back, sold-out shows.

Fielder is the Canadian mastermind behind the Comedy Central program Nathan For You (Comedy Network in Canada). During each half-hour episode, he comes up with absurd marketing strategies for ailing Los Angeles-area companies. He is behind viral sensations such as Dumb Starbuck.

While his now three seasons of work usually provoke deep belly laughs, one of his latest stunts isn't quite as comedic. That's because it involves the Holocaust.

Fielder, formerly a correspondent on This Hour Has 20 Minutes, recently found out his favourite outerwear company, Taiga, featured Holocaust denier Doug Collins in one of its winter catalogues. Fielder says he had been wearing Taiga jackets for around 10 years.

"As a Jew, I was like, 'oh crap,'" says the 32-year-old Vancouver native while on Conan, Conan O'Brien's late night show. "In searching for a replacement, I couldn't be sure that any other jacket companies weren't hiding dark secrets as well."

So, he decided to create his own windbreaker brand, one that would also promote Holocaust awareness.

He calls his new venture Summit Ice and currently sells jackets, toques and t-shirts online. Best of all, 100 per cent of the profits will go directly to the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre (VHEC).

Nina Krieger, executive director of the VHEC, didn't hear about Fielder until someone forwarded her the Conan clip.

"There's a certain absurdity of a clothing company expressing sympathies for Holocaust denial that, based on what I've seen, has been reframed by Nathan as this opportunity for promoting Holocaust education," she says.

"And the VHEC would hope, further learning about the events and lessons of the Holocaust."

Krieger hasn't seen the Nathan For You episode that introduced Summit Ice. It aired on Oct. 22 and followed Fielder as he tried to get his brand into a Los Angeles-area store.

Nathan Fielder in a promo pic for his show.

He employed a local rabbi to ensure that he was making an impact on the Holocaust education front. Yet, this veered into unsettling territory as his retail display included swastikas and a gas chamber.

Krieger notes that anything that belittles the events of the Holocaust is troubling.

"The VHEC, like other organizations dedicated to Holocaust education and remembrance, is sensitive to the trivialization of the Holocaust and anything that minimizes the suffering of the victims and survivors," she says.

At first glance, Fielder's episode appears rather tasteless. As does his website, which includes photos of celebrities in Summit Ice jackets with captions such as, "Actor Rob Lowe looking cool and Holocaust conscious in one of our fleece-lined softshell jackets."

And, "Knocked Up star Seth Rogen agrees that the systematic extermination of Jews in Europe was 'superbad.'"

Yet, after hearing from Krieger, Fielder's mission becomes clearer: he's using comedy to show how ridiculous it is for any consumer brand to associate itself with controversial figures and emotionally charged events.

"I think that he may have created something potent and provocative with the Summit Ice apparel venture," says Krieger. And, he's encouraging his audience to learn more about the Shoah.

Krieger notes that the VHEC's web traffic has increased since the Summit Ice episode and as of Nov. 10, Fielder has racked up more than $110,000 in sales, confirms his manager Dan McManus.

Fielder doesn't bring up his new company while in Toronto on Nov. 10, but there is a Summit Ice jacket on stage. And his thousands of fans know exactly what that seemingly innocuous windbreaker means. ■

Dominica: A feast for the senses

MELODY WREN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Through my window on the tiny four-seater plane, I was captivated by the lushness and dense greens of the thick jungle of trees completely covering the tiny island. No jumbo planes are allowed, as planes have to slam to an abrupt stop on the very short runway.

When you have guests for dinner, you don't blurt out the dishes you are serving as soon as they arrive. Dropped into the Lesser Antilles, this far-flung island plays the same way, teasing gently with appetizers in the form of something simple to whet your appetite. Unlike other Caribbean islands that flaunt their attributes, Dominica doesn't reveal its personality immediately.

A dizzying drive through winding mountainous roads led us to the ocean side cottages we were staying in. With 365 rivers, one for every day, navigating this small island of only 740 square kilometres takes time.

The salad course provides more substance to a meal, and in Dominica seeing the huge array of waterfalls you slowly get an idea of what the untamed island is about. The natural rugged beauty of the island is the lure as is the simple way of life. Without distractions, the singing of the birds is emphasized, as is the gentle sound of the rivers burbling, and the rustling of the trees in the dense rainforest.

The other tourists with me are hikers, adventurers, bird watchers, divers and sailors. One Norwegian tourist who sailed from the British Virgin Islands said that he has travelled all over the world and returns to Dominica for the uniqueness, unusually huge number of waterfalls, the sulphur springs, and the boiling lake.

A silver domed lid comes off in a flourish of the main course, which for me was the Champagne Reef Snorkel Tour.

I have snorkelled in other locations, which seemed astounding at the time, but this was definitely a substantial main course. Our guide – wearing brilliant yellow shorts so we didn't lose track of him-led us through the clear aquamarine water, pointing out fish we wouldn't have seen otherwise. Snorkelling near a live volcano created bubbles that were frequent attracting huge numbers of startlingly beautiful fish. After showering and changing we were lured towards the aroma of the on site charcoal barbeque roasting local fish and vegetables.

Dessert, the grand finale, was getting totally immersed in the natural surroundings as part of island life. Hiking the Waitukubuli National Trail is an ideal way to see the local trees and take in bird watching, an activity that brings tourists to the island from all over the world. The trail is a first of its kind – one of the longest hiking trails in the Caribbean, covering 185 kilometres, spanning and twisting the length of Dominica on unique and varied terrain.

Unique Glasses Helped Karen And Her Twin Sister Sharon
An eye specialist diagnosed Karen and Sharon with juvenile macular degeneration and said "There's not much to be done." Our mom was heartbroken. Years later, mom read an article about an International Academy of Low Vision Specialists (IALVS) doctor who designed special glasses that helped people with macular degeneration. "More curious than skeptical, we went. And it changed everything! For the first time in thirty years we could read! He held up a piece of paper and I could make out every word."

We only hiked a portion of it, but it does continue through coastal villages, up woodland hills, into lush rainforests, past waterfalls, down to rivers, back up to the mountains and down to the sea again. The island's unique and varied terrain and natural beauty earns its nickname, the Nature Island.

We visited Trafalgar Falls, a short distance from the trail and took a short 15-minute hike to get a close look at the unusual twin waterfalls.

As Sparrow, the local guide, rowed us up the Indian River near Portsmouth, he pointed out seaside hibiscus, whose flowers turn from yellow to orange as they age. Egrets, moor hens, kingfishers and different types of herons were interspersed with bolts of colourful flowers. He told us the history of the island, settled originally by native people including the Arawaks.

We paddled past places used as sets in Pirates of the Caribbean film, including a dock shaded by mangrove-like trees that belongs to the Bush Bar, a favourite hangout of Johnny Depp's during filming, according to Sparrow, a rustic open hut where you can order a number of homemade drinks, primarily made up of rum. Tall trees and elongated roots lined the wide river as we navigated our way through.

Indian River is the deepest river on the island, named after the Caribe Indians who went up the mountains.

Island hopping is common in this part of the Caribbean as ferries or chartered boats make it easy. As Dominica is so close to the French islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe, you can plan to visit all three or take the short flight from Antigua.

When I think back to the authenticity of Dominica, my body relaxes and my mind almost meditates, summing up the island perfectly. As a local said about Christopher Columbus landing there, he added, "It is one of the few Caribbean islands he would still recognize." ■

Where to stay:

There are several options on the island depending on what you are looking for:

I stayed at Picard Cottages for two nights: plain, simple, rustic cottages with all the basics covered. The simplicity of the cottages fit perfectly with the surroundings, standing on six acres of an old coconut plantation. The private cottages offer access to the beach and views over Prince Rupert Bay. www.picardbeachcottages.com

Rosalie Bay Resort: I only had one night at this elegant, luxurious resort. Nestled at the foothills of the More Trios Pitons on the southeast coast, it sits on 22 verdant acres at the intersection of the Atlantic Ocean and the crystal clear Rosalie River. The heavenly setting has everything you need right on the premises, but if you want to get out and explore, the management has a list of island tours they will arrange. Make sure you pick up soft cotton waffle weave robes, locally made soap dishes and carvings from the on site shop. www.rosaliebay.com

Presenting a how-not-to guide for your 20s and 30s

dkoren@thecjn.ca

Most of us have people we keep around in our lives purely for their optimistic nature, like the friend who reassures you that it wasn't a big deal when you scanned your girlfriend's texts to see who she was talking to, or so what that you answered your phone during an important job interview?

Josh Gondelman, co-founder of the Modern Seinfeld Twitter account and staff writer on Last Week with John Oliver, and writer Joe Berkowitz, however, actually give it to you straight with their new book: You Blew It!: An Awkward Look at the Many Ways in Which You've Already Ruined Your Life(Plume).

For a comedian like Gondelman, someone who's been lauded for his kindness over and over again, the book, at least from its title, offers a bleak and pessimistic view on life. Its actual content, however, proves to inspire more giggles than remorse.

"The premise of the book is, here's how you ruin your life, so you should steer away from these things," Gondelman explains to The CJN. "I don't know if it's necessarily satire, as it's not a parody of anything, but just a silly book of advice disguised as non-advice with jokes. It's simply jokes."

It sure is. The best advice, says Gondelman, is non-advice. "Stay in relationships and at jobs long past they're enjoyable and fulfilling because you'll never know when your next meal is going to come from and you never know if you'll find someone better," he says. "Find something that works and stick with it as long as you can."

Josh Gondelman

> It's a silly book of advice disguised as non-advice with jokes.

You Blew It! has been aptly described as a how-not-to guide for your 20s and 30s. It's a "here's how to ruin any situation" as opposed to a "here's exactly what to do," says Gondelman. "If you steer clear of this terrible behaviour, you'll find the spectrum of appropriate behaviour."

The book has an "underlying tone" that tells readers when things objectively feel good, you can still feel bad, and that's OK. "Maybe you did this ridiculous thing and screwed up a job interview or Thanksgiving, but everything good can always go bad. The flip side is everything bad is a hair's-breadth away from being good," he says, adding, "in terms of etiquette, of course. Not medical diagnosis or criminal charges."

As a purveyor of Jerry Seinfeld and Larry David-influenced content, Gondelman (who describes himself as an Elaine, except for on his bad days when he's "definitely a George") essentially has a PhD in Jewish comedy.

"The book is definitely located within the tradition of Jewish humour," he says, "as it's really fixated on specific things, and having specific, unwritten rules that are important, and wanting to codify those rules. That's the best part about Seinfeld, taking an unwritten rule, putting a name on it and saying, 'Look at this, this is what I'm talking about, you can't be a closer talker', or 'there's good naked and bad naked,' and I think this book continues that tradition."

He also notes an occasion during his Jewish upbringing that had a profound effect on his love for comedy. "I remember when I was 10, my grandfather received an award at his synagogue, I believe from Moshe Waldoks [co-author of The Big Book of Jewish Humour]. I fell over laughing, and read that book cover to cover. There was a lot of people you could look at in the tradition of Jewish humour and relate to, like, 'That guy's like me, we have similar sensibility, I relate to the things they're saying.' Like Mel Brooks, for example. He looks like someone I would know."

While You Blew It! can, at times, be personal, as a stand-up comedian and social media star, Gondelman's all too accustomed to being exposed. "When you do standup and people don't like it, you know they don't like it since you're in the room with them. So a book provides considerable more shelter and protection. I can just not read reviews. Very few people will actually reach out and say, 'Hey, I read your book and I hated it, and you're garbage,' whereas when you're on stage, you will feel the goodwill leaving the room."

In addition to writing tweets for Modern Seinfeld, and working full time on Last Week with John Oliver, Gondelman is also out four to five times a week doing standup comedy, which to him isn't even enough. "People who are in standup are easily doing 10 to 14 sets a week," he says. "I know the 'grass is greener' on the other side of the fence, but I just want all the grass."

However, it seems that Gondelman's lawn is one that would invoke more envy, noting his good fortune at working alongside Oliver on the acclaimed HBO show. "Sometimes I'll write the joke, and the way he'll do it is a hundred times funnier than I imagined it," he says.

As for his favourite Seinfeld episode, it's The Switch (where George and Jerry scheme a way for Jerry to date his current girlfriend's roommate). "I remember seeing that episode as a young teen and thinking, 'Yeah, that makes sense, that's what adult life is probably like.'" ■

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Cookbook features cherished memories

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Terraces of Baycrest has published a kosher cookbook of family recipes accompanied by anecdotes that reflect Jewish life in Canada and Europe from the turn of the 20th century to the present day.

More than 70 residents contributed to the Terrace's cookbook, aptly named A Ta'am to Remember. Ta'am means taste in Yiddish and Hebrew and many of the recipes are accompanied by personal memories of shtetl life, the Great Depression, the Holocaust, the immigrant experience and/or raising families during the postwar years.

A Ta'am to Remember, which was edited by CJN food columnist and author Norene Gilletz, will be launched on Nov. 29 at 2 p.m. in the assembly room of the Terraces. Gilletz, who has written 12 kosher cookbooks, will be there along with Lorraine and David "Sonny" Langer, sponsors of the cookbook.

Langer, a popular Toronto caterer, was the first administrator of the Terraces, when it opened in April 1976. The party for the cookbook will kick off celebrations marking the 40th anniversary of the Terraces.

Back in 2007 the late Rachel Orlan, a Terraces resident, set out to publish a cookbook of recipes and stories as a fundraiser for the Terraces. The staff began collecting recipes and they also asked Elaine Kaplan, the daughter of one of the residents (Dorothy Riegelhaupt), to assist them, because Kaplan had worked closely with Gilletz.

She in turn recruited Gilletz, and soon dozens of volunteers joined the team and began testing recipes. Many of the Terraces residents who contributed recipes to A Ta'am to Remember were intuitive cooks who learned to prepare the various dishes without written recipes, Gilletz said. "I often had to quantify and modify many ingredients and clarify the directions, but I always maintained the integrity of these recipes."

Kaplan, the project director, noted with sadness that many of the contributors to the cookbook have died and did not have a chance to see their names, recipes and stories in print.

"We hope the families of the contributors will cherish their stories and treasure their recipes." For more information about A Ta'am to Remember, visit www.baycrestterracescookbook.com or call 416-785-2500 ext. 2267.

Red lentil soup

Submitted by Jean Goldstein

- ❑ 1¼ cups red lentils
- ❑ ½ cup white rice
- ❑ warm water for soaking
- ❑ ¼ cup vegetable oil
- ❑ 1 large yellow onion, chopped
- ❑ 8 cups hot water
- ❑ 1½ tbsp. instant pareve chicken soup mix
- ❑ 1 tsp. ground cumin
- ❑ 1 tbsp. olive oil
- ❑ salt to taste
- ❑ lemon wedges to garnish (optional)

Place lentils and rice in a medium bowl and add water to cover. Soak for 20 to 30 minutes. Drain and rinse well. Meanwhile, heat vegetable oil in a large pot on medium heat. Add the onion and sauté until it turns golden about 5 minutes. Add hot water and bring the mixture to a boil. Stir in drained lentils and rice. Simmer, covered, for 25 to 30 minutes until lentils and rice are tender. Add soup mix, cumin, olive oil and salt. Stir well. If the soup is too thick, add water as needed. Simmer 5 to 10 minutes longer. Adjust the seasonings to taste. Garnish each serving with a lemon wedge, if desired. Yield: 8 servings ■

History of Catskills detailed in engrossing book

TOBY SALTZMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

You would expect a book on the Catskills to be funny.

"I know that," says Stephen Silverman, author of The Catskills: Its History and How It Changed America. "When people asked what I am working on – 'a book on the Catskills' – they'd say, 'Oh, that must be so funny.' And I would say, 'I'm really dealing with more than that.'"

"Sure," Silverman continues. "The Catskills was the training ground for all the names we know: Jackie Mason, Billy Crystal, Shecky Green, Jerry Seinfeld (he's basically one of the last), and a lot of names no one knows any more, like Myron Cohen. They knew their audience, and the audience knew them. Alan King – the quintessential product of the Catskills – and Mel Brooks – who cannot say anything that's not funny: these comedians and the audience spoke the same language, and I'm not talking about Yiddish or English." Silverman certainly delivers funny, laugh-out-loud moments as his meticulously researched opus sets the stage for Borscht Belt humour, but the book deals with more than that.

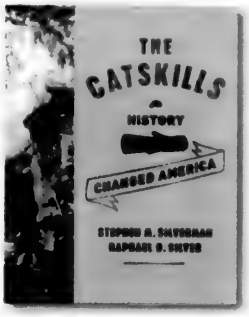
Pure history is rarely an easy read. "I'm informing the reader, but it's gotta be entertaining." He engages interest in the history of America's first frontier and first vacation land with literary aplomb, portraying fascinating vignettes peppered with idiosyncratic characters who ultimately shaped the modern American experience.

From Henry Hudson – whose 1609 voyage up the "Great River of Mountains" led to the naming of Hudson River – to the Civil War, the introduction of steamboat and train travel, the creation of the automobile, and the rise of New York City, to La Kvell Epoch – the glory days of the Jewish resorts – Silverman gives each era in this brilliantly illustrated book historic context, ultimately depicting the Catskills as an incubator of American culture.

Silverman honed his journalistic acumen as a journalism professor at Columbia University, working more than 10 years as chief entertainment writer of the New York Post, and spending the past 20 years as the founding editor of people.com and working with Time.

With painstaking detail, the author notes how works by America's first literary greats – Washington Irving's Rip Van Winkle and The Legend of Sleepy Hollow and James Fennimore Cooper's fictitious frontiersmen and his The Last of the Mohicans – gave the Catskills enticing cachet as North America's first getaway destination. Besides people wishing to tread in the character's footsteps, artists – including Thomas Cole and Asher Durand – flocked to capture the light of romantic landscapes on canvas, giving birth to America's first art movement – the Hudson River School – prompting the rise of hotels to accommodate them.

Over time, development in the Catskills provoked legal wrangles with land grants and tenants' rights, while burgeoning industries – namely mining, leather tanning, and damming of Catskill rivers to provide fresh water for a growing New York City – exposed dire slavery issues. Meanwhile, as robber barons gained notoriety, so did undertones of anti-Semitism. Compelling details describe scenarios of business tycoon Jason "Jay" Gould – a Christian who fought rumours of being Jewish – and author John Burroughs, who argued with automobile king Henry Ford and inventor Thomas Edison over their anti-Semitic actions. In conversation, Silverman relates that Henry Ford was virulently bigoted to such an extent that – when the Ford Motor Company singly sponsored Schindler's List on NBC – the movie critic, Judith Crist (who, incidentally, had a house in the Catskills) wrote the company to say: "Now I think I could consider buying a Ford."



The Catskills: Its History and How It Changed America
by Stephen M. Silverman and Raphael D. Silver

Alfred A. Knopf

As interest in the Catskills percolated, the area became a rich man's playground, though not for Jews. In conversation, Silverman explains, "What's fascinating is that as soon as you say 'Catskills' people think that's where the Jews went. But they didn't. The Catskills themselves were restricted. Jews really didn't start going there until 1914. No hotels would accept them. What happened was the tuberculosis sanitarium opened there, and – when it was discovered that tuberculosis was highly contagious – the rich 'WASPs' who filled the hotels and had homes there, fled. Real estate prices plummeted. So who moved in? Jews from the Lower East Side. At first they wanted to farm, but the soil was no good. So they opened boarding houses and fed everybody: they had chickens and cows, so they served milk and eggs. And lots of it."

Indeed. Jews – among them Selig Grossinger – started renting out rooms, offering meals, and setting standards for America's hospitality industry that blossomed from the kuchalayn – where summer renters schlepped everything, from their own bedding to food – to the growth of swank resorts including Grossinger's, the Nevele and the Concord, among others.

The stories of the resorts and entertainers abound with funny shticks. "While writing, I was laughing out loud to myself – telling myself, 'don't overdo it,' especially about the resorts, the reactions to all the food, the overeating, the counting the minutes to the next meal." Hilarious, too, are descriptions of the matchmaking zealots.

With so much documented material – covering comedians to politicians to celebrity love scandals involving the glitterati Debbie Reynolds, Eddie Fisher and Elizabeth Taylor – Silverman admittedly edited his text frugally, leaving "words on the cutting room floor. I had to focus. The profile of Sid Cesar is tied to the fact that he started in the Catskills at a hotel owned by his wife's family. Then I showed his place in television history. Gertrude Berg – Molly Goldberg – started in the Catskills and based all her characters on the people she saw at the hotel her father managed."

Engrossing, too, are the tales of Prohibition-era gangsters and bootleggers who retreated to the remote Catskills terrain "by hook or by crook." Arnold Rothstein, aka "Moses of the Mafia," who – besides being credited with bribing some Chicago White Sox players to allow the Cincinnati Reds to win the 1919 World Series – supposedly inspired F. Scott Fitzgerald's Meyer Wolfsheim in The Great Gatsby and Damon Runyon's character Nathan Detroit in the Broadway musical Guys and Dolls.

"Those who get it, will get it. To be like Jackie Mason, this book will appeal to both Jews and gentiles. The Jews will laugh about the food. The gentiles may not get it, but at least they will be informed." ■

Trudeau's cabinet balance upsets traditionalists

David Levine

Prime Minister Justin Trudeau made a splash with the recent announcement that his first cabinet includes an equal number of male and female representatives. And though the move has been widely hailed by Canadians, one Jewish organization is registering its objection.

In a statement released earlier this month, the Rabbinical Council of Canada (RCC) has again rejected the appointment of female cabinet members and called on the newly elected Trudeau to uphold more traditional structures that they say have defined Canada for generations.

Long respected as the seat of senior legislative authority, the Canadian cabinet has been famously dominated by a male membership – a tradition marred by antiquated stereotypes about the relative abilities of women. And while decades of social progress have yielded a steady increase in the number of women in senior federal roles, the cabinet has remained a stubborn outlier, with female membership failing to accurately reflect the demographics of the nation.

To many, Trudeau's selection of these female cabinet members represents a milestone in the quest for better legislation through better representation, but the RCC's response has been unequivocal: "In light of the announcement that Trudeau's government will celebrate the swearing-in of its first cabinet, and in response to the institution's claim that it 'is changing the communal landscape by actualizing the potential of women as government leaders,' the Rabbinical Council of Canada reasserts its position: the RCC views this event as a violation of our mesorah (tradition) and regrets that the leadership of the country has chosen a path that contradicts the norms of our community.

"In light of the opportunity created by advanced women's education, the Rabbinical Council of Canada encourages a diversity of halachically and communally appropriate professional opportunities for educated, committed women. Due to our aforesaid commitment to sacred continuity, however, we cannot accept either the ordination of women or the recognition of women as members of the cabinet, regardless of the title.

"Young Canadian women are now being reared, educated and inspired by mothers, teachers and mentors who are themselves beneficiaries of advanced women's education. As members of the new generation rise to positions of influence and stature, we pray that they will contribute to an ever-broadening and ever-deepening wellspring of studious, law-abiding, civic minded women who cherish and sentimentalize their place in the margins."

Alongside its statement, the RCC also released Constructive Alternatives, a document that outlines "reasonable and morally pure alternatives" to women being welcomed into the inner sanctum of Canadian political life. It's full of suggestions such as adopting the alternate title of "legal adviser," encouraging each female cabinet member to step down in exchange for a generous severance package, or the right to appoint her husband "or another suitably chromosomed individual" to her seat.

The statement was approved by a recent member vote, but in the hours following the announcement, social media was ablaze with support, indignation and rumours of a split within the totally real organization itself.

"As an RCC member, I'm proud to have voted against this motion," said Rabbi X, speaking on condition of anonymity. "These are exceptionally talented and qualified women who wish to dedicate themselves to public service. The notion that we have the right to exclude them is patently offensive."

Rabbi X is among what he calls a "vocal minority" of rabbis within the RCC who campaigned strenuously against the release of the statement.

"You mean re-release," Rabbi X points out. "The language is identical to the language that was approved years ago, when they first started considering women for these positions."

This redundancy has many critics calling the vote a cynical political exercise, meant only as a public rebuke to Trudeau's "activist" cabinet. Rabbi X and his cohorts agree, but have no plans to resign their membership in the RCC, an organization Rabbi X cherishes as "an indispensable moral compass." ■ Twitter @adavidlevine

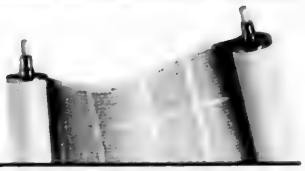
Vayetzei | Genesis 28:10-32:3



Rabbi Aaron Katchen examines the tension between present and future
Rabbi Michal Shekel says there is something different about Rachel Rabbi Howard Morrison looks for meaning in the word 'makom'

Aaron Katchen

"Like Rachel and Leah who both built the house of Israel" (Ruth 4:11).

Life is full of tension. We are constantly balancing between making the best of now and preparing for the future. If we only live in the "now," we sacrifice our financial security later in life, but looking forward is extremely difficult to maintain and can lead to being disconnected from the present.

Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, the first chief rabbi of pre-state Israel, attempts to reconcile this problem. He states that the ideal existence (in the Garden of Eden) was for the "taste of the tree to be like the taste of the fruit." To him, this means that we would benefit from our labours at every moment and not have to wait to see the payout from our efforts. We could thus stay focused on our goals through the validation that we're on the right path. But our reality doesn't reflect this ideal. The physical world is flawed, so we're left with the duality between now and tomorrow, temporal and eternal.

According to Rabbi Kook, the tension between Rachel and Leah in Parshat Vayetzei highlights this duality. Our ancestor Jacob loves Rachel, but he's tricked into first marrying her sister, Leah. Jacob immediately loves Rachel, willingly extends his labours to marry her and favours the children that she bears. This immediate love of Rachel, for Rabbi Kook, represents our perception of the present without seeing the implications for the future.

God's plan for the Jewish People was not through Rachel, but rather Leah. Our priests and kings descend through two of Leah's children, Levi and Judah. Through Leah's legacy, we can look beyond the struggles of today and aspire toward a lofty future. But Rachel and Leah are both needed. The Jewish People would not be complete without both of them. Leah provides hope for the future, and Rachel gives us the strength and comfort to manage today. ■

Rabbi Aaron Katchen, who is based in Toronto, directs Ask Big Questions Canada in partnership with Hillel.

Michal Shekel

Say it isn't so, Rachel! As Jacob and his family prepared to leave Laban's house and head back to Canaan, Rachel stole her father's household idols (Genesis 31:19).

Is Jacob's beloved a thief?

There are a number of viewpoints regarding her motivation. Midrash Bereshit Rabbah asserts that Rachel was only trying to keep her father from idol worship. Radak and other commentators attribute a divination aspect to the household gods. Some claim these figurines, called teraphim, were a protective charm. In all cases Rachel's motivation is to protect her family.

Biblical scholars raise another point. The Nuzi tablets from Mesopotamia show that possession of the household gods was related to inheritance. If so, Rachel has much in common with her bashert: Jacob stole the birthright, Rachel stole the inheritance; he tricked his father, she fooled hers.

Her trickery may have been a way to prove a point. When Laban came looking for the teraphim, Rachel was sitting on a cushion where she had hidden the idols, claiming, "I cannot rise before you, for the period of women is upon me." (Genesis 31:35) Through her words and actions, she is rejecting Laban's heritage – his household idols are no match for a woman sitting on a pillow.

There is something different about Rachel. The first description we have of her is not of physical traits but of her vocation: Rachel is a shepherdess. (Genesis 29:9) From protecting her flock, she grows into a woman protecting her family.

A final transformation of Rachel takes place in Midrash Eichah Rabbah. Pleading for the nation exiled due to idolatry, she takes God to task for being jealous of mere idols while she, a human, never succumbed to jealousy of her sister. Moved by Rachel's advocacy and example, God promises to restore the Jewish People to their homeland. ■

Rabbi Michal Shekel is the executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis and spiritual leader of Har Tikvah Congregation in Brampton, Ont.

Howard Morrison

On six occasions, the Hebrew word for place, "makom," appears in the opening narrative of Parshat Vayetzei. Jacob finds himself alone for the first time. "He [Jacob] came upon a certain place... Taking one of the stones of that place... and lay down in that place... Surely, the Lord is present in this place... How awesome is this place... He named that place Bethel."

The sixfold repetition of makom, place, suggests that there is deeper meaning to the word "makom." In the story of Jacob's dream, Jacob not only finds himself in a sacred physical place, but he is experiencing a place of spiritual transformation in his life.

On a universal level, there is no place void of God's presence. Thus, God revealed the Divine Self to Moses from a lowly bush. In the Shabbat morning Kedushah, God's glory fills the world.

On an existential level, the place of God's presence is found within every individual. It is no wonder that when we comfort mourners, we invoke the name HaMakom, the ever-present place, as a term for God's comforting presence.

On a theological level, a number of ancient commentaries have understood many of the Torah's references to makom as synonyms for Jerusalem.

I am writing this Dvar Torah at a time when Jerusalem has suffered many deaths and injuries as the result of cowardly acts of terrorism. It is true that God's presence is found in any place we find ourselves. At the same time, traditionally, we face the place known as Jerusalem when we recite core prayers of our liturgy.

May our brothers and sisters in Jerusalem find comfort during this challenging time. May the story of Jacob's place of transformation inspire a transformation in Israel from violence to peace and a spiritual transformation for all of us wherever we dwell. ■

Rabbi Howard Morrison is senior rabbi – Mara D'Atra at Beth EmethBais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto.

SeeJN | Rivlin to Toronto FC?

London's flamboyant Mayor Boris Johnson, left, joined Israeli President Reuven Rivlin for a Jewish-Arab soccer match promoting coexistence in Jerusalem, as part of his tour of Israel to promote investment in London. The pair helped kick off the new soccer season for the Equalizer organization, which works with around 140 schools across Israel to build confidence and understanding between Jewish and Arab children. The president and mayor met with local children and joined in as they held an exhibition friendly match. There is no truth to the rumour that Toronto FC is looking to sign Rivlin as their new centreback.

Leon Wieseltier: Iran deal part of poor Mideast policy

plungen@thecjn.ca

For 30 years Leon Wieseltier served as literary editor of the New Republic magazine, presiding over a forum for book reviews and essays. Educated at Columbia, Oxford and Harvard universities, Wieseltier also attended Flatbush Yeshiva in Brooklyn. He is the author of Kaddish, based on the journal he kept after his father died in 1996. Wieseltier was in Montreal recently to address the Flegg Annual Lecture at McGill University on the topic, "A Passion for Waiting: The Strangely Unexcited Messianism of the Jews." He spoke via telephone to The CJN.

Let's talk about the topic of your presentation in Montreal. What do you mean by the strangely unexcited messianism of the Jews?
I mean that the history of messianism in Judaism is the history of false messianism, and I wanted to explain why the people who invented the idea of the Messiah never accepted one.

Why are there so many false messiahs and why have Jews not accepted any of them?
I think that in my interpretation of the sources the reluctance to accept a messiah was actually intrinsic to the Jewish idea of the Messiah itself. It wasn't just that the right guy didn't turn up. We're set up to protect the reality that exists. Even though it's imperfect, it's sufficient for some of our purposes.

Where did the idea of messianism come from in the first place?
The figure of the Messiah originates in the Bible, but then it's developed in various ways, first by the rabbis of the Talmud and then by the thinkers of the Middle Ages.

Is it relevant to us today? Are there many people in the Jewish community waiting for the perfect circumstances to bring the Messiah here?
I think it's relevant in three ways. One, I think it's just damn interesting. Two, I think it's relevant to peoples' expectations of history. The theory of the Messiah is really the theory of what to expect from history, how much to hope for, and how to hope, and this is especially important for people who find themselves in adversity and need hope for a change. It's a way of thinking about change in the world and the various types and degrees of changes. In that sense, it's always relevant.

And thirdly, there still appear Jews with strong messianic inclinations, who either believe that the Messiah has arrived, as some of the Chabad Chassidim did, or who believe that the Messiah is imminent, as certain forces on the West Bank and in Jerusalem believe.

You've written a lot about Iran and come down pretty strongly against the nuclear deal. Israel is against it. America's Sunni allies are against it. Many people see it as a bad deal. Why do you think the Obama administration was so dead set on negotiating it?
The administration thought it was not a bad deal. They thought it was the best deal they could get under the circumstances, and some of them thought it was actually a very good deal, including the president.

The president has a personal obsession about doing something about nuclear proliferation, and like many people who have that obsession, he looks at it outside its larger political and strategic context. So, for example, we are very proud that we confiscated all of [Syrian President Bashar] Assad's chemical weapons, which was a great triumph of arms control, except it has had no impact whatsoever on the war in Syria. None.

You have to look at arms control in various political and strategic and historical contexts, and they don't do that. The president believes there are certain countries in the world toward which the United States has a certain prior guilt. Two of those countries happen to be Cuba and Iran.

The president is obsessed with the fact that in the 1950s, the CIA overthrew the leader of Iran, and in the 1970s, we allied ourselves with the Shah, who had his notoriously cruel secret police. He is less concerned about the fact that the regime that he is now doing business with is worse than the regime we did business with earlier and that the democrats and dissidents in Iran look to him and the United States for support in resisting that regime.

Why do you think it's a bad deal?
I can see why people would think that if you buy 10 years of respite from their enrichment of uranium, you accomplished something. My own view is that you could have bought more and that the price we paid for what we did get was too high.

How is the Jewish community in the United States responding to that deal? Are they behind it?
It's accepting the verdict and attempting to move on. The Jewish community knows that America's relationship with Israel is one of the pillars of Israeli security, and I think that it's looking to the future.

They lost. It wasn't a catastrophic loss. I don't believe it will affect Israel's relationship with the United States. I don't think it was a catastrophic loss even for AIPAC. AIPAC lobbied for a certain cause. Sometimes lobbies win and sometimes lobbies lose, and you move on to the next fight.

Leon Wieseltier

In Canada over the last few elections the Jewish vote moved from the Liberals to the Conservatives, in part because of their policies on Israel. Is something similar happening in the United States?
The largest Jewish vote any Republican president ever got was Reagan, and I think it was 30 per cent or under. I think American Jews do not vote solely on Israel. I think on many of the domestic issues they care about, they're solidly liberal. I think on foreign policy questions, a large number of them are solidly pro-Israel.

On more general foreign policy questions – such as what our policy should be, should America intervene in certain places, should we cut or increase the defense budget – I think that the community probably is more with the president than against him.

On the broader U.S.-Israel relationship, it seems that under the previous two administrations, relations with Israel were better, but that changed under the Obama administration.

It's well known that defence co-operation has never been better. That's uncontroversial.

Obama in his very correct attempts to find some solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and in his very correct opposition to the Israeli settlement of the West Bank, I think he was very heavy-handed in his approach and rather insulting to the Israelis in a whole variety of ways.

And I think [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu returned the favour by becoming insulting to Obama in a whole variety of ways. One has to separate the question of the Israeli-American relationship from the question of the Obama-Netanyahu relationship, which is poison.

But both countries are bigger than the people who lead them and longer-lasting, so I think it will be a good day for relations between the countries when the Netanyahu-Obama soap opera is finally over.

What about America's relations with its allies in the region. They turned on Mubarak in Egypt, they supported the Muslim Brotherhood against him. The Sunni regimes are angry over the Iran policy...
We have been totally inconsistent in the Middle East. We say Assad should go, and then we renege on our word to do something about it. We support the democratic rebellion in [Cairo's] Tahrir Square, but turn our backs on the dissidents in Tehran in 2009.

It's kind of a skill, but in the early years of the Obama administration, he found a way to alienate virtually every state in the region. Then along came the Iran talks and then the Iran deal, and if you take that, coupled with our continued stubborn and indefensible refusal to do anything consequential about the Syrian disaster, if you couple those things together, it looks like we're more tolerant of Shiite depradations than of Sunni depradations.

I think the president's foreign policy in the Middle East has been baffling to a great many people. He's disappointed many of our allies. He's been nasty to allies and friendly to enemies, and he sometimes acts as if our enemy, and I'm referring to Iran, may not be our enemy, which I think is ludicrous.

What he's left is a mess. His overriding concern is to leave office without us being militarily involved in a war in Iraq or Afghanistan. That really is an obsession. And he will try to arrange it so that will really be the case. But all that means is that as of inauguration day 2017, the next president is going to have to deal with a lot of issues that Obama just kicked down the road.

In Canada the niqab became an election issue, specifically whether women can wear it when taking the oath of citizenship. What's your view of that?
What's wrong with that? My own view is that that's entirely legitimate. I think it's a colossal mistake to approach a multicultural reality with anything but a multicultural spirit.

I think citizenship must never preclude difference. In fact, one should actually welcome difference, including its external manifestation.

From the standpoint of security and public identity, it's not too much to ask that a picture be taken for a driver's license.

I think if they wish to walk around with their faces covered, it's creepy in the extreme, and to people like ourselves it looks extremely dehumanizing... but it's not the role of the state to tell people how to practise their religion, unless the religion actually breaks the law. ■

Killing everything Joseph embodied in his Godly life

Backstory

EROL ARAF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

He loved Joseph.

No. I am not referring to Jacob, who adored his son Joseph, but to the Prophet Muhammad, who, when asked "Who is the most honourable amongst the people?" replied, "The most honourable among them is the one who is most Allah fearing." They said, "O Allah's prophet! We do not ask about this." He said , "Then the most honourable person is Joseph, Allah's prophet, the son of Allah's prophet, the son of Allah's Khalil."

This is related in Sahih al-Bukhari: A Collection of Hadith, compiled by Imam al-Bukhari, whose work is recognized by the overwhelming majority of the Muslim world to be most authentic reports of the Sunnah (teachings) of the Prophet Muhammad.

Those who tried to burn the Tomb of Joseph in October knew neither his song nor the abiding love and admiration their prophet had for the prodigal son of Jacob: the recipient of the coat of many colours.

The story of Joseph is woven to the rich spiritual, artistic and intellectual tapestry of all three Abrahamic faiths as it is related in religious texts, Islamic miniatures, illuminated manuscripts, in paintings to die for – who could not feel the oceans of sorrow that wash over the face of Jacob in Giovanni Andrea de Ferrari's or Rubens' masterpieces? – in novels such as Thomas Mann's Joseph and His Brothers, in musical works including Handel's majestic oratorio Joseph and his Brethren, in Richard Strauss' The Legend of Joseph, in musicals among which we might count Andrew Lloyd Weber's and Tim Rice's Joseph and The Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat, in DreamWorks' animation film Joseph: King of Dreams, in Iranian Farajollah Salahshoor's film Yousef e Payambar (Joseph the Prophet), and in Bernard Lang's book Joseph in Egypt: A cultural Icon from Grotius to Goethe.

In Islam, Joseph is so revered that although the stories of other prophets are mentioned in various passages, the complete narrative of Joseph is given in one section titled Yusuf, according it unprecedented honour. Ismail ibn Kathir, who was among the most influential Sunni scholars of the Shafi School, in his celebrated commentary states that touched by God, "Joseph was the greatest, the most noble and most exalted" among Jacob's sons.

But it is in Sufi mysticism that one finds the most profound rendition of the trials, tribulations and triumphs of Joseph, as Jalal al-Din Muhammad Rumi's perspective imparts the story with universal spiritual import transcending faith- specific interpretations. For it was Rumi who wrote:

" I am not from the East
or the West,
I am not Christian or Jew or Muslim.
I am not Hindu, Buddhist,
Sufi, or Zen.
I do not belong to any established religion or any cultural system.
I am neither the body,
nor the soul,
for I belong to Divine Soul of my Beloved."

Endowed with such universal values, Sufis have drawn from Joseph's story lessons of mystical, ethical and theological significance rooted in all consuming Divine Love. As such, Rumi saw the life of Joseph as a parable of God's way, a way which a mystic should focus his journey- following the way of love.

Rumi lamented that Joseph did not sleep at night for 10 consecutive years, pleading every single night with God on behalf of his brothers. Rumi has Joseph say, "O Lord, forgive my brothers, or I will fill the foundations of this palace with hundred more brotherly cries and tears of mine."

In Islam, there is no blasphemy, no sacrilege, no burning of the Tombs of Patriarchs, no murderous rage. Where are the voices of the faithful condemning the burning of Joseph's Tomb as an affront to the Prophet Muhammad? Is not this silence another way of killing everything Joseph embodied in his Godly life?

Thomas Mann in the Prelude to Joseph and His Brothers, entitled Descent to Hell, writes " Very deep is the well of the past. Should we not call it bottomless?" He might have added "So is the well of hatred!" For this is a bottomless well endlessly filled with tears and jealously guarded by silent ghosts. ■

Fontana Primavera a premier choice for any function

It's a gem of an event centre sitting in the heart of Vaughan.

Fontana Primavera specializes in kosher weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, corporate conventions, seminars, fundraisers and other gatherings.

With four luxury banquet halls that can be separated or put together for a larger function, there are options for any sized event at Fontana Primavera.

Fontana Primavera can host anywhere from 20 to 1,100 guests, with dividable luxury ballrooms and large lavish bridal suites.

Bringing 45 years of experience, Fontana Primavera staff has mastered the art of banquet hospitality.

Phil Aiello says, "We have a fresh and modern architectural look. There is no facility that looks like this."

Elegantly landscaped lush gardens with gazebos and water features are perfect for wedding photos. The facility includes a large tent perfectly equipped for ceremonies and receptions.

What sets Fontana Primavera apart is its extravagant, lavish facilities including underground parking and exceptional white-glove service from its uniformed staff.

Elite, unique with a reputation for fine international cuisine, Fontana Primavera Event Centre prides itself on being a five star experience.

"We offer savoury tables, stations for sushi and lamb, and you can quench your thirst with your own signature martini from our flowing Prosecco display.

"We offer a variety of delicious desserts ranging from chocolate fountains to fresh fruit displays and sweet tables," Aiello said.

Fontana Primavera specializes in international cuisines including Italian, Portuguese, Greek and Russian.

Family traditions – the ties that bind

HEIDI ZACKON
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

For Tevye, the iconic Papa in Fiddler on the Roof, tradition was all about the classic roles and expectations for each member of a family. Today, this definition has broadened, as traditions have become uniquely personalized to represent the many ways families come together in both daily life and times of celebration.

"My best memories of childhood are all about the things we did together as a family year after year," says Sharon Silver of Montreal. "Of course we had the traditions and rituals surrounding the various holidays, but often it was the little things we did on our own that I remember most fondly." Silver describes setting the holiday table with her brother by pretending they owned a hotel and were preparing for the fancy guests who would arrive. Or, how after a long Passover Seder, all the cousins would take turns sitting in their grandfather's big reclining chair and eating special candies out of a crystal dish.

For Silver, 49, everyday things were just as important as holiday rituals, as she reminisces about fresh bagels for Sunday morning brunch, the whole family squishing into the car bundled in ski clothes for a day up north or roasting marshmallows together after the weekly summer barbecue. "These memories are of the simplest things, but that is why I appreciate them," says Silver.

SHUTTERSTOCK.COM

Now as a parent herself, Silver recognizes how important these little rituals are in bringing her own family together in special ways. "When my son Michael was younger, we would have a scavenger hunt for his birthday. If he was turning eight, I would place eight little notes in different spots around the house and he would have to find them all throughout the day. It was something he would look forward to each year," says Silver.

Silver recalls how her older son Jason started a birthday tradition when he was six by sharing his favourite cake with his great-grandmother, as their birthdays were just days apart. Now, years later, Silver still bakes the same cake every birthday, making it both a celebration and a special way of remembering a cherished relative.

With her children older now and their lives becoming busier each year, Silver realizes the traditions create opportunities to come together and stay connected. This year for Chanukah, they made sure to get together each night even though their schedules had them running in different directions. Silver brought out the family menorah, hand painted by her son years ago, and they fell into the usual routine of each one alternating turns to light the candles. Afterward, everyone went off again, back to their own lives.

"My boys were the ones who asked what time we would be getting together each night, even without my reminding them. It was just as important to them now too," says Silver. "Even though our time together was short, the feeling of coming together is what mattered. That's what really lasts." ■

Wedding speeches and toasts documented for posterity

ELAINE COHEN
SUPPLEMENTS CO-ORDINATOR

Wedding and bar mitzvah toasts date back centuries and the toasting tradition is practiced throughout the world.

Today, however, no one has to dig through scrapbooks or albums to track down toasters' good will wishes.

Words and gestures are not only recorded and stored on video and websites but every move can be retrieved on tablets, laptops, smartphones, and personal computers.

Caroline Tiger author of Wedding Speeches and Toasts and Other Words for Family and Friends, notes the history of the term "toasts" stems from the early decanting process, whereby scorched toast was placed at the bottom of the wine bottle to absorb sediment.

Toasts usually begin after cocktails, once everybody has been seated for the meal. Speeches and toasts may be interspersed so that a few are reserved for the end of the dinner.

MCs should compare notes in advance to avoid repetition, as well as to confirm the order of speakers.

Groom toasts bride.

The parents of the bar/bat mitzvah child, or bride and groom, usually welcomes guests and thanks them for coming. Other family members or close friends follow. Every toast should end with compliments as well as l'chaim and best wishes.

Everyone appreciates a dash of humour, provided jokes and anecdotes are in good taste and refrain from embarrassing or hurting celebrants' feelings. Avoid private jokes or stories that allude to something familiar to only a select few. While some hosts hire a speechwriter or secure a friend's assistance, many people compose their own addresses.

When writing a speech or toast, start with a rough draft. Spill out what comes to mind and don't worry about grammar until the editing stage. Jog your memory with the following queries: How long have you known the bar/bar mitzvah or bride and groom? Do you have an inspirational or humorous story related to them? What are five words that come to mind when you think about them? Numerous proverbs and famous quotes are public domain, so take advantage of this source. These sayings may serve as an appropriate tie-in to the tribute itself.

With regard to composing the text and presenting the two-minute speech and toast, Tiger offers numerous tips. Divide the toast into three parts: introduction, tribute and toast. As soon as you mount the podium take a deep breath, look around you, and make eye contact with the guests. Introduce yourself to the guests by announcing your full name, connection to the hosts and relate your tribute to the occasion. Speak slowly and distinctly. The day of the simchah, limit alcohol intake to remain alert and coherent. To conclude, raise a glass and propose a toast.

Speeches can be delivered without a text or read aloud from a printed sheet. If planning to read the speech, make sure the print is a decent point size and the type is double spaced. If you're not reading it, jot major points on an index card and memorize the first and last lines.

Anyone hesitant to give speech writing a try, should heed the advice of Angela Lansbury, author of Wedding Speeches and Toasts (Family Matters). "Don't worry too much about giving a [great] speech," she said. "This is a happy occasion and people aren't going to mind."

Tiger offers similar advice. "Don't try to style yourself into a modern day Shakespeare, just be natural but respectful."

Nevertheless, speech writing shouldn't be left to the last minute, and remember the axiom "practise makes perfect." Prolific humourist Mark Twain once quipped, "It takes three weeks to prepare a good impromptu speech."■

Wine how-tos boosts knowledge for novice and seasoned hosts

Wine is intertwined with many customs and rituals. Children observe their parents light the candles and chant blessings over challah and wine for Shabbat and holidays. Families and friends present toasts at ceremonies, celebrations and life cycle events.

Learning the types of wines, what to purchase, and how to store and serve, is just a sampling of topics readers will discover in Melanie Wagner's Hello, Wine: the most Essential Things you Need to Know About Wine. Distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada, the well bound little book is full of information. Lucy Engelman's colourful illustrations complement the text.

When a couple becomes engaged, their parents, relatives and friends host parties, and invariably they bring out the wine. Wine gurus as well as novices will benefit from Wagner's knowledge. An author/lecturer, Wagner is an accredited sommelier with a passion for her profession.

The author starts from scratch describing how to open a bottle and pop the cork. Subsequently, she elevates the reader's perception of viticulture with technical information. She addresses concerns readers may never have considered. The text is concise, well substantiated, and filled with memorable tips. Furthermore, after closing the book, readers are bound to feel more confident choosing, serving and drinking wine.

It pays to invest in good quality wine glasses, she explains. Aesthetics aside, studies on taste and scent from the Yale School of Medicine have proven that flavours perceived as more or less pleasurable are based on where wine lands in the mouth. The design and shape of stemware suited to specific wines serves that purpose.

Riedel, an established wine glass manufacturer, carries more than 250 types of wine glasses, many specific to certain grapes or regions. For wine with bubbles, Wagner uses a tall flute with a larger bowl than lip. Thin clear crystal tulip-shaped flutes work especially well. Tall flutes are not a necessity but Wagner shuns the shallow champagne coupe or saucer-shaped wine glass for sparkling wine.

According to Wagner, the best part of drinking sparkling wine is watching bubbles escape while savouring the aroma, but that occurs too quickly in a wide-brimmed champagne coupe. She also advocates hand washing glasses and letting them air dry.

Holding a glass by the stem prevents hands from marking or heating the bowl. Swirling the glass aerates contents adding oxygen to wine. Filling a glass to the brim defeats the purpose. It's preferable to stop halfway and once imbibed offer refills.

A moist cork is a tell-tale sign the wine bottle was correctly stored on its side but the scent is the absolute indicator.

ABT (acidity, body and tannin) are important elements associated with wine. Acidity is the pronounced tang running through the core of wine. Warm places create wines with lower acidity, whereas higher acidity is more prevalent in wines from cool regions like Germany. Higher acidity acts as a preservative adding to a wine's shelf life.

Body refers to the wine's weight or viscosity. The more alcohol, the more body Wagner explains. Light-bodied wine is like skim milk. Conversely, strong-bodied wine is like whole milk. Tannin, the component that dries the mouth, is the compound that comes from the skins and seeds of grapes. It may become apparent in wine that is stored too long in an oak barrel. Tannin is a natural preservative, found in Cabernet Sauvignon and Bordeaux wines.

Wine lists, language and phonetic pronunciation tips serve as a boon for readers ordering in restaurants or at a liquor store.

Wagner dispels wine myths, such as pink wine being passé, but doesn't dismiss some truthful elements in the mix. ■

Tightening the budget strings at your party

LAUREN KRAMER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

It's easy to get carried away when you're planning a party. Pinterest is abuzz with tantalizing ideas for décor, and every host wants a great menu, a spectacular venue and a series of vendors that excel at what they do.

The budget can be a source of many problems, however, particularly when that vision is handicapped by financial constraints. So, how do you balance the budget and still have the party you want? Here are our top tips:

Time of year and time of day make a big difference to budget, party planners agree. Avoid nuptials on a Saturday night and opt for a party outside of the peak season – i.e. between the months of April and October.

Many start their party research by contacting a reception venue and receiving quotes on catering. The word "minimum spend" comes up often and can be misleading. Remember that the starting price represents the cheapest centrepieces and the least expensive item on the menu – a far cry from the most desirable or the one you want as host/hostess. To avoid confusion, ask potential venues about the average price per person instead.

Once your party budget is more clearly defined, it's time to discuss the feasible length of your guest list. If your party is going to include dresses, favours, hairdresser, makeup, cake, photography, videography, transportation and a myriad other details, here's a good formula for figuring out the financials. Multiply the number of people you intend hosting with the price of food and drink at your venue. If that number comprises 60 per cent of your budget, you're on track. The remaining 40 per cent will be absorbed by the rest.

If the numbers you calculate are unfeasible, well, start trimming. Fast. There are two ways to do this: take things you wanted out of the party or reduce the number of guests. But first, sit down and list the top three things that are most important to you at the party. Keep that list handy so you don't lose sight of it as you budget-crunch.

Consider reducing the time allotment for your party. Cutting it by a couple hours will reduce the costs associated with your music vendor, photographer, videographer, catering and reception venue

Host a breakfast or brunch reception instead of a dinner, which is considerably more expensive.

> First, sit down and list the top three things that are most important to you at the party.

Cake talk: instead of ordering a large, expensive cake, choose a smaller one for display and serve guests cake slices from a much cheaper (but no less delicious!) sheet cake stored in the kitchen

Printing costs for stationary can mount up quickly. Consider writing or designing your own table numbers, programs and menus. There are myriad innovative ways to communicate information to guests. Consider chalkboards, attractive mirrors or handwritten signs instead.

Party favours are extras that don't always justify their expense. If favours are a must at your party, give one per couple instead of one per person. And consider making them yourself instead of purchasing them. ■

How sweet it is – eye catching desserts

ELAINE COHEN
SUPPLEMENTS CO-ORDINATOR

When a couple becomes engaged, or a boy or girl is called to the Torah as a bar/bat mitzvah, family and friends are eager to entertain them.

Brunches, luncheons, teas and dinner parties are among the popular gatherings. Dessert is always in order and stunning cakes and exquisite epicurean items make an impression.

The challenge lies in turning out picturesque desserts that taste scrumptious. While some dessert aficionados overlook calories, others shun refined sugar or prefer less per recipe.

Icebox Cakes by Jean Sagendorph and Jessie Sheehan and Baking with Less Sugar by Joanne Chang differ in focus but both books are chock full of luscious desserts. Distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada, these hard-covered books are beautifully illustrated and every detail of each recipe is explained. Furthermore, the authors offer tips, which novices and experienced bakers will appreciate.

Icebox Cakes lives up to its theme – recipes for the coolest cakes in town – and Tara Donne's vibrant photographs embellish every glossy page. Authors Sagendorph and Sheehan go for rich, creamy fillings. They devote separate sections to preparing layers, fillings and toppings that enable bakers to achieve excellent results. Among the components are wafers, puddings and fruit. Although ingredients differ according to recipe, the method is similar.

Decorating ideas add to the beauty of each presentation. A few of the many choices are Chocolate-Grand Marnier Cake, Black Forest, Key Lime Pie, Chai-Ginger Cake, Raspberry Ganache and White Chocolate Orange Cake.

The easiest recipe in the book is a proven favourite. The "old school" recipe yields nine to 12 servings and is composed of homemade or store bought chocolate wafers, vanilla whipped cream and chocolate shavings for decorating.

Baking with Less Sugar is geared to individuals interested in curbing consumption of refined sugar. Author Joanne Chang majored in mathematics at Harvard University but opted to forge her niche as an author, magazine contributor, pastry chef and co-owner of epicurean bakeries in Massachusetts.

> The challenge lies in turning out picturesque desserts that taste scrumptious.

Chang clearly states her profession is not medicine, therefore, Baking with Less Sugar isn't meant as a manual for people with diabetes or related conditions. Chang used honey, maple syrup, molasses, fresh fruit and juices to attain desired sweetness.

Anyone who is looking for a useful gift for newlyweds can be assured that Baking with Less Sugar will set them off on a healthier path, yet satisfy their yen for sweets. Furthermore, fledgling and culinary experts will discover helpful hints. Joseph De Leo's photographs are breathtaking.

The majority of luscious recipes in the first chapter contain one-half a cup of sugar or less with a few exceptions containing two-thirds of a cup. A gathering of well-honed home bakers were quick to compliment the blueberry bran muffins and vanilla pecan coffee cake. Of course, these are just two of more than 60 entries. Chapter 2 is devoted to chocolate lovers and one enticing pie is a truffle chocolate cream. ■

Destination draw

MARILYN LAZAR
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Bar/bat mitzvah or wedding hosts are discovering the obvious allure to a destination simchah. However, there are also some pitfalls to consider in order to avoid disappointment and unpleasant surprises.

Especially with weddings, across the Caribbean, resorts promote "free weddings", but what does that really mean? Inclusions range from a reception with numbers tied to the number of guests who book rooms, to a honeymoon suite for the bride and groom. Not that a destination wedding connotes cheap by any stretch. In fact, celebrities have popularized the concept and lent it a certain cachet.

In metropolitan hubs, hosts are turning to interesting architectural structures for venues or even vacant warehouse spaces which they build up and decorate to the hilt. But if your ceremony is taking place on a beach at sunset, there's really little you need to add to the setting; the ambience is built right in. With stunning backdrops provided by Mother Nature, it's easy to make the most of your surroundings. Who needs a formal bouquet when you can use freshly cut blooms? No need for fancy lighting under palm trees and a canopy of stars.

The question is one of style: Are you prepared to forego a limo in favour of a motorboat? Will you feel comfortable in a romantic sundress instead of a structured bridal gown, simple hoops instead of diamond chandeliers in your ears? Perhaps you actually prefer an untucked linen shirt and chinos over a tux. Simplify your wedding favours, too. Think local and pick up some rum, vanilla or a craft at the market.

The devil is in the details. Make sure not to limit your research and communication to the online experience. Arrive in time to see samples where possible. There are event planners that can be hired locally but that's probably unnecessary. Most resorts have an in-house coordinator who will be pleased to work with you. Make sure to clearly communicate your requirements and desires beforehand. The packages are self-explanatory.

Destination wedding does not necessarily mean a beach location. One couple I know returned to the ski resort mountaintop where they met. It can have special meaning for the bride and groom, be someplace they've always wanted to go, or simply work out as an enjoyable trip.

Another important thing to keep in mind is that the timing and price point of your choice may not suit everybody on your guest list. Before making your decision, make peace with the fact that you may receive some flak and some unexpected nos. How will you feel if a grandparent isn't strong enough to travel or your best friend can't get time off of work? That being said, modern technology – from teleconferencing to Skype - make it possible to include people in the ceremony who can't be there and let them listen to speeches in real time. You can also organize a small post-nup party back home and watch the movie.

Just make sure you're not harbouring a vision of a Vera Wang in a formal ballroom. Because if your silk shift is comfortable as you backbend in the limbo to a calypso beat, then you just may have your wedding cake and eat it too. ■

Learn how to tie one on

MARILYN LAZAR

Be it a welcome rite of passage or a road he goes down kicking and screaming, there comes a time in a man's life when he must don a tie.

If you are more at home in your jeans than in a tuxedo, you're not alone. But whether you're taking the plunge for yourself, your partner or your family, here are some tips to help you do it with dignity rather than reluctance. So leave the Rambo-style handkerchief in the schoolyard and set an example for the next generation. Wear a tie.

There are several ways to knot a tie, each one exuding a different impression or style. These include the Pratt knot, the four-in-hand and the half-Windsor. Let's leave those for the occasions where you're rushing through your finishing touches in the elevator and concentrate on a proper Windsor knot.

The full Windsor knot originated with royalty and is definitely old school, reeking of confidence, power and respect. It's best suited to a tie of thin material, though it creates a presence with width and bulk.

What better time to learn to tie a classic Windsor knot? After all, you don't have to be a duke to look and feel regal.

Seven simple steps

• Always use a mirror. Turn up your collar and button the top button. Place the tie around your collar, seam inside.

• Bring the wide end up through the loop between collar and tie.

• Bring the wide end back down. Pull the wide end underneath the narrow end and to the right, back through the loop and to the right again so that the wide end is inside out.

• Bring the wide end across the front from right to left. Avoid using too many fingers. Three fingers will give you a wider knot, but two is best. (Obviously adjust to individual finger circumference.)

• Pull the wide end back up through the loop again.

• Bring the wide end down through the knot in front. Use both hands to tighten the knot carefully and draw it up to the collar. The perfect length will fall about an inch above your belt.

Hint: Never leave your tie knotted when storing it – it will last longer and look better if you hang it loosely. There are special tie hangers to organize multiple ties, but any padded hanger surface will provide a loose drape. ■

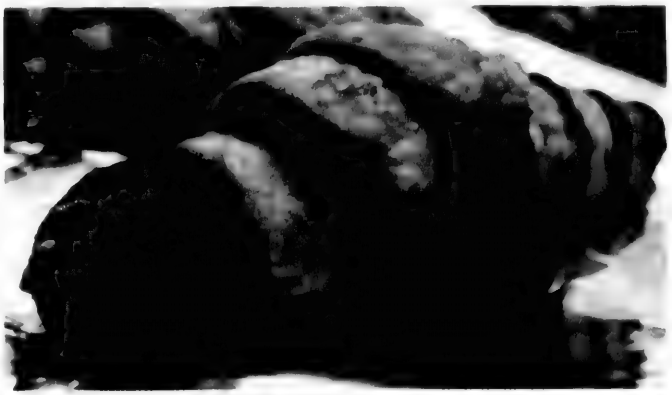
Does this beloved pastry need to be dairy to taste good?

ROBERT GLUCK
JNS.ORG



Rugelach (singular: rugala) are a beloved traditional Jewish pastry, with a quirky history to boot, but they often present a kosher conundrum. Though pareve rugelach are often a preferred dessert after a meat meal, some of today's most popular rugelach are known for their dairy fillings.

Pastry chef Paula Shoyer – author of the books The Kosher Baker: Over 160 Dairy-free Recipes from Traditional to Trendy and The Holiday Kosher Baker: Traditional & Contemporary Holiday Desserts – calls herself "a huge fan of rugelach," but says that over the years she has been "disappointed at the quality I find everywhere."

"Kosher bakeries sell versions that are dry and filled with over-processed fillings, giving the cookies a fake, too-sweet taste," Shoyer tells JNS.org. "As a result, I rarely buy them, or even eat them, at kosher events. The only rugelach I have enjoyed in years are from Zabar's in New York, and those are good because they are made with butter and have so much chazerei (Yiddish for junk) in the filling."

Shoyer, however, says she has perfected a pareve rugelach recipe made with soy cream cheese and pareve margarine. Like the Zabar's version, she loads them up with lots of fillings. She calls them "everything rugelach," and the recipe is included in The Holiday Kosher Baker.

"They are easy to prepare, have a flaky crust, and you can fill them with whatever you like," says Shoyer.

Where do rugelach come from, anyway?

According to Joan Nathan's Jewish Holiday Cookbook, traditional rugelach are made in the form of a crescent by rolling a triangle of dough around a filling. Some sources believe rugelach and the French croissant share a common Viennese ancestor – crescent-shaped pastries commemorating the lifting of the Turkish siege during the 1683 Battle of Vienna. But this might be an urban legend, as both rugelach and their supposed ancestor, the kipferl, pre-date the early modern era, while the modern-day croissant did not originate earlier than the 19th century. This leads many to argue that the croissant is simply a descendant of either rugelach or kipferl.

Food writer and caterer Vered Guttman says the origins of rugelach date back to the Hungarian kifli, Austrian kipfel, and Polish rogal.

"The crescent-shape filled pastry was originally made with yeast dough and filled with fruit jams, poppy seed paste or nuts," Guttman has written for the Israeli newspaper Haaretz. "Today rugelach may be the most popular sweet pastry both in the American Jewish community and in Israel."

Shoyer, meanwhile, says rugelach "are an American adaptation" of Austria's kipfel.

"Early versions used a yeast dough, but a recipe for the cream cheese version, popular today, was first published in 1950," she tells JNS.org. "Today some are made into crescents, but many companies, including myself, like to bake the square ones which are faster to assemble and hold more filling inside. Over the years I have developed several recipes, including a rugelach dough that is chocolate, and I am currently working on a whole grain rugelach dough for Joy of Kosher magazine."

Jane Moritz, owner of the Challah Connection vendor, has specialized in Jewish and kosher gifts since 2002. Her rugelach were voted "best mail order dessert" by David Rosengarten, an American chef, author, and television personality who hosted more than 2,500 television shows on the Food Network from 1994-2001. Moritz's rugelach were also featured on Epicurious.com as one of food blogger Sarah Kagan's suggested Eight Delicious Hanukkah Gifts.

Challah Connection assists customers with holiday shopping, sending gifts for occasions ranging from a housewarming to a shivah, or simply gathering around the table with loved ones. The company, says Moritz, "takes the symbolic foods of the Jewish holidays and creates gifts, and people love our kosher bakery items no matter what the season. We can't sell enough babka, challah, and rugelach."

"Our rugelach really are delicious," Moritz tells JNS.org. "They're dairy-based rugelach. They've got butter and cream cheese, which is great, although some people like to have pareve rugelach so they can have them after a meat meal."

Moritz says regarding her website's sales, "Babka may be taking the lead over rugelach, but we sell a lot of rugelach."

The aforementioned Zabar's rugelach are touted by the company's website as the favorite rugelach of New Yorkers.

"When you catch the warm aroma of our rugelach," the website states, "you'll immediately know why New Yorkers think ours [are] the best. Zabar's rugelach would make Grandma proud: made by hand, flaky, rich, sweet, fragrant, and stuffed with raisins or chocolate. Each order contains a full pound of our famous rugelach, in your choice of chocolate or raisin."

The Zabar's rugelach are made from cream cheese, butter, cinnamon, chocolate, raisins, and more.

"It's an old family recipe," Scott Goldshine, a store manager for Zabar's in New York City, tells JNS.org. "Our store is highly regarded because, like our founders, we are very much sticklers for quality."

Goldshine says Zabar's emphasizes the principles of "quality control at all levels, constant tasting, constant sourcing of the best products available, rejecting things we don't think are up to our standards."

"Everybody's grandmother has a recipe for rugelach," he says. "People make rugelach in different shapes and sizes and flavours. It's morphed into many flavours. We carry 10. We do a very large business in rugelach. I can make a living selling just rugelach." ■

Savvy planners study schedules before setting simchah date

ELAINE COHEN
SUPPLEMENTS CO-ORDINATOR

At first glance, setting a simchah date seems simple but celebrants are advised to do their homework to avoid disappointment. Besides studying Jewish and secular calendars, wise planners run the date by family, close friends and clergy before banking on their presence.

Career commitments, university examination deadlines, pre-arranged surgery, tax time for accountants, busy seasons for retail merchants, pre-scheduled business trips are all bound to have an impact on the final decision.

Furthermore, some couples are so set on a certain venue or vendor that they defer the date until learning the respective place or party is available.

Bar mitzvah dates depend on the Jewish calendar as well as the date of the child's birthday. Since both sides of the family are involved in planning a wedding, the consultation process is more intense.

In most instances, the celebrants' circle of family and friends includes a number of out-of-towners. Therefore, it pays to flip through the calendar to figure out which national and/or international holiday weekends would work out well. The invitation may serve as an incentive for out-of-towners to extend a long holiday weekend or plan a mini-family vacation around the date of a function.

Another factor to keep in mind is the change of clocks: Remember to spring forward one hour in the spring, and fall back one hour in the fall. It's a good idea to email reminders.

Rosh Chodesh, the beginning of a Jewish month is an auspicious date for a couple to begin their married life together. Weddings are not held during Shabbat but ceremonies can be performed after the conclusion of Shabbat at nightfall. ■

Asian-themed bridal shower a sure hit

RANDY FINGRUT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

My mother, Joyce, and my sister-in-law, Jo Ann, were the official hosts for my daughter Carly's Asian-themed bridal shower. I was appointed the official caterer. Carly spent three consecutive summers teaching English in different areas of Asia and loved every minute. We wanted to bring back some of her warm memories from that time.

At our first meeting the three of us discussed and planned the menu. Carly is a vegetarian, so we went with Asian dishes that are amazing without any meat. We assigned ourselves chores, including sourcing out party products, specialty bakeries and Asian decorations.

First we checked out bridal shower and Asian party ideas using the Internet on sites like Pinterest. Then we visited party stores to check out items including decorations, paper dishes, napkins, and plastic cups, tasting or dumpling spoons, chop sticks, Chinese food boxes and plastic tableware. We made notes and took photos on our phones in order to compare. We visited several Asian supermarkets to see what they had to offer. There we found quite a variety of chop sticks at very reasonable prices. We picked beautiful patterned chopsticks for the meal along with a bulk package of plain chopsticks for my surprise dessert. Next we took a trip to Toronto's Chinatown.

We had a great time visiting all the stores on Spadina Avenue and along Dundas Street. In a huge Asian restaurant and kitchen supply store we found bulk Chinese food boxes, the ones that are square and have a wire handle. I needed these for my surprise dessert.

We bought a sleeve of 100 boxes for less then what 30 boxes would have cost at the party store. In some of the other smaller shops we found wall decorations, mini-cherry blossom trees that light up, charming paper umbrellas, colourful paper fans, bright Chinese lanterns all with co-ordinating Asian colours and designs, and Chinese silk-patterned fortune cookies.

We dropped all of it into the car and resumed our shopping search. We were hoping to find our party favours, and we were victorious. We found adorable Asian silk change purses. We also found attractive patterned plastic gift bags to wrap the favours in. I designed the shower invitations on the computer with a little help from my tech genius cousin, Kyle.

The front of the invitations boasted a Chinese lantern with delicate butterflies. On Pinterest we found several photos of cakes decorated to look like sushi platters, done with fondant.

None of us had the time to create such a masterpiece, so that was sourced out to a baker of wedding and other fancy cakes. I did my grocery order three days ahead of the shower and all the prep work two days before. I needed a minivan load of fruits and vegetables, fresh breads, Asian ingredients, sauces, spices, noodles, and wontons, veggie ground round, pop and Oriental rice cracker and nut mix. Next we visited the LCBO for some wine.

At home I started off by baking cupcakes, (banana/chocolate), almond cookies and Carly's favourite coconut cheesecake. I developed the recipe for this cheesecake for Carly on her 19th birthday, when she became of legal drinking age, as it contains a fair amount of Malibu Rum.

Next I began washing vegetables and doing all the chopping and dicing that could be done in advance, cooked whatever needed cooking, made the dips and sauces, and prepared the dumpling filling. Jo Ann was also busy at her house, baking her specialty cake balls decorated with edible handmade cherry blossoms. As well, she made amazing homemade fortune cookies that she stuffed with fortunes and then decorated with either a tuxedo or a bridal veil made of icing.

The day before the event we all got together in my kitchen, along with several other helpers, and started to assemble all five of the salads: Cherry Coleslaw, Asian Noodle Salad, Thai Cucumber Salad and Thai Crunch Salad. Next we assembled the cold Thai vegetarian spring rolls, the dumplings, and the cucumber fan sandwiches. The dumplings were the only dish that needed to be cooked after assembly, but we planned to serve them cold on the tasting spoons.

Lastly we assembled the surprise dessert, Fried Rice Cupcakes. The prepared cupcakes were iced with French vanilla icing and then dipped into toasted Rice Krispies cereal. Then they were sprinkled with candies that look like peas and carrots. The candies are often available at specialty candy stores, but orange and green Skittles will substitute nicely.

The cupcakes were placed over a marshmallow in each Chinese food box. This was to raise the cupcake up to be visible in the Chinese food boxes. They were then "garnished" with a "Carly's Shower" sticker and a pair of chopsticks. All that was left to be done the morning of was to set up the room with the decorations and tableware.

CHINESE FRIED RICE CUPCAKES

Preheat oven to 350.

Gather all the items needed to bake and decorate the cupcakes. Prepare following ingredients to make two separate batches of batter.

Prepare cupcake tins with approximately 2-4 dozen cupcake paper cups. The amount of batter made may depend on the size of the bananas.

First batch

- 3/4 cup canola oil
- 1 cup sugar
- 2 large eggs
- 2 tsp. pure vanilla
- 4 large ripe to overripe bananas, peeled
- 2 cups flour
- 1 tsp. baking soda
- pinch of salt
- 3/4 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips

In food processor, with feed tube removed, combine oil, sugar, eggs and vanilla. Replace feed tube and add in bananas and run processor until smooth. Add in dry ingredients and pulse until combined. Add in chocolate chips and pulse until chips are combined and some are actually chopped up. Scoop about 1/4 cup of the batter into each cupcake cup.

Second batch

- 3/4 cup canola oil
- 1 cup sugar
- 2 large eggs
- 2 tsp. pure vanilla
- 4 large ripe to overripe bananas, peeled
- 2 cups flour
- 1 tsp. baking soda
- pinch of salt
- 3/4 cup Nutella

Prepare batter exactly the same as above, but at the end combine in the Nutella until batter is chocolate coloured.

Scoop about 1/4 cup of the second batter over each cupcake cup. Using a knife, gently draw lines in the batter in different directions in each cupcake. This will "marbleize" the batter. Bake in preheated oven for about 25 minutes or until cake tester (toothpick) comes out clean.

Decorating the cupcakes

- 1 can of vanilla frosting
- 2-3 cups Rice Krispies
- orange and green candies, i.e.: "peas and carrots" found at specialty candy stores, Skittles, Smarties or M&M's.
- large marshmallows
- square Chinese food take-out boxes

Line a baking sheet with parchment paper and cover with the Rice Krispies.

Bake in a 350 oven for 3-10 minutes watching them until they become a golden brown colour. Cool. Frost the cupcakes with a thin layer of frosting then press the iced cupcake into the Rice Krispies. Press on a few of the green and orange candies. Place a marshmallow in each box, then place a cupcake over it so that you can now see the top of the cupcake. Insert a pair of chopsticks into the right side of each box. ■

A chassidic revelation, and a kosher grape juice juggernaut?

Welch's teams with Manischewitz

With sales flat for its non-kosher product, Welch's, the largest U.S. grape juice brand, is targeting kosher consumers by co-branding a new kosher offering with Manischewitz, the venerable Jewish food maker known for kiddush wine and matzah. Starting in 2016, the two brands will sell pure grape juice, certified kosher by the Orthodox Union, with bottles featuring both company's logos. Manischewitz matzah boxes will also advertise the juice. Welch's abandoned a kosher version a few years ago amid low sales.

Baal Shem Tov descendant comes out

A 24-year-old descendant of the Baal Shem Tov, the 18th-century founder of chassidic Judaism, has come out as transgender. Raised haredi in Brooklyn, N.Y., Abby – originally Srully – Stein revealed to the New York Post and announced on a personal blog that she recently began transitioning to become a woman. Stein is the grandchild of Rabbi Mordechai Stein, a prominent Skver rabbi. She said being a member of a famous chassidic family made her struggle more challenging. She also said her father hasn't spoken to her since she shared the news. She thinks he's in shock and "doesn't know what to do." Stein married a woman and had a son before divorcing and leaving Chassidism four years ago. She's now a student at Columbia University and is involved in campus Jewish life and a transgender support group.

Dutch dorm room gets Nazi makeover

Senior students at Leiden University in the Netherlands redesigned the dorm room of a Jewish freshman with motifs from a Nazi death camp as an initiation prank. The incident, reported Nov. 13, involved members of the prestigious Minerva Society, the country's oldest student group. Mass graves were painted on the floor, barbed wire hung on pipes and the German words "Arbeit macht frei" – meaning "work makes you free," the slogan the Nazis hung on death and concentration camps – was spray-painted on the walls. Minerva said the act wasn't a sanctioned activity, while the school is considering disciplinary action, including expulsion. ■

Letters to the Editor

Excluded by rabbinic vote

"Wait, you're actually interested in Jewish things outside of school?"

This is a real question I have been asked as a high school senior by other students. I am the weird one who actually enjoys being immersed in a tradition that is thousands of years old, that connects me to my family, my people, my God.

It was nice to know that at least when I was older, when I would be a maharat (Orthodox woman ritual leader), that I would be able to be a part of a community that would welcome anyone with open arms who decided to devote herself to a life of Torah and fear of God, no matter what title she may choose for herself.

Because of the new Rabbinical Conference of America statement, I can't have that hope anymore. I will always be an outsider in my personal pursuit of Torah and God, just because of my gender.

'We refuse to be enemies'

We live in a world which is unrecognizable from pre-9/11 times. Extremists of all shades find emotional justification and distort people's commitment to faith, democracy and civilization to carry out mayhem in the name of what they regard as sacred and the great majority finds abhorrent.

The latest monstrosity in Paris must be condemned forcefully, but not be allowed to justify a backlash against victims of violence escaping bloodshed and trying to reach Europe and Canada. Our government should not be discouraged. As Canadians, we need to continue our humanitarian work with a balanced approach that will keep Canadians safe.

We must find a way to address the conflicts of the 21st century with contemporary understanding. Otherwise, the declarations of war and revenge will only bring more hate, more killing, more war and the vicious circle will continue until we destroy our sense of personal security and our humanity with it.

There are no adequate words to express the outrage over the killing of innocent people anywhere. But our outrage must not be selective. No one should feel they can justify taking innocent lives be it in Syria, Iraq, Libya, Israel, Palestine, Sinai, Africa, New York or Paris. As Jews and Muslims we have seen both state and non-state terror and are committed to continue our joint efforts to ensure that "Never Again" is a promise kept.

Jointly, in keeping with our group's theme this year of twinning of mosques and synagogues, we refuse to be enemies and will not play into the hands of those who would goad us into violence and the quicksand of mutual destruction.

As Jews and Muslims, we call for healing and justice for victims of intolerance everywhere.

Early warnings about Dion

Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion and the Liberals are already showing their true colours ("New foreign minister has mixed record on Mideast," Nov. 12.)

Firstly, they are pre-judging Israel as guilty for any future matters that may arise, clearly stating it will be judged differently and their tone concerning it will change. How can they do such a thing before events and circumstances even occur?

Secondly, they attack former prime minister Stephen Harper for his uneven defence of Israel, when all Harper ever did was to stand up to tyrants and clearly state that Israel has a right to defend itself. If these stands are offensive to the Liberals, perhaps we have to fear that we trusted them to speak on our behalf.

Will the Paris attacks change attitudes in Europe toward Israel's security situation?

RABBI·2·RABBI

The meaning of redemption

Jews are a people wedded to hope, and as messy and awful as the world can be, our tradition tells us that our efforts can still make it whole

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Splansky: With so much to fear in the world today, it is hard to be hopeful. And yet, a central theme of our daily prayers is redemption.

We praise God for the precedent set by our redemption from Egypt. We pray that God will speedily redeem the People of Israel today. And we conclude each service with the hope that all the world will be redeemed, made whole.

Judaism is a messianic religion. And Jews are a people wedded to hope. True, we express it differently – some believe God will send Mashiach ben David to redeem us tomorrow, while others believe secular labour movements, human rights watches and environmental activism are the sources of redemption.

Rabbi Yehudah Tzvi Hirsch of Stretyn taught: "Each Jew has within the self an element of the Mashiach, and is required to purify and assist it to mature. Redemption will come when all Israel have brought this messianic spark to perfection within."

Ultimately, it is a burden and a privilege to carry the weight of this process of redemption.

Rabbi Fishman: One of my favourite books on Jewish responsibility has a wonderfully provocative title: There Is No Messiah… And You're It. The author, Rabbi Robert Levine, traces the idea of the Messiah in Judaism and concludes that each of us is an agent for bringing the world to its completion.

There can be no more optimistic belief. But how that process develops is not so simple.

One strain within our tradition believes that everything will be done for us – not only will peace, harmony and the brotherhood of man be gifted to the world, but the Third Temple will fall from the sky and land perfectly on the site of the Temple Mount.

By contrast, Maimonides, always the great rationalist, believed mankind will be the focus of the rebuilding. This more collaborative effort speaks to me much more. God is less interested in miracles and more focused on human accomplishment. Truly, the future is in our hands.

Rabbi Splansky: The Jerusalem Talmud's tractate on prayer begins with the following exchange: at dawn, Rabbi Chiya and Rabbi Shimon ben Chalafta were walking in the valley beneath the Arbel Mountain by the Sea of Galilee. They saw the morning star's light break through. "That," said Rabbi Chiyah, "is like the process of redemption. First it emerges a little at a time, and the more it continues, the greater the light increases."

I've climbed Mount Arbel. From its peak at daylight, the valley beneath seems to go on forever, the farms below make a lit up patchwork of green and gold, and the Kineret beyond is bright blue. But these two Sages walked in the valley before dawn – to them, Arbel must have looked imposing and bleak, casting a deep shadow on top of the darkness. Yet, they had the faith to trust that the sun would rise and the courage to draw out the metaphor.

God's creation is sometimes predictably miraculous, other times surprisingly disastrous. Similarly, the human process of redeeming the world is sometimes predictable and sometimes surprising. The primary role of the Jew is, like those two rabbis, to always be on the lookout and never to despair.

Rabbi Fishman: Never despair, indeed.

In the song we like to teach our children, we sing that the whole world is a very narrow bridge, where the main aspect is not to be afraid. When Rabbi Nachman of Bratslav taught this idea, he touched upon one of the greatest truths in human psychology – that we all have a tendency to be afraid.

The greater the stakes, the greater the possibility for fear. And so when we look out at our world today it is understandable that getting on a plane can induce a moment of panic, and travelling by bus or even walking the streets of Israel can scare some. Add to that ever-growing list attending a concert or going out for a drink in Paris.

But as messy and awful as the world becomes, let us never be afraid to live and celebrate life. After all, our tradition reassures us that through our efforts a redeemed world can be achieved. ■

What we learned from Rabbi Ya'acov Don

Every terror attack on Israelis is a tragedy, but some attacks are pure nightmares. Last Thursday's strike near the West Bank settlement of Alon Shvut, which left three dead, including an 18-year old yeshiva student from Boston, falls into the latter category.

For many Canadian Jews, there was a personal connection to this attack. Rabbi Ya'acov Don, who spent four years in Toronto in the late-1990s working as a shaliach (emissary), was among the victims. (A Palestinian man was the third person killed.) As the news began to spread, Rabbi Don's former students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (TanenbaumCHAT) and in the Bnei Akiva youth movement took to Facebook to eulogize their former teacher. They remembered him as charismatic, down-to-earth and optimistic, an educator who left his mark. Having spent some time with Rabbi Don during his Toronto sojourn, I completely agree.

The day after the attack, The CJN received a letter from Tomer Chervinsky, a TanenbaumCHAT graduate of 2001, titled "What I learned from Rabbi Don."

"During my four years at CHAT, no one teacher touched my life as much as Rabbi Ya'acov Don," Tomer began.

"He was a shaliach, from a West Bank community… I was a know-it-all secular lefty who challenged every one of the religious precepts he taught, and yet, he taught me more than any other teacher I've ever had.

"Ask anyone who knew Rav Don, and they'll remember his infectious grin, his ready smile, his quick wit and his passion for education. He pushed us to try harder, learn more, revel in knowledge and debate, and build communities of friendship and respect. He worked hard to ensure every voice was heard – even when he disagreed. He was the model of brilliance, compassion, supportiveness and humour that define the word mensch."

Tomer continued: "In Grade 12, a friend and I were running a Yom Hazikaron/Yom Ha'atzmaut ceremony, when alcohol from the memorial flame spilled and lit the gym on fire. Cue the extinguishers, the evacuation and my nervous breakdown… Rav Don was our staff advisor on the project – and when we wanted to cancel a second ceremony, this is what he told me: 'I understand you're stressed and embarrassed. If you don't respect the amazing work you put into this ceremony, that's fine, but I do, and I won't let you throw it away.' To this day, those words remind me that it's not how far you fall, it's how you stand back up.

"What Rav Don taught those of us who were lucky enough to know him was that we could passionately disagree – in that way that Israelis do – but still love each other. That we could debate ideas with a smile and a kindness that today's world is missing."

"I know all of us who knew the Don family while they were in Canada are saddened, and our hearts are with his wife, four children and [their] entire community. May they find comfort among the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem."

Tomer, and so many others who were positively influenced by the mustachioed, baritone-voiced shaliach, are part of Rabbi Don's legacy. May his name continue to be a blessing for us all. ■ — YONI

The last trip to Auschwitz

Steve Paikin

What compels someone to return to the site of one of the most monstrous evils the world has ever known? What provokes someone to walk, once again, under that gate that offered the promise of freedom, if only you worked hard enough (Arbeit Macht Frei), but which actually led to an inferno built specifically to obliterate your family, your friends, and your neighbours?

In the fall of 2014, Mordechai Ronen would have to face those questions one last time. The government of Poland had decided to sponsor what would likely be the last ever gathering of Auschwitz survivors, on the grounds of that former killing factory. The occasion was the 70th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, which would take place on Jan. 27, 2015. Ten years earlier, at the 60th anniversary ceremony, more than a thousand survivors were invited to attend. This time, organizers were expecting a fifth of that number to show up.

Mordechai decided to return to that place, along with his wife Ilana, his son Moshe, and his granddaughter Sari. In addition, I was humbled and honoured that the Ronen family wanted me to accompany them on the trip as well.

The morning after we arrived in Poland, Mordechai was his usual upbeat self over breakfast. He'd tell a joke, or tease Moshe about what he was eating. He didn't betray a single hint of the pain that would emerge later that day. Even during the 75-minute bus trip to Auschwitz, Mordechai's compartmentalization continued.

But when we arrived in the town of Oswiecim, near the confluence of the Vistula and Sola rivers, suddenly Mordechai got very quiet. The smile disappeared.

We entered what is now (in Polish) called the Auschwitz-Birkenau Muzeum. There is about a five-minute walk from the entrance to the notorious Auschwitz gate, and throughout the course of that walk, one could see Mordechai begin to tense up. Suddenly, this man who was marching swiftly through airports began to walk slowly, at one point, even limping, taking the arm of his wife or granddaughter for support. His face was transformed. He began to cry.

Mordechai would be one of about 15 Auschwitz survivors to gather at the Arbeit Macht Frei gates. Waiting for him and the other survivors was Ronald S. Lauder, head of the World Jewish Congress. "Welcome," Lauder says to him. Mordechai reached out and hugged him. The tears continued. There were perhaps twice as many journalists there as survivors, and I saw in them something I've almost never seen in more than three decades of covering public events: I saw respect. I saw tenderness. I saw cameramen and reporters accustomed to banging into each other and shouting out their questions to "get the story" showing these survivors a kind of deference they normally never demonstrate. You might not think that's worth noting. But in this day and age, it's an incredible rarity.

"What are you thinking as you stand here," a reporter gently asked Mordechai.

"Horrible place," Mordechai replied, as Lauder puts his arm around him. "Things happened here that we can never let happen again."

"Abba...Ima...." Mordechai cries out, using the Hebrew words for "father" and "mother." Sari is holding his arm, trying to give him strength, rubbing his back, and trying to keep Mordechai as calm as possible. "I'll tell it to the world," he continues. "I hope it'll never happen again!"

Back amidst the barracks and wire fences, he dabs his eyes with a tissue. There are other survivors here. But Mordechai is centre stage. The cameras are almost all focused on him as he continues his monologue.

"I'm here, and I can tell the world what happened," he says. "I went through this." Then, referring to his wife, son, and granddaughter, he says: "They give me the courage to be here. I wanted to be here because I can tell what happened. To all the people denying it, you can see me here. And I can tell you, it happened."

Sari continues to stay close to her grandfather. Moshe and his mother Ilana are also watching Mordechai carefully. They are torn. On the one hand, they support his decision to return here, and fully appreciate his mission. But they are both deeply concerned about the pattern these trips can manifest. Mordechai can quickly become deeply morose, descending into an increasingly agitated state, so much so, that it becomes nearly impossible to stop the tears from flowing. Moshe has learned that the key is to find just the right moment before stepping in, interrupting his father's monologue, and stopping it all. It's hard to know when. He knows Mordechai needs to get the deeply pent up emotions out of his system. It's cathartic. And it's part of the mission. But he also knows his father can tumble into an agony where he appears to be on the verge of a nervous collapse.

"I'm strong," Mordechai yells through his tears, now crying with increasing volatility. "I'm a victor! I lived!"

Moshe and Ilana are watching carefully. They can sense that the moment where they'll need to intercede is close at hand.

"They were murdered here," Mordechai says of his family members. "I'm here to tell the world. It was difficult but I had to do it. I hope this will be my last time to say goodbye to my parents. My father, my mother, my two sisters...." Mordechai is now absolutely sobbing. He appears on the verge of a meltdown. "I couldn't even say goodbye...."

Ilana leans over to Moshe and says, "It's enough, I think he's had enough."

"Come," Moshe says to his dad, interrupting the soliloquy, putting his arm around his tormented father, and bringing the interview to an end. Mordechai is crying, but the rest of his family's influence is calming him down.

One photographer has an idea. He wants all 15 survivors to pose for a picture with Lauder under the Arbeit Macht Frei sign. It takes some doing, getting all the survivors under the sign, and getting everyone else out of the way. But eventually, it happens. Mordechai has stopped crying and has a stoic look on his face. One female survivor even shouts out: "We should all return in 10 years!"

"I agree," says Lauder.

But unsaid, yet understood, is that this will almost certainly be the last time many, if not all of these survivors will gather here. ■

Why Orthodox Judaism needs female rabbis

Despite the RCA's latest statement on the issue, more and more women are leaning in

RABBI LILA KAGEDAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

I was en route to Ottawa when I received the first alert about the Rabbinical Council of America's (RCA) resolution rejecting female ordination.

It was Erev Shabbat, a time of anticipation for welcoming the Sabbath queen. A time of peace. A time spent readying ourselves for a much needed day of rest. And yet chaos had ensued.

What a disheartening way to bring in Shabbat kodesh, the holy Sabbath. What sadness to usher in Shabbat with feelings of fragmentation rather than of unity, and with feelings of discord instead of harmony.

I wasn't surprised by the outcome of the RCA's vote per se, but I nonetheless felt frustrated. As an Orthodox rabbi, the title I assumed upon receiving smichah from Yeshivat Maharat this past June, I want to be accessible to my community. The RCA resolution made me worry that I would not be able to serve in my fullest capacity.

Rabbi Lila Kagedan says she clings to and relishes Jewish tradition.

Within minutes of that first alert, my phone began to ring off the hook, my inbox was flooded with emails from colleagues, friends, family, teachers and mentors. I called my colleagues, the incredible women in my field. They were frustrated by the resolution, but the truth was they barely had time to discuss it, as they were busy preparing for Shabbat, putting finishing touches on their sermons and rushing after a full day of work as busy clergy. Nonetheless, the tone of the correspondence – including from some individuals within the RCA – was one of comfort and support.

I am a traditional person. I cling to Jewish tradition and relish it. And it was the adherence to tradition that motivated me to take the time-honoured title bestowed upon those who have learned what I had learned at Yeshivat Maharat. Rabbi. That's what we call a person who fulfils all of the requirements to receive smichah. It was simple and clear to me.

I often wonder what would happen if a woman graduated from medical school but did not assume the title "doctor." What would happen when she went to see her patients? How would they know what she was there to do?

My talented and inspiring colleagues, the graduates of Yeshivat Maharat, have taken a variety of titles, including "maharat," "morateinu" and "rabba." They are my role models, and I respect the choice of every woman in the rabbinate to take the title that works for her. That is, after all,

> If this were a non-issue and didn't pose a threat to the status quo of the Orthodox rabbinate, it would not have been commented on the philosophy of Yeshivat Maharat. The yeshiva confers the degree, and the musmachot, the ordainees, choose a title.

The day of my ordination was an incredible experience of celebration for me and my colleagues. And yet the fixation on my title – instead of on my learning and skill set – was a dark cloud. My new title was met with push-back and aggression in many Orthodox circles.

Nevertheless, women's ordination in Orthodoxy is alive and well. The RCA's latest resolution – a reaffirmation of its 2010 ruling on the same issue – emerged because of the success of women in the Orthodox rabbinate. If this were a non-issue and didn't pose a threat to the status quo of the Orthodox rabbinate, it would not have been commented upon. Orthodox Jews already knew the position of the RCA regarding the ordination of women. The organization's apparent need to republish and reassert its position only affirms the place that women in the rabbinate have already assumed. Women working in Orthodox clergy have already been placed in pulpit positions, educational settings and other areas of Jewish communal life. And their addition to these settings has been beneficial to the communities that they serve.

The commitment of these women to avodat HaShem, to holy work, speaks for itself. Women entering the Orthodox rabbinate are doing so specifically because of their commitment to tradition, Jewish law and Jewish practice, and because we know well that young people need role models they can relate to. We feel protective of the Jewish community, and are compelled to work to ensure its survival. And in an age when there is a woman running for president of the United States, do you really think that young Jewish women will be satisfied with only male leadership to look up to?

The entry of women into the Orthodox rabbinate follows in the great Jewish tradition of women assuming roles of leadership and service. Jewish women have been active leaders from the time of the Bible.

I wish rabbis would denounce far-right Zionism

Mira Sucharov

Progressive Zionists (of which I count myself) have long been calling for big tents in our Jewish institutions. Diversity, dialogue and pluralism have been our buzzwords. The broader the tent, we've known, the more likely it is that we will have our voice heard. The call has seemed especially urgent as our Jewish institutions have tacked rightward, following the lead of Israel's government under Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. And when it comes to our synagogues, places where we gather to serve our spiritual needs, the call has seemed especially important.

But here's a bold proposal: what if progressive Zionists demanded that, rather than adhere to big-tent pluralism as a principle, our pulpit rabbis actually pushed values-based Judaism? If they did, they wouldn't only give sermons condemning adultery, and they wouldn't only call for congregants to get off their iPhone on Shabbat. They would remind us that there are an array of Judaic values that are simply incompatible with right-wing Zionist thought and practice.

Consider the ideas promoted by Israeli Minister of Education Naftali Bennett, head of the Jewish Home party. Despite his party's name, Bennett's vision is anything but Jewish – that is, if we think about the values embedded in Judaic teachings such as "love your neighbour as yourself," or "in the image of God" were all humans created, or "justice, justice you shall pursue."

In an opinion piece Bennett penned in the New York Times last year, he laid out his vision for the future of Israel and Palestine. Under Bennett's plan, Israel would continue to occupy the Palestinians – well, 90 per cent of them at least, the ones who live in "Area A" and "Area B" – forever.

Under Bennett's vision, only Area C would be annexed to Israel, with Israeli civil law extended over that area, and its resident Palestinians (who number 300,000, or a little over 10 per cent of the total of West Bank Palestinians) would be granted Israeli citizenship. This would mean keeping nearly 90 per cent of the Palestinian population of the West Bank – roughly two million Palestinians – under the power of a military occupation over which they have no electoral say. Yes, checkpoints in those areas would be removed, and sure, Palestinian control over local governance matters would be put in place, but democracy, rights and justice would not exist.

At the JSpace Canada conference I attended in Toronto earlier this month, rabbis who care deeply about shepherding healthier and more robust dialogue on Israeli-Palestinian relations talked of creating "safe spaces" for conversations around Israel to flourish. Of course, I understand their instinct, and if I were in their shoes, I might articulate things the same way.

But what if rabbis didn't allow for every opinion to be considered valid? Just as most rabbis take a public stand on an array of behaviours – such as no cheeseburgers, no Ponzi schemes and no slander – what if they declared that the kind of Zionism being peddled by the far-right in Israel today flies in the face of timeless Jewish values?

There are a few possible outcomes, of course. The right wing might be chastened and consider a shift in viewpoint. Or the right wing, feeling alienated, might leave those shuls, with only progressive Jews remaining. More likely, though, the right wing of the tents that some rabbis have been careful to fashion might turn on them. Rabbis might in turn find themselves out of a job.

If I were an employment adviser, I don't think I could, in good faith, recommend it. Unlike professional scholars, rabbis regrettably lack the security of tenure, a convention that affords scholars like me the ability to speak, teach and write directly from our own intellectual and ethical compass. But a little part of me – the part that longs for moral clarity from our spiritual leaders – wishes they might one day try it. ■

The EU doesn't have the last word on Israel's global standing

Mordechai Ben-Dat

It was widely publicized earlier this month that the European Union lent the weight of its moral authority – now rapidly approaching zero – to the BDS movement against Israel by deciding to attach the label "Israeli Settlement" to any product from Israel made in the "occupied territories."

Prof. Eugene Kontorovich of Northwestern University points out the discriminatory aspect of the EU's policy. It "carves out a special legal rule for Israel," he explains, "not only contradicting the EU's own official position, but also going against rulings of European national courts and violating basic tenets of the World Trade Organization. It must be viewed as just one step in a broader, purposeful and gradual escalation of anti-Israel measures by the EU." Kontorovich further warns that "diplomats in Brussels and NGOs have made clear that more coercive measures will follow."

But let not the EU policy be the last word regarding Israel's standing among the nations of the world. It is important that readers have a fuller, more accurate sense of Israel's relations with other nations when weighing the moral gravity of the EU's noxious initiative against the Jewish state.

• China and Israel recently signed an agreement in Jerusalem, following initial discussions in Beijing in August, to increase co-operation between the two countries in agricultural matters relating to joint research, commercial application and farming practices. For many years now, Chinese agricultural experts and governmental officials have trained or studied modern agronomic methods in Israel.

• Israeli farming methods and agro-technology appear to be taking root in India. For example, the recently opened Indo-Israel Centre for Excellence in Gharaunda, India, is part of an expanding network of learning centres that provide Israeli expertise in drip irrigation, fertilization and greenhouse growth methods to farmers and other local Indian experts. Some 20,000 Indian farmers visit the centres in the network each year. As a result of Israeli agricultural mentors sharing their knowledge with Indian protégés, the yield in new vegetables among these farmers has grown to about six million seedlings annually as compared to half a million seedlings four years ago.

The centres are part of the Indo-Israeli Agriculture Project, a joint initiative under the auspices of the Israeli Foreign Ministry. So far, 15 centres for vegetables and fruits have been established in nine Indian states. Dan Allof, counsellor at MASHAV (Israel's agency for international development co-operation), said Israel "will set up centres [in 16 more states] in the third phase of the project between 2015 and 2018." These centres also plan to focus on modern dairy management, post harvesting and sewage water treatment for reuse in agriculture.

• Israel21c.com carried an interesting story about six distinct devices developed in Israel that have become standard equipment for emergency crisis or disaster relief around the world. Among the life-saving devices listed in the story is an emergency bandage used to stanch bleeding from hemorrhagic wounds. Invented by a former Israeli military medic, it is now widely used in more than 50 countries. This is the bandage that Arizona medics used in 2011 to save the life of U.S. Congresswoman Gabrielle Giffords after she was shot. (See the story on Israel21c.com for a complete description of all of the devices.)

In a separate article, Israel21c reported on the locations around the globe where Israelis are currently working or have recently provided emergency relief to people in need. Disaster relief teams remain or have lately assisted in 22 locations, including the United States, Greece, Turkey, Philippines, Ethiopia, Vanuatu, Haiti, South Africa, Iraq and Gaza. Medical teams are currently in 20 countries, including Congo, Cameroon, Romania, Syria, Nepal, Iraq, Ethiopia, Taiwan and Peru. Environmental teams are in 10 countries, including Senegal, Ethiopia, Marshall Islands, Rwanda, Burundi, Turkey, Jordan, Senegal and Georgia. Psychological teams are in six countries. Educational teams are in Japan and Kenya.

One wonders how many humanitarian teams from, say, the EU, are currently providing emergency relief services around the world. ■

How to leave a lasting legacy for Jewish education

Rabbi Jay Kelman

When they turn 71, most Canadians get a windfall when they begin to cash in the savings that have accumulated in their RRSP. Having had this money accumulate tax free for 40 or 50 years and despite knowing that at some point tax would have to paid, people are nonetheless dismayed and even surprised at their large tax bills – in most cases, 50 per cent of the RRSP monies received. No wonder an entire industry has developed on how to best shelter that money.

Ironically, many would prefer not to have to receive any money from their RRSPs, postponing paying tax indefinitely. Having lived without this money for years, many do not suddenly need it at age 71. But they have no choice in the matter, since at age 71 one must begin collecting and paying tax on their lifetime savings. The amount one must withdraw begins at just over five per cent of the entire RRSP amount and increases each year so that by age 80 it is close to nine per cent of the remaining balance.

A person with an RRSP of $400,000 would be forced to withdraw and pay tax on just over $20,000, leaving them with only $10,000 after taxes per annum. If instead they were to purchase life insurance, donating the policy to a communal fund to help bring down the spiralling cost of Jewish education, the fund would receive $1 million upon their death.

That is correct. A couple aged 71 could purchase a $1 million insurance policy for an after-tax cost of only $10,000 yearly. If $10,000 is too much for some, almost all can afford to donate $1,000 a year. That $1,000 will turn into $100,000 for the community. Assuming one will live for another 20 years, in order to convert a $1,000 yearly investment to $100,000, one would need to earn an annualized return of over 16 per cent for those 20 years – a most spectacular rate of return. Such a return is approximately double the rate of return Berkshire Hathaway, managed by Warren Buffet, has earned over the last 15 years.

Such returns are only possible because the premiums are tax deductible, as the proceeds go to support Jewish education. Even if one were to live to 120, to turn a $10,000 yearly investment into $1 million requires a 3.1 per cent return, much better than other forms of guaranteed investments. And insurance is a guaranteed investment.

It is the articles I have written on funding Jewish education (they can be accessed at torahinmotion.org) that have generated the most response. In my last article, I proposed capping tuition per family at five per cent of income, and in return, the family would purchase a $1million life insurance policy. Such a policy for a 30 year-old couple would run approximately $6,000 a year (and include a tax receipt) for 15 years, at which point no further payments would be necessary. The billions that would accumulate over time would eventually allow Jewish education to be free for all.

But we need to lower tuitions now and cannot wait the 50 to 60 years before policies are paid out. By encouraging those who have retired and those who are forced to collapse their RRSPs to purchase and donate life insurance policies, we could literally have hundreds of millions, perhaps more, in 15 to 20 years' time. I urge all of you who have turned 71 to invest $1,000 a year so that the community may receive $100,000 after your sojourn on earth. For those who can invest $10,000, and I know there are thousands in our community who can do just that, know that you will leave our community with the greatest legacy possible: ensuring the future of our community. If you are interested in joining this exciting project, please email us at info@gaje.ca

I know many people feel the tuition crisis in not solvable. That is just plain wrong. We can and we will solve this crisis, and soon, if people of average means make very manageable donations. We look forward to hearing from you. ■

Just what are we praying for?

Norma Baumel Joseph

Prayer is both difficult and challenging. It is difficult to pray, to stand alone often amidst a large group of not so silent individuals and offer up prayers in languages not so well understood. It is difficult to control one's thoughts, images and imagination. It is difficult to focus. Notably, it is challenging because we don't always understand the subject or object of our deliberation. Not only is it hard to focus on God or what we think of as the divine, but also it is problematic because we are not sure what prayer is supposed to accomplish.

Pious people pray to fulfil the commandment to pray. Many offer up prayers as if in discussion with God. Additionally, we have a tradition that prayer is an exercise in self-judgment. That is probably the hardest and least performed function associated with prayer.

Our liturgy is filled with words of praise and appreciation. Thanking and glorifying the Creator and giver of life seems quite proper. Even for those whose beliefs waver or question the premises of faith, prayer is still available and present in admittedly complicated but nonetheless significant ways. Gratitude is always appropriate.

But for Jews, the classic form of prayer must always include a request. Maimonides makes that a condition of prayer. So what are we doing when we ask God for something? Surely, we announce that we are not self-sufficient. We need God's graciousness and gifts. Even if we don't deserve it, we beseech the Almighty to remember our ancestors and grant us something in their merit. Thus, prayer is a sign of suitable humility.

But, we also ask for real practical benefits. Please heal my son, make my daughter behave, grant me long life, let me win the lottery. What is it we expect when we ask for these personal fundamentals? I know rationally that God cannot and will not grant all my requests. It is not a matter of disbelief, but of impossibility. The world does not work that way and even for believers there is a sense that God created the world to work according to natural law. Prayer cannot overwhelm or overturn the laws of nature, both for the believer and for the rationalist.

Not every one who prays can win the lottery. (Yes I know you must buy a ticket first.) I buy lottery tickets. I pray to win. I know I won't. But I do spend some wonderful moments meditating on how I would spend the winnings. I smile as I think about helping my children, supporting a charity and honouring my parents. Is this a form of prayer for me? For in essence I am reconnecting with some basic values in this process. I am confirming that I want to give charity, or help my family, or honour my parents' memories. All positive commandments. Again, I ask, cannot this be considered an appropriate form of prayer?

Prayer requests then can be seen as a form of exchange demands. Some do believe: I pray – God gives. Perhaps this seems crass, but humanly straightforward. Otherwise, prayer can be seen as a discussion with God that displays one's value system, that does allow us to be reflective, taking a moment to judge ourselves. What is it that is important to us? What do we need and desire? Where do we stand on personal, local and global issues? If prayer can help us focus on these issues then it elevates us and raises the level of human interaction, both with God and with each other. In that case, prayer requests are vital – not just religiously required but humanly indispensable. They may even lead to our action. That type of prayer – with God's help – may really lead to redemptive action. ■

Postwar Jewish refugees in Halifax are assisted by a Jewish community worker.
CANADIAN JEWISH CONGRESS CC NATIONAL ARCHIVES

The conversation about Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's promise to resettle 25,000 Syrian refugees in Canada by Jan. 1 was brought to the fore in the wake of the Nov. 13 Paris attacks.

Amid news of politicians such as Saskatchewan Premier Brad Wall urging Ottawa to suspend its resettlement plan and polls suggesting a majority of Canadians now oppose it – arguing either that six weeks is insufficient time for appropriate security checks or that 25,000 is too high a number – there's been a steep rise in anti-refugee and anti-Muslim rhetoric on social media.

Interestingly, both the voices that don't want to see Canada take in Syrian refugees on the scale proposed (or at all) and the voices that consider resettling the refugees to be Canada's moral duty have variously invoked the plight of Jewish refugees who were driven out of Hitler's Europe.

In the former camp, there are some who underscore what they say are critical differences between Jewish refugees of the 1930s and '40s and the Syrian refugees of today.

Conversely, some who are pushing for liberal resettlement policies have drawn strong parallels between the two groups.

Joel Pollak, a California-based editor at the conservative website Breitbart News Network, wrote an article Nov. 17 arguing that Syrian refugees shouldn't be equated with World War II-era Jewish refugees.

Among his reasons were that Jews weren't a threat to the countries where they sought asylum, whereas "as many as three of the terrorists in the recent Paris attacks allegedly hid among Syrian refugees"; that Jews in World War II had nowhere to go, while Syrian refugees "theoretically have many options," such as the "57 member states of the Organization of Islamic Co-operation;" and that opposition to Jewish refugees was "'racial,'" while resistance to the Syrians stems from "security concerns."

Speaking to The CJN, Pollak dismissed the argument that North Americans of the 1930s feared that Jews were Communists, saying this was a fear from the 1920s that had largely abated by the early 1940s.

Pollak further acknowledged that both Syrian and Jewish refugees faced "impossible situations," but he said "it's not xenophobic to… not accept the number of Syrian refugees [the United States] has been talking about until we have a clearer idea of who these people are."

And while Jews may be sympathetic to the suffering of displaced peoples, he said, "regarding [Americans] absorbing large populations into our society, I don't see that as morally incumbent on us in anyway."

University of Toronto historian Harold Troper is the co-author of None is Too Many (published in 1983), which tells of Canada's refusal to admit Jews during the Holocaust. "Just as there are concerns today about the intake of Muslim refugees, in the 1930s, there was antipathy to bringing in Jews, which rested on the idea that they were outside the circle of assimilation," Troper said.

He stressed that security was a key concern then, as it has been in most historical instances where people voice opposition to refugees. "There was a fear of 'How will we make sure these people aren't Communists or anarchists, or don't have social or political ideas that are detrimental to Canada?' This fear became more acute in the '30s, as it was a constant drum-beat the Nazis used."

Troper said that unlike back then, the present Canadian government is very interested in helping to ease the refugee crisis, but among the public at large, "there are those who are using this crisis to vent an awful lot of hostility. It's given license to racists to crawl out from under rocks… and a new sense of tolerance to a level of anti-immigrant and anti-refugee views we haven't seen in a long time."

Irving Abella, a York University professor who co-wrote None is Too Many with Troper, said a key difference between the Jewish and Syrian refugees is that the Jews were escaping a genocide, while the Syrians are largely living in refugee camps in "relatively safe countries" outside of Syria.

"On the other hand," he said, "the need to provide a home for these refugees is something that resonates with Jews, because for so long we were the ones seeking a refuge… It seems to me it's the moral duty of the Jewish community to be as open and hospitable, as the world was closed and inhospitable to us."

Martin Sampson, director of communications at the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), acknowledged there are differences between Jews who fled the Nazis and the Syrian refugees. However, while he didn't want to downplay the plight of the latter, he said it's important to recognize that "as horrible as ISIS is, they're not a state engaged in a program of industrialized genocide against a particular population… They're a scourge, they are evil, guilty of mass murder and must be defeated, but to compare them to the Nazis… dishonours the six million Jews who were murdered by the Nazis." ■

Peterborough shul helps mosque struck by arson

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Following an arson attack on a Peterborough, Ont., mosque in the aftermath of the Paris terrorist attacks, the local Beth Israel Synagogue offered its support and reached out with a helping hand.

"We learned about the fire at the mosque, and I took it at face value, that there was a fire at the mosque," said Beth Israel Synagogue president Larry Gillman.

"I was sad, and I wanted to reach out to the Muslim community, but on Sunday, I was at an interfaith dinner with Muslims, Jews and Christians and I learned that it was a hate crime."

The Masjid Al-Salaam mosque, which serves about 1,000 people, was set on fire Nov. 14 in what Peterborough Police Chief Murray Rodd has characterized as a hate crime.

The fire caused about $80,000 in damage, entirely in the interior of the building.

"I immediately sent an email to our board with the idea of sharing our space with the Muslim community, realizing that they were not going to have a place to pray in the meantime," Gillman said, adding that the board decision was unanimous.

He said the synagogue also shares its space with the Unitarian Fellowship, which was also on board with the idea.

In addition to members of the Christian and Jewish communities offering the Muslim community a place to pray, a crowdfunding initiative also raised more than $110,000 for repairs in less than two days.

Kenzu Abdella, president of the mosque and the Kawartha Muslim Religious Association, said the overwhelming support from the rest of the community has turned a hateful crime into something positive.

"We're so grateful to everyone. It's not just the financial aspect that really makes us very proud to be Canadian and proud to be a part of the Peterborough community, but the comments we've received in support… it's been great for us," Abdella said.

"As you can imagine, at the beginning the shock was, 'How are we going to get through this?' It is a small community and we're not used to these kinds of situations. We're a small community, but a proactive community. We have open houses, and we invite the community at large to our celebrations, and we have even prayed at the synagogue before as a community, so it is not an isolated community. It is one that works together with everyone very well. So this was the last thing we expected would happen to us."

The interior of Beth Israel Synagogue

Abdella said the immediate challenge was figuring out how to accommodate the congregants, some of whom pray at the mosque five times a day.

"We also have a gathering every Friday for spiritual discussion, so it is a very active space that is taken away from us."

But because of the immediate outpouring of support from the Christian and Jewish communities, Muslims will have a place to pray while the damage to the mosque is repaired.

"We're all in this together. We may be different religions, but we're all one people and in times like this we have to stick together," Gillman said.

"It's unfortunate that it took an act of hate for this to happen, but maybe through it some good will come of it."

Abdella said as grateful as he is for the community's support, he wasn't surprised by it.

"We know how people are in Peterborough and they've always been great, but at the beginning it was a surprise, because the support came from everywhere. If I go to the mosque right now, even though it is locked and there is no one from our community, you will find people there leaving letters and flowers… My phone and emails – it hasn't stopped. In that sense, it's really amazing."

He said he hopes the restoration will be completed in a few weeks.

Abdella said that this incident should serve as a lesson that "when incidents like the one in Paris happens, it is important that people don't turn around and inflict acts of violence on others… This is Canada, this is not acceptable… We need to stand together to fight this kind of unacceptable behaviour from anyone to any group." ■

Winnipeggers visit Paris on timely immigration mission

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Mel Lazareck

Mel Lazareck and Ken Zaifman couldn't have chosen a worse time – or perhaps a better time, for their purposes – to arrive in Paris.

The two Winnipeg Jewish community representatives were in Paris last week for a five-day visit to gauge interest among French Jewish families who may be considering relocation to Canada about coming to Winnipeg instead of Montreal, which might be the more obvious destination.

Lazareck, a past chair of the Combined Jewish Appeal and past president of the local Jewish National Fund organization in Winnipeg, and Zaifman, a prominent immigration lawyer, left Winnipeg on Nov. 13, for Paris, the same day terrorists turned the City of Light into a city of fear and darkness.

"We arrived on Saturday around noon, after a four-hour delay to determine whether Air Canada would actually make the Friday-night flight to Paris," Lazareck said by email from the French capital.

"Arriving at our hotel in the Marais area, we noticed that there seemed to be few people on the streets," he said.

"We then made contact with individuals that had previously responded to our ad in the Paris Jewish press. The following day, we started meeting couples and individuals, along with emailing additional people that had responded to our ad."

Lazareck added that every individual or couple he and Zaifman met were impressive. "The men and women we met were well educated, employed and most of them had young families," he said. "All of them spoke English reasonably well. They ranged in age was from their mid-20s to early 50s. All wanted to leave because of ongoing security issues," he said.

"I know we have not even scratched the surface of those that want to leave."

He said Zaifman was able to explain how the Manitoba immigration process works, and that everyone they spoke with are providing current CVs.

"My first impression of each person we met was their sincerity and commitment to leave the country that most of them had lived in their entire lives," Lazareck said.

"I tried to imagine myself at their particular age, after spending my entire life being raised, educated and pursuing my career, making the decision to leave my family, my home, because I could or did not trust the future security situation in my homeland… And let's not forget that all of the people that responded to our ad responded before Friday the 13th's tragedy in Paris."

The Paris initiative was Lazareck's idea. Twenty years ago, a Winnipeg Jewish delegation and a Manitoba government representative made the first of several visits to Buenos Aires in an effort to present Winnipeg as a destination for Jews looking to leave Argentina in the face of a dire economy and fears of anti-Semitism. The visits paid off, as several Jewish families from Argentina (as well as other South American countries) came to Winnipeg, which helped stabilize the community's numbers.

Lazareck is hoping to repeat that success with a similar outreach program to France's embattled Jewish community.

He and Zaifman travelled to Paris under the aegis of the federal government's annual Destination Canada initiative whose purpose, Lazareck said, is to attract skilled immigrants to this country. Organized by the Canadian Embassy in Paris, participants include representatives from provinces, territories, cities, regions, associations and French-speaking community groups, as well as settlement organizations.

France has about 700,000 Jews, the largest Jewish population in Europe. However, waves of immigration of Muslims with anti-Israel and anti-Semitic leanings has led to rising anti-Semitism in western Europe in general and France in particular. There have been several deadly attacks on Jews in France in recent years, and many French Jews are planning to leave for Israel or elsewhere.

In an interview before leaving, Lazareck said this project has been in the works for about a year. "I started meeting with people in St. Boniface [Winnipeg's largely French-speaking suburb], as well as Manitoba government people and Jewish Federation of Winnipeg representatives," he said.

"We have a good product to sell," Zaifman said, also before leaving. "We have a vibrant Jewish community with a lot of experience in resettling Jewish families."

Lazareck isn't expecting immediate results. "We are just starting out to see what interest there may be," he said. "Even if we are successful, it takes time for potential immigrants to get here [under Manitoba's provincial nominee program]." ■

'We have a long way to go, but I am optimistic'

Deborah, Yael, Miriam and our foremothers paved the way for Golda Meir and Rosalie Abella, who in turn paved the way for, to name but two, Rabba Sarah Hurwitz, the dean of Yeshivat Maharat, and Dina Najman, the rosh kehillah (head of congregation) at Kehilat Orach Elizer in New York – talented, strong leaders who have answered their calling to serve.

From the moment I entered shul the Shabbat after the RCA released its resolution, I was confronted with questions. What did it mean? Was it because I took the title rabbi? How did I feel about the RCA? What was the future for women in Orthodoxy who were ordained and becoming ordained?

In truth, I personally benefited tremendously from some RCA rabbis in my own education. I feel grateful to them, and I acknowledge that their organization has always possessed reach and impact. I strongly believe that I could give back to the RCA, and contribute to the organization that supported so many of my teachers' – and therefore my own – learning. The stated mission of the RCA is "to advance the cause and the voice of Torah and the rabbinic tradition by promoting the welfare, interests and professionalism of Orthodox rabbis all around the world." I couldn't agree more.

But there is no question that it is a struggle. Misogyny is alive and well in the Jewish community. This is a challenge that will require a radical culture and philosophical shift in order to be solved. It isn't easy to reconcile ancient philosophy with contemporary values.

And yet, we have come a long way. The simple fact that there exists an Orthodox rabbinical school for me and others to attend is monumental. There is certainly room in the tradition to make sense of these issues, but it requires some brave souls, some reorientation and, of course, open and willing communities and leaders – including some brave and confident men.

Change is happening, albeit slowly. More and more women in Orthodoxy are leaning in and are trying to take their seats at the table. We have a long way to go, but I am optimistic. Now, more than ever, women's leadership in Orthodox Judaism must be encouraged to rise up and be successful.

Clarification

The Wry Bread humour column in last week's CJN, "Trudeau's cabinet balance upsets traditionalists," by A. David Levine, referred to a fictionalized Rabbinical Council of Canada (RCC), which is not to be confused with the Montreal-based organization of the same name. The real RCC is an organization of Orthodox rabbis in Montreal that meets periodically and includes rabbis from across the Orthodox spectrum, Sephardim and Ashkenazim. The CJN regrets the misunderstanding. ■

World can't let ISIS win, Livni tells Halifax conference

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT, HALIFAX

"We need to co-operate in order to conquer," Tzipi Livni told the 2015 Halifax International Security Forum Nov. 20 during a panel presentation.

The co-leader of Israel's Zionist Union party and former foreign affairs minister was one of more than 200 delegates attending the annual event in Halifax. She was appearing on a panel entitled "Co-operate, Contain or Conquer."

"Containment is not an option," she said, discussing terrorist threats by various groups, and specifically the recent attacks in Paris by the Islamic State. "It's about who we are and what we believe in. The free world needs to fight for its values."

Also on the panel were Georgian Defence Minister Tinatin Khidasheli, Colombian Defence Minister Luis Carlos Villegas Echeverri and U.S. Deputy Secretary of Defence Robert Work.

Work suggested the panel's title should be changed to: "Compete (against the two great powers, Russia and China), Co-operate (wherever possible), Contest (when certain states push back), Contain (whatever problems arise), and Crush (them - and ISIS fits in the last category.)"

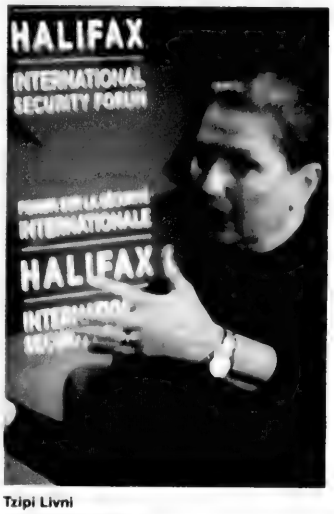
Villegas reflected on Colombia's recovery from having a crime-ridden economy to one that benefits its entire population. He said 15 years ago, it was No. 7 among Latin American economies. Today, it is third behind Brazil and Argentina, and it has improved its poverty level from 60 per cent of its people below the poverty line to less than 25 per cent today.

"Our GDP is four times greater today, and individual income has grown five times," he said. "People said 'No more violence and corruption.' We've had good government, international co-operation and stressed reform in everything we've done."

Khidasheli, her country's first female defence minister, expressed pessimism about Russia's actions, saying it does what it wants through occupation and aggressiveness in Georgia and Ukraine.

"Russia occupies 25 per cent of my country. Soldiers daily kidnap and kill peaceful people, troubling everyone as they wish. If there's any hope or chance for any dialogue to succeed, Georgians would be the first to applaud, but I don't believe there's any solution."

The three-day conference drew major government, defence and security officials from Asia, South America, western and eastern Europe, the Middle East, Japan, Mexico, United States and Canada.



Tzipi Livni

Participants tackled a wide range of issues, from taking the fight to Daesh (ISIS) on the ground and on the web, to China's growing military aggression, plus they discussed technology; refugee responsibility among nations; handling a diminishing Chinese economy; how modern Muslims are breaking tradition and moving forward; and the financing of terror and how to stem it.

Canadian Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan, concluded "We shared new and innovative ideas and, most importantly, established and renewed productive relationships. I think we're all better equipped to deal with the challenges of tomorrow."

Livni said her first trip to Halifax was beneficial. "The conference was held at a sensitive time" following attacks in Paris and Mali, she said, and "gave a wakeup call to the international community that ISIS is not only in the Middle East but here, too, and we cannot turn a blind eye. We need to fight physically for our values.

"They won't stop until they win. We cannot let them win."

The Halifax International Security Forum is an independent, non-profit, non-partisan organization based in Washington, D.C. ■

GUEST VOICE

'Jewish MP' or 'MP who is Jewish'?

Barry Campbell

A recent article in The CJN ("Six Jewish MPs Head To Ottawa," Nov. 11) is concerning for two reasons. First, the headline describes six new members of Parliament elected in the recent federal election as "Jewish MPs," rather than "MPs who are Jewish." And second, implicit in the headline and the accompanying article is the notion that only these particular MPs represent the Jewish community because of their religious heritage.

I was proud to represent the Toronto riding of St Paul's in the House of Commons from 1993 to 1997. Shortly after being elected, I was invited to a conference in Israel for "Jewish parliamentarians." When we arrived at the airport in Israel, there was a huge banner greeting us. It read, "Welcome Jewish Parliamentarians." I thought that odd. I was an MP who happened to be Jewish, not a "Jewish MP."

When I served in Parliament, I used to say that I represented everyone in my riding, whether they had voted for me or not. (I must confess that I took a certain devilish pleasure in stating those words to people I knew had not voted for me).

The CJN article demeans MPs like Carolyn Bennett, who I personally asked to run for the Liberals in St. Paul's when I decided to leave politics, and, most recently, Marco Mendicino, the new Liberal MP for Eglinton-Lawrence, the riding formerly held by Joe Oliver. Both have worked hard to know our communities, and both were ignored in the article even though they represent ridings with large Jewish populations. This suggests that they don't or can't represent Jewish constituents.

The article also may do a disservice to the six Jewish MPs featured, who will be perceived by some (unfairly so) to represent the Jewish community and not all the constituents that live in their ridings. In my experience, a non-Jewish MP may, in certain instances, have a tremendous impact on an issue of concern to the community simply because it is unexpected when someone outside the community explains how a matter came to be important to them.

The issue of ethnicity in politics is a tough one. Every community is proud of its members who attain public office.

There tends to be a view within ethnic, linguistic or religious communities that "their" MPs will have a special sensitivity to "our issues" and "go to bat" for the community. But community media should not inadvertently undermine MPs from their community with the suggestion that community interests are the only thing that matters to them. That would in fact be a mistake for the MP and shortsighted for the community.

In politics, "Johnny one-notes" are ignored eventually. After a while, the caucus stops listening. The more one says about his or her community's special issues, the more they are tuned out. MPs need to pick their fights carefully, decide when to take a stand and not spend that currency too freely, too often or too predictably. Besides, if an MP from a particular community is to reflect his community's views – well, what are those views? Our communities are not monolithic, after all.

That said, there is an important place for ethnicity in politics. Hyphenated MPs (whether the hyphen is before or after "MP") bring their unique perspectives to Ottawa, and I have never known any to be shy about that. Canada, of course, must be the sum of its parts – and that should be reflected in Parliament. And when an issue of particular significance to a community comes up, or there arises an issue where a community has a particular historical experience, it falls to an MP from that community to explain, to respond, to share lessons learned, to dispel.

I just don't want MPs who are Jewish to be alone when they do that. ■

Barry Campbell is the former member of Parliament for the Toronto riding of St Paul's. He is president of Campbell Strategies and publisher of parli.ca

JNF event stresses solidarity amid terror wave in Israel

JONATHAN DICK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The themes of coexistence and solidarity were underscored by good vibrations from Beach Boys co-founder Brian Wilson at the Jewish National Fund of Toronto's annual Negev Dinner.

The Nov. 22 event honoured Joseph Frieberg and Kevin Green for their contribution to their local community and the State of Israel. Frieberg and Green's late father, Harold Green, founded Israel Tennis Centers (ITC) in Canada, and they have "stay[ed] with the organization since its inception 40 years ago," said JNF CEO Josh Cooper.

The event, held at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre, hosted 1,600 guests, who were treated a special musical performance by the legendary Wilson.

He was accompanied by former bandmates Al Jardine and Blondie Chaplin. They played many of their most famous songs, including California Girls, I Get Around and Good Vibrations. As Cooper put it when asked why Wilson was tapped to play at the event, "Everyone loves the Beach Boys!"

Under Cooper's leadership, the JNF's Negev Dinner has continually beaten its own fundraising records. "We are very fortunate that from coast to coast, attendance and fundraising at all of our Negev Dinners has increased over the years," said Cooper, CEO since 2012. "People realize that if you want to help support and build Israel, JNF is the natural organization to help fulfil your charitable objectives."

Proceeds from this year's dinner will fund two major building projects in Israel. The first is a new multi-purpose facility at the Samson Israel Tennis Center in Be'er Sheva, and the second is an Israel Tennis Center in Sderot, the town adjacent to Gaza that has been targeted by rocket fire from the territory in recent years. Both facilities will feature programs that promote coexistence between Jews and Arabs, as well as Ethiopian integration, and programs for the physically and developmentally disabled and youth at risk.

"Be'er Sheva, the capital of the Negev, is one of the fastest growing cities in Israel. JNF has established many projects helping all of the citizens of Be'er Sheva, Druze, Bedouin, Arab, Jewish, etc. The Israel Tennis Centers, which is the hub of outstanding coexistence programming, needs to be expanded. Therefore, the ITC and JNF felt this was the best centre to expand," Cooper said.

"On a summer fact-finding trip between JNF and ITC, the tour went to Sderot to highlight some of JNF's work. Upon meeting with the mayor of Sderot, and its residents, Mr. Frieberg and Mr. Green fell in love with the city. They were adamant that we help the people of Sderot, and so in partnership with the city of Sderot, a 15th Israel Tennis Center will be built," Cooper added.

Israel Tennis Centers is a not-for-profit organization founded in 1976 to improve the quality of life for Israeli children.

"With your support, more children will be able to play, have fun, and just be children," Green said as he received a standing ovation.

Cooper stressed the importance of Jewish and Arab coexistence and communal solidarity being aspects of this year's projects.

"While we are best known for our work in forestry and water management, much of our work in Israel over the past few decades has been coexistence programs. We want to ensure that no Israeli citizen is left behind," Cooper said.

"We feel strongly that we need to continue to build relationships between all citizens of Israel. The recent wave of terror attacks in Israel has impacted Israelis of all backgrounds, specifically over the past few months. This particular project will address the increased need for coexistence programs in Israel's south."

In Frieberg's acceptance speech, he stated, "We at ITC have always believed in rackets, not rockets." ■

Leaders from Israeli settlements to speak in Toronto

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Amidst the wave of terror that has gripped Israel since October, two leaders of settlement communities in the West Bank will speak to the Toronto Jewish community about the history of their respective Israeli settlements, as well as how Israelis are coping with the constant threat of violence and terrorism.

On Nov. 29, Daniella Weiss, who served 15 years as the mayor of Kedumim, a West Bank settlement, and led the 10 families who founded the first Jewish settlement in Judea and Samaria 40 years ago, will address the Toronto Jewish community at Shaarei Shomayim synagogue.

Weiss, a controversial figure who was arrested in 2008 after a confrontation in Hebron that ended with her being charged for obstructing police officers, is the general secretary of the Nachala settlement movement.

Joining her in Toronto is the mayor of Kiryat Arba/Hebron, Malachi Levinger, the son of the late Rabbi Moshe Levinger, who was one of the founders of the settlement movement following the Six Day War in 1967.

Malachi Levinger

Rabbi Levinger, a student of religious Zionist leader Rabbi Tzvi HaCohen Yehuda Kook, was one of the founders of the Kiryat Arba settlement, and is credited for the return of the Jews to Hebron.

His son, Malachi, told The CJN that when he comes to Toronto, he wants to talk about the settlements in Judea and Samaria, "how my father started the settlements in Yehuda and Shomron... I want to speak about the beit midrash from Rav Yehuda Kook, from where my father learned about Eretz Yisrael and about all the land in Eretz Yisrael."

Since the establishment of Kiryat Arba in the early 1970s, Levinger said there are about 600 Jews who reside in the Jewish quarter in the old city of Hebron, which Levinger compared to the size of a city block in Toronto.

"I want people in Toronto to hear about the big spirit in the settlements, that people want to do everything to connect the Jewish story in Hebron," he said.

Levinger, who said his trip to North America will be a short one because "it is not a good time to be for a long time out of Israel," spoke about the recent and ongoing violence facing his community and the rest of his country.

When he spoke to The CJN in early November, he said his community was experiencing a three-day stretch of quiet.

"Three days of quiet for us is a long time this month," he said, adding that despite the terror attacks, "Baruch HaShem, people are still coming to visit."

As the mayor of a town that has been experiencing a number of terror attacks in the past few weeks, Levinger can only offer the members of his community encouragement and a word of caution.

"What I am talking about to the people of Kiryat Arba is that you should still live normally, but keep safe when you go on the road, when you go visit another area," he said.

Some of the recent attacks that have either injured or killed Israelis in or near his town include an Oct. 8 incident in which a 25-year-old man was stabbed in the upper body by a Palestinian. On Oct. 20, a man was driving through Hebron when his car was pelted by a hail of rocks. When he exited his car, he was hit by a truck driven by a Palestinian and killed. Days later, a Palestinian stabbed a 19-year-old soldier multiple times in the neck near the Kiryat Arba settlement.

Levinger said people are fearful, but, especially after the few days of quiet that they enjoyed, people go about their day.

When asked if he saw an end to the recent wave of terror in the near future, he said, "I hope so. I don't know and the army doesn't know. We hope it will be quiet, because we want to live normally in Kiryat Arba/Hebron and we want the people who don't want to visit us to come and visit us and not be afraid." ■

Knife intifadah part of rejectionist policy: analyst

plungen@thecjn.ca

David Hazony

The attacks began right around the time Israelis celebrated the High Holidays. Seemingly at random, Palestinians, many of them young, began stabbing Jews with knives in what has come to be known as the knife intifadah.

But for Middle East analyst David Hazony, the attacks are not random, if by random you mean something that comes out of the blue. No, Hazony said, these attacks have a genesis. There's a straight line that can be drawn from the current round of terrorist attacks back to the attacks on Hebron in 1929, and even to the Farhud pogrom on Jews in Baghdad in 1941.

What you have here, Hazony said in an interview with The CJN, is a continuation of a violent, rejectionist, genocidal Palestinian aggression first laid in place by the mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin al-Husseini. That's the same Palestinian political and religious leader who Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu credited with inspiring Hitler to murder the Jews. Netanyahu may have been too quick to attribute Hitler's crimes to the mufti, but in his own right, the cleric set in place the Palestinian agenda that Israelis are experiencing today.

Hazony, managing director at the Israel Project, a Washington, D.C. think-tank, and editor of The Tower magazine, was in Toronto last week to address students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and give a lecture at Adath Israel Congregation. That speaking engagement was co-sponsored by the shul and B'nai Brith Canada. Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, introduced Hazony at the synagogue event.

Looking at the latest round of terror attacks in Israel, Hazony said it's about what you could expect from young Palestinians who have been bombarded with anti-Semitic propaganda in their school textbooks and on the media their whole lives.

"When an 18-year-old stabs a 70-year-old woman, this is the product of a generation of kids raised under the Palestinian Authority, indoctrinated to hate Jews and to see Jews as a legitimate target of violence," he said.

People should not be surprised that this is the legacy of a government created by former PA president Yasser Arafat, who was inspired by al-Husseini and who created a governmental authority in which demonizing Jews is taught in schools. Preparing Palestinians for war, not peace, is the goal.

Contrary to media interpretation of events, the purported expansion of settlements has nothing to do with it, Hazony maintained. In fact, in the same week that U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry visited Israel and criticized settlement expansion, Ha'aretz published a report that found expansion under Netanyahu was lower than under any previous Israeli leader.

Hazony urged supporters of Israel to do their best to correct popular misconceptions about the reality on the ground and to influence the overall narrative about the dispute. For years the Israeli-Palestinian story has been framed by Israel's opponents, who refer to the country as an illegitimate, apartheid state and vilify it at every turn.

Instead, "we need to arm ourselves for this battle... and understand the reality." Learn the facts, he advised, and make the case that Israel is a flourishing culture with an expanding economy whose numerous achievements are improving the lot of millions of people around the world.

Addressing the Iran nuclear threat, Hazony said the majority of the U.S. Democratic party supports the P5 + 1 deal, but it has divided the Jewish community. Mainstream Jewish organizations, such as the Anti-Defamation League, are "skeptical" about it, while J Street backs it.

U.S. President Barack Obama cites J Street in making the case for the deal while also adopting some of its rhetoric in criticizing Israel, including the argument that the country's own policies are not consistent with Jewish values.

Hazony suggested that while the United States continues its military co-operation with Israel, Obama has "created daylight" with Israel on a number of fronts and criticized its policies."Obama and Kerry have emphasized narratives about the conflict that are not helpful," he said, referring specifically to the critique of Israeli settlements.

Expanding on that theme, Hazony said the United States has also alienated other longstanding allies in the region, including Egypt and the Gulf States, while at the same time it has worked closely with Iran.

At the heart of that policy is a desire to scale back U.S. involvement in the region and cede the role of regional power to Iran. ■

Youth, business leaders should connect, event told

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Entrepreneur Dave Wilkin has made it his mission to solve what he's deemed the "unfortunate love story" between industry leaders and young people.

Wilkin was speaking at a Nov. 17 event held at Creeds Coffee Bar and hosted by Genesis: UJA Federation's Centre for Jewish Innovation, in partnership with the Annex Shul, Hillel Ontario, JVS, Onward Israel, The House, Moishe House, UJA's Community Connect and UJA Young Leaders.

Wilkin, the 27-year-old founder of an on online networking platform called TenThousandCoffees, told the audience of close to 100 20- and 30-somethings about his career trajectory and how it was shaped by his desire to more effectively connect younger generations with professionals established in the job market.

The event, which included time for mingling and networking, was part of the 2015 speaker series run by Genesis, a UJA initiative that works to support emerging Jewish non-profits and provide mentorship, networking and skills training to young adults in the community.

According to a quick show of hands, the audience identified itself as a mix of aspiring entrepreneurs, those looking for new job opportunities, and those looking to develop new skills.

Wilkin, who is not Jewish and grew up in the small northern Ontario town of Lively, explained that his experience as a teenager starting a mentorship program that served communities north of Barrie led him to identify a gap between older industry professionals and youth.

"I saw that on one side we had all these youth with great ideas – this entrepreneurial and connected group who were simultaneously the most underemployed generation in history… and on the other hand, we had these heads of industries saying they weren't going to exist in 10 or 15 years if they didn't connect with youth," he said.

While the two groups rely on another to thrive – youth to access job opportunities and career advice and industry leaders to gain insight into how to revitalize their businesses and ensure they're sustainable – Wilkins said the two parties "were connecting using these random, archaic, Neanderthal tactics."

CEOs and other leaders he spoke to were typically only meeting with young people who were the children of their friends, which Wilkin said is limiting.

Further, he said, conventional mentorship programs often don't allow prospective mentors and mentees to shop around before establishing a relationship.

Dave Wilkin, founder of TenThousandCoffees, speaks at an event hosted by Genesis: UJA Federation's Centre for Jewish Innovation.

In 2010, Wilkin, who studied biochemistry at the University of Waterloo, launched what quickly became Canada's largest youth consulting company, Redwood Strategic Inc. It grew into a multi-million dollar company and acquisition offers began to roll in, but Wilkin said the "small town in me starting talking, and I realized I wouldn't only be selling the business, but my soul… I decided to reinvest all the funds into trying to really solve the unfortunate love story [between youth and industry leaders]."

Wilkin saw that meeting face to face for coffee was an effective way to build a relationship, share ideas and even create a job opportunity, but the model needed to be expanded so people weren't simply meeting others in their existing circles.

And so, in January 2014, he launched the TenThousandCoffees website, which features short profiles of top leaders from a range of fields as well as those of emerging entrepreneurs or people looking for job opportunities.

People use the site to contact one another and set up coffee meetings that will involve what Wilkin called "mutually beneficial conversations." He said the site has been so well received that he spent less than $10,000 on marketing and that schools and organizations were soon asking if they could "borrow" the website.

With that in mind, TenThousandCoffees has started partnering with several non-profits each year. Genesis is one such partner: TenThousandCoffees will donate its model to Genesis on a trial basis and allow people in the Genesis network to connect with one another using a specific-to-Genesis TenThousandCoffees hub.

"Genesis is thrilled to expose our community to TenThousandCoffees as a wonderful resource," said Alana Kayfetz, Genesis' director. ■

Two years in, business accelerator seen as a world leader

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

As startups go, YEDI has done pretty well. In only two years of existence, it has matched about 100 budding entrepreneurs and non-profit innovators with people to fund them. It has helped a good number of Russian immigrants improve their education, find their legs and get started in Canada. And earlier this month it was recognized for all it has done by being named the number one ranked business accelerator in Ontario and number three in all of North America at an award ceremony sponsored by UBI Global and Ontario Centres for Excellence.

Of course, YEDI – York Entrepreneurship Development Institute – is not a startup in the conventional sense of the term. It's not a for-profit company, with a new product that it is trying to sell. YEDI is the brainchild of Russian-born businessman Marat Ressin. It is intended to act as an accelerator of startups – an organization that helps kickstart the careers of its participants by offering first class business education, mentorship and access to investors.

It also fosters a sense of social responsibility in those advancing commercial concepts and it trains innovators in the non-profit sector in the importance of making balance sheets actually balance.

Ressin, who has extensive expertise in growing small businesses and turning around failing companies, approached Rabbi Mendel Zaltzman of the Russian Jewish Community Centre (RJCC) of Ontario with the idea of pitching the program to members of his community.

The program fit neatly into what Russian Jewish community leaders had been pushing.

"They want us to provide services that he haven't in the past. That is, get people into business at a high level," Rabbi Zaltzman told The CJN when YEDI was launched. In doing so, "we are creating the leaders of the next generation."

The RJCC advertised the program extensively and many in the Russian Jewish community responded.

So far, about one-third of the program's students are Russian Jews, Ressin said in a telephone interview from Hong Kong.

However, the selection committee, which determines which of the applicants is chosen, does so without knowing the names of those it selects, Ressin noted.

Marat Ressin speaks at a YEDI Venture Fair.

There are plenty of success stories in the Russian Jewish community, Ressin said. One is that of former student Judy Chaimov, who created Laser Weld Creation, which employs laser welding in the medical, aerospace and automotive sectors. On the non-profit side, you can find Wheel Dance, which provides wheelchair ballroom and Latin dance classes to individuals with ambulatory disabilities and their able-bodied partners.

Ressin said students benefit from high level education delivered by the Schulich Executive Education Centre, one of the partners in YEDI. Graduates earn a certificate from a prestigious business school and come to understand the importance of a workable business plan to making their ideas become reality, he said.

While in Hong Kong, Ressin spoke at two universities about YEDI and expects to create programs for them as well. More than that, he said, there is the opportunity to create an international network into which local YEDI graduates can hook in and find "soft landing opportunities" for their concepts.

In addition to the Schulich school and the RJCC, other partners in YEDI include The PresenTense Group, a volunteer-based organization that fosters social entrepreneurship in Jewish communities around the world, 3V Communications and the Ontario Trillium Foundation. ■

Canadians, Israelis collaborate on biofuel research

plungen@thecjn.ca

Drive by a farm in southern Ontario in October or November and you'll see fields golden and thick with plant matter. The corn or other crops have been harvested, but there is plenty that remains – the agricultural equivalent of end cuts and remnants.

Farmers feed some of it to their livestock, but when McGill University scientist Donald Smith looks at fields overflowing with biomatter, he doesn't see just cow fodder. He sees fuel, admittedly not something that can be put directly into your car engine today, but the biomass that can provide a substitute for petroleum in the future.

As things stand today, the technology to turn that brown gold into liquid fuel in a way that can compete economically with fossil fuels is still years away, but there's no time like the present to set out on the research journey that will make it a commonplace reality.

With that in mind, Smith, along with 10 other scientists and researchers from BioFuelNet Canada, travelled to Israel earlier this month to attend the "Israel-Canada Workshop on Advanced Biofuels."

The conference was held at the Robert H. Smith Faculty of Agriculture, Food and Environment at the Rehovot campus of Hebrew University. It was sponsored in part by Israel's Ministry of Science, Technology and Space, with input from Anat Bonshtien, a member of the "oil free initiative governmental team" inside the Prime Minister's Office.

Getting Canadians to move away from a petroleum-based dependency is something Smith advocates.

"We're trying to move the country to renewable fuels, from fossil fuels," said Smith, scientific director of BioFuelNet, a network of more than 100 researchers whose goal is to procure alternative energy sources while fostering links among scientists across the country.

With the trip to Israel, BioFuelNet is expanding its international relationships. There is potential for joint research, the exchange of ideas leading ultimately to joint commercial ventures in the field, between Canadians and Israelis, Smith said.

Yitzhak Hadar said that when it comes to biofuels, co-operation between Canadians and Israelis is just beginning. But there are good reasons to believe these can develop into something substantial, he said.

Yitzhak Hadar

Both sides are interested in finding alternatives to fossil fuels and both have pretty advanced research communities. And while Israel doesn't generate the biomass that Canada does, with its significant agricultural and forestry industries, it does have a sophisticated agricultural technology sector, he said.

Hadar, a professor of microbiology at Hebrew U, said "two of the most significant challenges to humanity in the 21st century will be fossil fuel limitations and the effect on climate change." With recent scientific breakthroughs in understanding plant genomics, new possibilities have emerged for exploiting plant biomass. "A more sustainable and bio-based society is now a realistic possibility. In a bio-based economy, feedstock will be produced from renewable bio-resources while economic growth will be linked to sustainable development," he said.

Hadar said the purpose of the workshop was "to promote, facilitate and support collaboration and exchange of innovative ideas related to responsible and sustainable conversion of biomass to biofuels and bio-products toward building a viable society."

The two-day workshop brought together Canadian and Israeli experts from universities, government and industry. The main topics discussed were crop production (breeding, genetics and genomics); biomass utilization, including forest and municipal waste; and policy, economics and intellectual property.

No agreements were signed or partnerships created at the seminar, but Hadar is hopeful the meetings will "create one-on-one conversations and start the exchange of ideas and hopefully, lead to collaboration." ■

JPost reporter says Israel is getting 'better and better'

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT, HALIFAX

Israel Television has called Jerusalem Post chief political correspondent, Gil Hoffman, "the most optimistic man in Israel."

His remarks to a group of community leaders at Chabad House in Halifax Nov. 18 certainly reflected that, as he stressed, "Despite challenges, things are better and better in Israel. In 69 years, it's never been a better time to raise a family in Israel. I hope and pray even better days are ahead for the people of Israel and the region."

Despite spending time discussing the ills of the Middle East, the threats against Israel from each of its neighbours and the challenges it faces, Hoffman told his audience that "helping Israel is EASY – 'education' (of others about Israel's strengths), 'advocacy' (for Israel), 'solidarity' (of everyone) for Israel and 'your money.'"

With a smile, he said the latter would help the Jewish National Fund to continue its good work in Israel. JNF is supporting his cross-Canada speaking tour.

Hoffman had been in Calgary and Edmonton prior to Halifax, and was visiting Mount Allison University in Sackville and Moncton, N.B. after Halifax, and then speaking in London, Hamilton, Waterloo and Ottawa, Ont. He had attended the Jewish Federations of North America's General Assembly in Washington, D.C., plus he had engagements in Tucson, Ariz., Philadelphia, Cincinnati and Columbus, Ohio.

When answering audience questions, the Chicago-raised Hoffman, who moved to Israel 17 years ago, said new Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau "will have to change some policies to be taken seriously by Israel and the world. Unfortunately, he supported the Iran nuclear deal, for example."

Hoffman said Canada mattered under former prime minister Stephen Harper.

"He strongly backed Israel. His pro-Israel voice counted in G8 voting. Now Canada is like every other country. Trudeau is taking selfies in Europe. He'll be on Facebook, and that's nice, but Israel won't listen to him."

He talked of the concern of continued attacks on Israeli citizens. With humour, he reflected on removing his kippah on the street in Jerusalem, "my city," as a result of the recent wave of stabbings.

His wife joked with him, "She said to me, 'There's no point (removing it). You look so Jewish, next time, take off your nose.'"

When referring to the threat from ISIS, Hoffman said ISIS controls land 20 times the size of Israel.

"Israel's land was acquired and embellished by (JNF) metal boxes. ISIS acquired its land by another kind of metal."

His remarks covered the threat of Hezbollah – "They have 120,000 rockets ready and aimed at Israel, probably not to be used in the near future, but 30 times what Hamas used in its most recent rocket attacks" – as well as the use of distraction by PA President Mahmoud Abbas to retain control of his people in Gaza – "The Temple Mount is in danger; the Jews are contaminating Temple Mount with their feet" – and the many chances Abbas had to make peace with Israel in the last several years but did not.

"We will continue to thrive. We will succeed economically and continue to build a beautiful country, with the help of JNF, and we will see Muhammad and Menachem playing together in playgrounds built by JNF."

He would not commit when asked which U.S. presidential candidate would be best for Israel – "They're all saying the right things," he said – but joked, "I'd vote for Harper for president of the United States."

Hoffman also praised those keeping anti-Israeli journalists on their toes by writing letters to the editor, making fun of them on Facebook, and trying to change their outlook. ■

Shul offers free Hebrew school, Torah High enrolment up

sshefa@thecjn.ca

For many parents who may have been priced out of the Jewish day school system but haven't given up on their commitment to offering their children Jewish programming, there are a number of options in the GTA to consider.

The newest program is one offered at Shaar Shalom Synagogue that launched in September. It's a free after-school Jewish learning program called Atid, available only to members of the shul.

Run by Shaar Shalom's rebbetzin Bettina Schwarzman, a graduate of Hebrew University of Jerusalem's education program with more than 20 years' teaching experience, the program teaches children from age five to bar and bat mitzvah about Israel, Jewish holidays, Jewish values and Hebrew.

Shaar Shalom spiritual leader Rabbi Steven Schwarzman said he hopes the fact the program is free for shul members will encourage people to join the congregation.

"I designed it this way, because Shaar Shalom used to have a Hebrew school up until a few years before I came. From what I'm told, a lot of people sent their kids to the school and it was a great school, but they never joined the shul, and it was not financially sustainable under that model," Rabbi Schwarzman explained.

"And I'm a big believer of giving people reasons to join a shul. While I'm a big believer in day schools... because they are the best in Jewish education, it doesn't work for everybody – certainly financially it doesn't work for every family."

He said the program, which is available four days a week and so far has attracted seven kids, isn't meant as an alternative to day school, but rather as "a Conservative Jewish education in a flexible environment in terms of logistics, but with wonderful content."

For high school students, Torah High, an after-school Jewish program that is an Ontario Ministry of Education-inspected private school offering Jewish studies courses for credit, is gaining momentum.

Preschoolers celebrate Shabbat at Robbins Hebrew Academy.

> Torah High is for parents who say, 'I don't want to send my kids to CHAT, but I don't want my kids to have nothing.'

Rabbi Glen Black, Torah High's director of education, said enrolment for the program jumped by about 25 per cent this year to 400 students.

Rabbi Black said there are a number of reasons for this increase in enrolment to the program, which costs $599 per course.

He attributes some of the success to Einat Enbar, director of marketing and communications, who helped with recruitment.

"The second reason is that the way we've done recruitment is less about marketing and more about word of mouth. Working with students who are currently with us, getting them to share that. Much of the recruitment has been done by the parents," Rabbi Black said, adding that parents will host information sessions for their friends.

"Based on some focus groups and market research we've been conducting... we've been able to come up with courses that students want, like Jewish leadership courses, Israel advocacy courses, even business courses."

He said most of the new students have enrolled in courses that weren't being offered last year.

Although he's happy to offer a Jewish studies program for students who attend public school, he said it's no substitute for a full-day Jewish private school.

"This is really for the kid who is interested to learn more, but don't have it as part of their full-day experience... we only want to be an alternative to nothing... Torah High is for parents who say, 'I don't want to send my kids to CHAT, but I don't want my kids to have nothing.' Torah High is the answer."

But for parents considering Jewish day school, Robbins Hebrew Academy (RHA) head of school Claire Sumerlus hopes the fact that RHA is now the only Jewish school in Ontario to receive accreditation from the Canadian Accredited Independent Schools (CAIS) will convince parents of the added benefit of choosing RHA, where enrolment currently stands at 360 students.

"It's been a long process – a five-year planning process for us. We had a national case evaluation committee come to RHA and they evaluate pretty much every aspect of the school based on 11 specific case standards. Those standards cover everything – admissions, development, alumni, school community, academics, the financial statements, governance – you name it, it's covered," Sumerlus said.

"For me, being accredited means that we've reached the pinnacle of excellence and the curriculum is on par with the best in the world. It means we're accountable to it. We can all say that we're great, but we've had a team of experts from the greatest schools in Canada come through and saw that we are and meet the standards."

The Canadian Association of Independent Schools (CAIS) was established in 1981 as a national network for member schools supporting collaborative initiatives in leadership, education, management and governance.

"Of course I want people to know about it. It differentiates us in a totally different way." ■

RUTH LOEWENTHAL

The Yeshiva University family is deeply grieved by the passing of Ruth Loewenthal, of blessed memory, the beloved sister of Edith (and Kurt) Rothschild. Edith and Kurt, formerly of Toronto, Ontario, and currently living in Jerusalem, Israel, are major leaders on behalf of Yeshiva University and Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University. They are YU Guardians and Kurt is a member of the RIETS Board of Trustees. We extend heartfelt condolences to Edith and Kurt, as well as to Shlomo (and Nechama) Loewenthal, Moshe (and Batya) Loewenthal and their entire families. Ruth Loewenthal was a widely respected resident of New York who made aliyah some 50 years ago, where she married and nurtured her family with love and compassion for many years. May the entire Loewenthal/Rothschild family be comforted among all who mourn for Zion and Jerusalem.

Thousands attend funeral of slain former CHAT teacher

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Rabbi Ya'acov Don, a former shaliach who taught at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto who was one of the victims of the Nov.19 terrorist attack in Gush Etzion that left three people dead and five more wounded, was buried the next day in Israel.

Rabbi Don, a husband, a father of four, and an educator who spent four years in Toronto as a Jewish studies teacher at TanenbaumCHAT between 1996 and 2000, was killed in the Gush Etzion region of the West Bank when a Palestinian armed with an Uzi submachine gun opened fire on cars near the settlement of Alon Shvut.

According to Ha'aretz, the attack in Gush Etzion came just hours after two people were stabbed and killed in Tel Aviv by a Palestinian terrorist.

Rabbi Don died of his injuries at the Hadassah Ein Kerem Medical Center.

Thousands attended his funeral, where his wife, Sara, said, "You always told me 'what did I do to deserve you as a wife?' but I am the one who was blessed. I was blessed with a loving, attentive husband, you had so much feeling and warmth — toward me, your children, and your parents.

"You were a simple man in the greatest sense of the word — you never wanted anything. I thank God for the 22 happy years we had together," she continued. "From heaven, please pray to God to give us strength."

Rabbi Don's son, Aviad, also eulogized his father, and said, "I don't understand why and how you aren't here anymore. How a person like you could be murdered because of this evil... Teach me how to be optimistic at times like these."

In Toronto, Joshua Sable, a teacher at TanenbaumCHAT who worked with Rabbi Don, spoke about the influence he had on his students both inside and outside of the classroom.

"He had a wonderful ability to connect with young people and to encourage them to find their own voice and to be engaged in Jewish life," Sable said.

"His passion for Israel was contagious, and he had a real influence on students and staff in promoting a love for Israel. He always led by example."

A graduate of the Har Etzion Yeshiva, Rabbi Don has been a teacher for 25 years. He was ordained by the Chief Rabbinate of Israel, and earned a master's degree at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Rabbi Don, a religious Zionist, was employed by Israel's education ministry to integrate new educational technologies into Israel's religious state education system, Mamlachty Dati.

"He touched a lot of people's lives inside and outside the classroom," Sable recalled.

"I remember being at a party for him when he was in his last year of his schlichut that students had thrown for him. One thing he said was that as schlichim who come from Israel to teach at Jewish day schools in North America, there is a lot of teaching inside the classroom and outside the classroom, but the most important lesson that he thought he could teach his students was that he would go home to Israel at the end of his schlichut... Going back to Israel, to his home, to the place he loved, was the most important lesson he would leave his students with."

Rabbi Shaul Feldman, the New York-based executive director of Bnei Akiva, a religious Zionist youth movement, knew Rabbi Don well, as he used to be a leader of one of Bnei Akiva's programs in Toronto during his time at TanenbaumCHAT.

"When he walked into a room, even if you were sad, your mood would change in a second. Always a smile. In Hebrew, you would say 'Mah nishma?' He would have this smile ear to ear, with those words, 'Mah nishma? The warmth of that individual... it's like he was born to be an educator, because he could connect to that warmth that he gave to those in his surroundings."

Rabbi Feldman also remembered feeling the love he had for his family.

"Seeing the way he was with his wife and kids, he was such a family person. His kids and his wife were so connected and he loved them. He was a wonderful, wonderful person."

Sable said he feels sad for Rabbi Don's family and the Jewish community as a whole.

"My first thoughts go out to his family, whom we knew well. His wife and children were part of the school community... Just feeling sad about them and their loss. He was not just a loss to the family, but a loss to the education community in Israel and to his extended family here," Sable said.

Rabbi Feldman said that with the seemingly endless and frequent attacks on Israeli citizens, it may be hard to connect to the loss.

"But the circles are getting closer and closer... You hear the news and it saddens you and you don't know the person, so it's sometimes harder to connect... We need to feel the pain for every individual, for everybody." ■

Parole conditions remain, but Pollard can access Internet

JULIE WIENER AND RON KAMPEAS
JTA, WASHINGTON

His every move tracked by GPS, his computers monitored 24/7, his outings subject to a curfew, Jonathan Pollard will nonetheless for the first time be able to enjoy a 21st century indulgence so many others take for granted: surfing the Internet.

A filing by the convicted spy for Israel's lawyers reveal that they won a single concession from the U.S. government in months of wrangling over his parole conditions: Pollard, who will be employed by an investment firm, may access the Internet without prior permission.

The filing in the U.S. District Court in Manhattan last Friday just hours after Pollard's release from a federal prison in North Carolina 30 years into his life sentence, was for habeas corpus. Pollard's lawyers, Eliot Lauer and Jacques Semmelman, argued that the restrictions attached to Pollard amounted to illegal detention and were "statutorily and constitutionally impermissible."

The revelations in the contentious filing, along with statements Nov.20 by the White House, supportive Jews and Jewish groups and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, bury for now any hope Pollard's release would end three decades of pronounced disagreement between the United States and Israel over what Pollard represents and whether his punishment was just.

Pollard wants to make aliyah. Every signal the U.S. government has sent suggests that is not going to happen in the near term. The Justice Department has said it will stand by the conditions of Pollard's parole, which do not require a review for another two years. The White House has said, once again emphatically, that it will not intervene.

The U.S. Parole Commission, after announcing Pollard's pending release in July, issued parole conditions that would require Pollard to submit to GPS monitoring, obtain commission approval to access the Internet and agree to monitored computer use, with unannounced inspections of his equipment at any time, according to the filing by Pollard's lawyers.

The commission also said Pollard's probation officer could subject him to curfew and "exclusion zones," which would be in addition to the statutory requirement that Pollard request permission to travel outside the area of New York City, where he now will reside.

Pollard's lawyers appealed the conditions to the commission's appeals board, which removed only the need for the commission's approval to access the Internet. The GPS requirement was "reasonably related to the need to deter you from further criminal conduct," the appeals board said, although, according to the filing by Lauer and Semmelman, the board did not explain how Pollard, 30 years in prison, would be able to spy now that he's out.

The lawyers included statements from Robert "Bud" McFarlane, the national security adviser at the time of Pollard's 1985 arrest, and former Sen. Dennis DeConcini who was on the Senate Intelligence Committee at the time, that whatever classified information Pollard still knew is now useless.

The computer monitoring, the appeals board ruled, was warranted for home and business computers because "the boundaries between personal and business computer use are blurred." That requirement, Pollard's lawyers argue, will make it almost impossible for the Stanford University graduate to find work.

The Probation Office charged with monitoring Pollard's release "exacerbated the conditions," the filing said, apparently requiring Pollard to wear a tracking device. "GPS monitoring does not require a monitor attached to the body," the lawyers said and claimed that because of Pollard's diabetes, "any restraint place on his ankle or leg" would be dangerous.

A handful of Jewish organizations welcomed the release of Pollard, an American Jew and a former Navy intelligence analyst who pleaded guilty in 1987 to sharing classified information with Israel. A recurring theme was that the sentence was disproportionate.

"While we still believe his sentence was disproportionate, we hope that after having paid his debt to society, he should now be able to rebuild his life together with his wife," the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations said in a statement.

"As the Conservative Movement has iterated many times in the past, including in Rabbinical Assembly resolutions in 1992, 1994, 1995 and 2011, Jonathan Pollard was handed a remarkably unfair sentence," the Rabbinical Assembly's president, Rabbi William Gershon, said, adding that Pollard had suffered "decades of injustice." Also welcoming Pollard's release was the National Council of Young Israel, which took the lead among groups in advocating for Pollard's release.

Two groups, Agudath Israel of America and the Zionist Organization of America, called on the Obama administration to grant Pollard's wish to move to Israel.

That's unlikely. U.S. President Barack Obama does not have any plans to alter the terms of Pollard's parole now that he has been released, Ben Rhodes, the deputy national security adviser, said when asked by reporters about whether Netanyahu had asked Obama to release Pollard from parole.

"This is something that Prime Minister Netanyahu has regularly raised," Rhodes said. "The fact of the matter is, we have deferred to the Department of Justice and the process of justice with respect to the Jonathan Pollard issue."

The Justice Department indicated it will abide by the conditions of Pollard's parole. "The Department of Justice has always maintained that Jonathan Pollard should serve his full sentence for the serious crimes he committed," a spokesman said.

The disagreement over whether Pollard had committed "serious crimes" or was a well-meaning ideologue fretting over Israel's vulnerability has been the crux of one of the longest-standing tensions between the United States and Israel.

Netanyahu's statement on Pollard's release included nary a reference to any crimes. "As someone who raised Jonathan's case for years with successive American presidents, I had long hoped this day would come," he said. "After three long and difficult decades, Jonathan has been reunited with his family."

The Parole Commission may end Pollard's parole at any time but is not obliged to reconsider its terms for two years. After five years, Pollard must be released from his parole terms unless the commission has a compelling reason to keep him on probation.

Pollard appeared relaxed and pleased to be out of prison. Following his pre-dawn release from the federal prison in Butner, N.C., he traveled to New York City, where he checked in with his parole officer. The World Jewish Congress posted a photo of Pollard smiling serenely, seated in front of his wife, Esther.

At 9:09 a.m., a Twitter user posted a photo of the ex-spy with his wife and another man in the Lower East Side. He is looking, with apparent curiosity, at his wife's smartphone. ■

Parisian Jews reconsider their future in France

Babette and Sasha Bergman lead what many would consider a charmed life.

Both Jewish high-tech professionals in their 30s – they met while working at Google's European headquarters in Ireland – the Bergmans settled in this capital city shortly ahead of the birth of their now four-year-old daughter, Daniella.

On weekends, they enjoy entertaining friends in their spacious apartment in the 17th arrondissement — an upscale and heavily Jewish district where the anti-Semitic incidents common throughout the rest of Paris are rare. Many Jews in the poorer quarters say this area is the ivory tower of upper-middle class French Jewry.

Living on a street with three synagogues and near many kosher shops, observing the Sabbath and keeping kosher is far easier in Paris, where some 350,000 Jews live, than it was when they were living in Dublin, says Sasha, who was born in Russia and grew up in the Netherlands.

But in the wake of the jihadist attacks that killed at least 130 in Paris on Nov. 13, even the Bergmans are finding it increasingly difficult to imagine a future for themselves in a country where Islamist terrorism and violence – including attacks that target the Jewish community – are putting wind into the sails of a rising far-right.

"I love this city, I love my country, but after the initial shock from the attacks and the pain, my first thought was regret that we decided to settle here," said Babette, who is Sephardi and grew up in Lyon. Two of her three sisters moved recently to Israel.

In January, soldiers with automatic rifles were posted regularly outside the Bergmans' building to guard an adjacent synagogue. It was a precaution taken following the slaying by Islamists of 12 people at the offices of the satirical Charlie Hebdo newspaper, followed by two other terrorist attacks, including one at a kosher supermarket, Hyper Cacher, in eastern Paris that killed four people. The supermarket attack came about three years after an Islamist killed three children and a rabbi at a Jewish school in Toulouse, France.

"We pass them by sometimes with Daniella," Babette said of the soldiers guarding Jewish institutions. "We're grateful, but it's not a normal way to live."

Two days after the deadly attack, Babette's family from Lyon and Israel gathered in Paris for a cousin's wedding at the historic Synagogue des Tournelles in the Marais, the city's historic Jewish district.

After the ceremony, the congregants left the synagogue quickly, mostly to make room for the next wedding – there were four Jewish wedding ceremonies planned there that day – but also because some guests said they felt uncomfortable gathering among groups of Jews at a time when terrorists believed to have been involved in the attacks are still at large.

"We're not too scared to come here and continue our lives as usual," said Ness Berros, a French Jew in his 20s who attended the wedding. "But we're too scared to feel exactly at ease right now."

The synagogue is under heavy guard by soldiers and police officers. Security was even tighter at another event the same day at the Synagogue de la Victoire, also known as the Grand Synagogue of Paris, at a ceremony honouring the victims of the Nov. 13 attacks. The road leading to that synagogue was cordoned off as the participants were patted down for concealed weapons.

Outside Jewish institutions, many of which had suspended their activities following the attacks, streets usually bustling with tourists and locals were much emptier than they otherwise would have been on a sunny Sunday afternoon in November.

Fears were just as pronounced outside the city, in its poorer suburbs, where tens of thousands of Jews live in close proximity to many Muslims – and where tensions often run high. Such neighbourhoods provided the majority of Paris-area Jews who immigrated to Israel last year, according to Jewish Agency figures. In total, 6,658 French Jews immigrated to Israel last year, more than triple the total number in 2012, according to Israel's Ministry of Immigrant Absorption.

In Pavillons-sous-Bois, a northeastern suburb, Sandra Sebbah, a Jewish mother of four, says the soldiers outside her children's Jewish school "might as well be cardboard cutouts" because "they won't stop an attack by the people with the kind of determination we saw." Sebbah said she cannot leave France because of her husband's work, but encourages her children to "live somewhere else, like normal people and not like this, where I am afraid every minute they're not home – especially when they're at school."

Meanwhile, many French Jews worry the attacks will strengthen the popularity of the National Front, a far-right, anti-immigrant party that French Jewish groups have largely shunned for the anti-Semitic track record of its founder, Jean-Marie Le Pen. His daughter, Marine Le Pen, the party's current leader, recently removed her father as the party's honorary president because of anti-Semitic statements he made that she called unacceptable.

In a poll conducted two weeks before the Paris attacks, Marine Le Pen emerged as an early favourite candidate in the 2017 presidential elections. Some 30 per cent of those polled said they would vote for her over the incumbent Socialist Party president, Francois Hollande, who would garner 19 per cent of the vote.

Back at the Bergmans' apartment in central Paris, Babette's father, Gerard, said the attacks reminded him of his childhood. A dentist in his 60s, he left Constantine, Algeria, in the 1960s amid a bloody civil war, in which local nationalists fought France for independence and each other for dominance. Gerald, who did not want his last name used, said his family narrowly survived a bombing outside their home because they were at a restaurant when the explosive detonated.

"Now it seems to me the same barbarians are coming to drive me and my family once again, this time out of France itself," said Babette's father, adding he will probably leave for Israel within the next few years.

His wife, Jacqueline, who was born in Morocco, said she believes the war in Algeria may have traumatized her husband.

"I had a very different childhood in Casablanca," she recalled. "When we talk about coexistence, I know it's possible because I lived it, with neighbours, Arabs and Muslims, living together, acknowledging each other's holidays."

Still, Jacqueline said, she also sees no future for Jews in France.

"Something happened in the 1990s, a bad wind started blowing from the outside," she said in reference to hateful sermons and jihadist propaganda that began to spread through satellite television and continue to be disseminated online. "We didn't have this external influence, poisoning everything in its wake."

After the wedding celebration, a visibly tired Sasha puts Daniella to sleep and prepares to drive for an hour and a half to a university campus in Fontainebleau, where he is completing an executive MBA program.

The master's degree, he says, may be important for his young family's future.

Besides, he adds, "It's so peaceful out in the countryside."■

The new normal: stabbings, shootings and lulls

Avi Issacharoff
JERUSALEM

The minute we felt a lull in the current violence, the terror attacks last Thursday shattered that illusion.

Nov. 19 was the deadliest day since the outbreak of violence, or in Palestinian terms, the so-called "third intifadah." Five killed (including former CHAT teacher Rabbi Ya'acov Don) and another five injured in two separate attacks.

In the first attack, 36-year-old Raid Halil bin Mahmoud, from the Palestinian village of Dura near Hebron, exploited his Israeli work permit and killed two Israelis in what appears to be the first attack carried out by a Palestinian work permit holder inside the Green Line. The second attack of the day was a combined shooting and car-ramming attack, and ended with heavy losses, with two Israelis and a Palestinian bystander killed.

On Nov. 21, a 13-year-old girl was among four people stabbed in a terror attack in the southern Israeli city of Kiryat Gat.

And on Sunday 21-year-old Hadar Burchris from Safed was killed in the Gush Etzion Junction, the same place as the Nov. 19 attacks.

After almost two weeks of relative calm which saw a decrease in the number of stabbing attacks, we have seen an increase in shootings attacks.

While some young Palestinian men and women have approached IDF checkpoints in the southern West Bank city armed with knives, bent on attacks, in at least three other incidents the would-be attackers threw their weapons to the ground and expressed their desire to die.

So how do we explain the calm on one hand and the fresh upsurge on the other?

On one hand, pressure exerted by Israeli security forces in the West Bank, and the practice of demolishing the homes of attackers, has made it difficult for young attackers to carry out their plans.

On the other hand however, it's impossible to completely eradicate the motivation to murder Israelis. The sentiment exists, and is unlikely to disappear in the foreseeable future.

So despite the sporadic periods of calm, the new reality in the West Bank and its "third intifadah" appears to dictate that attacks will not stop completely. This would seem to be the untenable new normal.

On the morning of Nov.19, when bin Mahmoud decided to carry out the attack on the Panorama office building in Tel Aviv, his hometown of Hebron was quiet, at least in the H-2 area under Israeli control. Perhaps an artificial quiet, but quiet nonetheless. Two weeks ago, Hebron native Shadi Ahmad Matua opened fire on the Litman family near the Otniel Junction, and the week before, Jewish worshipers en route to the Cave of the Patriarchs were shot at by Palestinians.

In Hebron's famous, once busy market, part of which is under Israeli control, only a handful of stores have been able to stay afloat.

When asked, one local business owner, Khader Shabaneh, told the Times of Israel the reason behind the lull in stabbing attacks: "We don't want a mess, we just want the army to ease up on us a little bit."

Shabaneh, who owns a bakery adjacent to the Tomb of the Patriarchs, said that he and some of the other shopkeepers nearby had begun stopping young Palestinians in the street they suspect could be planning a terror attack.

Shabaneh said that recently when he saw children throwing rocks at Israeli security forces by his bakery, he approached them and told them to stop and explained to them that clashing with the IDF would result in a lock down of the neighbourhood and be bad for business. "But I was trembling in fear that the soldiers would shoot at me, thinking that I was one of them," he said.

He said that IDF soldiers' lack of Arabic compounded the problem.

"Only recently there were Arabic-speaking troops stationed here, and they treated local residents with respect," he said.

The lull in stabbings is at least partly a result of the co-operation of PA forces and local businessmen.

In light of the uptick in violence, many family dynamics have changed, an IDF officer said, and parents are increasingly monitoring what their children are doing.

This could also be seen an effort to restore a sense of order to the traditional family unit, which has been weakened in Palestinian society.

No early warning of attacks

According to the same IDF official, after fatally shooting Rabbi Yaakov Litman and his son Netanel last week, Matua returned home and told several family members what he had done.

"When his father found out about it, he went to Hazayit intersection, approached a soldier patrolling there and explained to him that his son carried out the attack," he said.

Why would a father turn in his own son? Turns out, the father is a local businessman who realized the implications the incident would have on the family, and chose to give up his son for the sake of the family rather than pay the price for his son's actions.

One of the biggest problems facing the IDF and Shin Bet in this new model of an intifadah is the lack of intelligence pointing to the intentions of would-be Palestinian attackers.

"None of the recent attackers from the Hebron area was known to the security establishment," the officer said. "In fact, we don't have anyone on our watch list currently.

"One of the attackers who carried out an attack near the Tomb of the Patriarchs was sitting in a nearby Internet cafe where he wrote a farewell message to his friends and family, asking for their forgiveness, but explained that he 'had to act,'" he said. "Five minutes later, he walked out and attempted to stab soldiers. We have no early warning indicators here."

The official said the impromptu attacks by young Palestinians were much harder to combat than those organized by known terror groups.

"Actually, activities that take place within the terrorism infrastructure are more straightforward for us, because when a threat emerges we can make arrests," he said.

In recent days soldiers stationed in the area have seen a new troubling trend: young Palestinians coming to die at Israeli checkpoints. They don't attempt to mount an attack, but simply show soldiers that they are carrying knives in the apparent hope that the troops will shoot them dead.

When the captured young suspects were asked their motivations, many said they just wished to end their lives. Most of them struggled with psychological or social issues.

Although Tel Aviv terrorist bin Mahmoud had a permit to work inside Israel, and although the government subsequently froze the entry of hundreds of permit-holders, it's unlikely that it will halt the daily influx of ten of thousands of Palestinian workers as a punitive measure. Such a move would escalate tensions, not abate them.

In the West Bank, especially in Hebron, it's not only the IDF, some Palestinians and PA security forces are attempting to restore calm. In recent days, Jewish residents of nearby settlements have posted notices informing Palestinian residents of armed community patrols in an effort to prevent future attacks.

It's unclear if this a publicity stunt or a genuine emerging phenomenon in mixed Jewish-Arab areas of the West Bank.

"Most of the Jewish settlers in the main blocks are supportive and willing to help," the IDF officer said.

Still, he said, "they have their own demands. For example, now, there's a campaign to close Route 60 to Palestinian motorists, and that's probably not going to happen."

In response to reports of the armed patrols of Jewish settlers, IDF Col. Yariv Ben Ezra, commander of the Judea district, said any IDF weapons discovered on the civilian patrols would be confiscated by security forces.

The IDF official said the army was trying to avoid friendly fire incidents, saying "If they want to patrol in their cars without taking action, then by all means yes. But we cannot have people taking action with weapons on their own. It could end in a disaster." ■

How to counteract the EU's labelling decision

> Maybe the time has come for us to alter our collective buying habits

Jews around the world have fought heroically against the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign, a movement meant to undermine the legitimacy and survival of Israel. In this battle, we have had some wonderful non-Jewish allies, including London Mayor Boris Johnson, who scoffed that, "the supporters of this so-called boycott are really just corduroy-jacketed academics that have no real standing on the matter and I think are highly unlikely to be influential on Britain," as well as some politicians in the United States who have promoted legislation to make BDS illegal.

Now, the European Union (EU) has decided to label products produced in the West Bank, the Golan and east Jerusalem, on the basis that Europeans should be informed about products that come from what has been deemed "illegally occupied" land. Israel has been singled out despite the fact that many other places in the world having seriously egregious issues with true illegal occupation.

The EU ambassador to Israel, Lars Faaborg-Andersen, a Danish diplomat, claims the decision is not political, but merely a "technical" matter. He seemed almost insulted that some Israelis might equate or see a connection to the Holocaust experience of Jewish "labelling." To add massive insult to economic and political injury, Swedish Foreign Minister Margot Wallstrom recently stated that the recent ISIS attacks on Paris were partially fuelled by Palestinian frustration. "To counteract the radicalization," she told a TV audience, "we must go back to the situation such as the one in the Middle East of which not the least the Palestinians see that there is no future: we must either accept a desperate situation or resort to violence."

So, what can Canadian Jews do about all this?

Maybe the time has come for us to alter our collective buying habits. Perhaps we might consider eschewing products from those EU countries which believe labelling products as coming from the "illegal settlements" is merely a "technical issue." We could let all the retail providers of such EU-produced products know that we will not buy them because of the policy of their corporate and political masters – lobbying, in essence, one customer at a time. Sending letters to corporate headquarters informing them of our plans will do as well.

There are, for example, many carmakers that produce products as good as – and a lot cheaper than – Sweden's Volvo. Likewise, there are many furniture outlets that provide quality and relatively inexpensive furniture other than Ikea. There are many cheeses to chose from other than Danish blue and havarti. And there is lox to top bagels and cream cheese other than Norwegian. We might consider replacing these products with first-class Canadian items made by quality manufacturers from British Columbia to Nova Scotia and everywhere in between.

Of course, it will be important to determine which of the EU countries will follow through with this labelling decision before deciding on which products and which countries to avoid purchasing from. At present, Germany has declined to participate, as has Hungary. Of course, in the face of the Paris attacks, one might think that labelling the source of hummus might take a back seat in the grand scheme of priorities.

Maybe that is wishful thinking, but imagine the look on the Volvo dealer's face when a previous customer drives up in a Toyota and says, "I will not ever buy a Volvo again, nor will anyone in my family because of the comments of the Swedish foreign minister about the root of the Paris ISIS attack."

We have power in numbers, creativity and determination. Let's use it. ■

Brazilian-born sisters reunite to perform in Toronto

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When Aline Morales left her native Brazil to settle in Toronto in 2003, she realized that many Canadians thought Brazilian music was limited to the samba and the bossa nova. Morales, a drummer, percussionist and composer, brought maracatu drumming and dancing, an Afro-Brazilian performance genre, to the city.

"The concept that people had here of Brazilian music, it was kind of a stereotype of just samba and bossa nova. Nobody had ever heard of maracatu, and then I started to teach, and I still do," Morales said.

A traditional maracatu performance includes a troupe of drummers, a singer, a chorus, dancers and stock characters, along with a king and queen. In Brazil, Morales performed with one of the country's best-known maracatu groups, Naçao Estrela Brilhante do Recife. "Maracatu is an old tradition in Brazil, an oral tradition, something you can't learn in school," Morales said.

Morales' Toronto-based percussion troupe of up to 35 participants, Baque de Bamba, performed at Panamania Live at Nathan Phillips Square and the Summerworks Block Party this past summer, has led parades through Kensington Market and was featured in an Ontario Tourism "There's No Place Like This" television commercial.

Morales released a debut solo album, Flores, Tambores e Amores, in 2011. A change of pace from maracatu, the Juno-nominated CD is rooted in samba, forró, northeastern Brazilian folk music and 1960s tropicalia, although the maracatu influence still comes through. "It's a little more mellow, not so loud as a drumming group can be," Morales said.

Before she moved to Canada, Morales performed regularly with her sister, Jabu, a singer and songwriter. The two women are now separated by an ocean. Jabu has been living in Barcelona since 2008. She's established herself as a performing artist there, with her own band, the Maracatu Mandacaru drumming troupe, and with the all-female ensemble Tambor de Saia. Jabu is launching her second CD, Malungo, in Toronto, and Morales will join her on stage at the Lula Lounge at the end of November.

Malungo was recorded in Barcelona with Portuguese and English lyrics. Aline helped Jabu write one of the two English tracks on the album, Heirs, a song about having children. The two women are mothers, and a remarkable coincidence surrounds the birth of their children.

"We got pregnant in the same year," Aline said, adding that both she and her sister have twins who are now nearly three years old. Also on the theme of motherhood is the track Libran, on which Jabu sings in Portuguese about an African-Brazilian goddess who represents motherhood.

With its African and Brazilian musical influences, Jabu's CD is a reflection of Barcelona, the multicultural city it was recorded in, Aline said.

"You can tell Jabu is living in a place that is multicultural, a little bit like Toronto."■

Aline and Jabu Morales' one-night Toronto appearance will include local musicians on drums, keyboards, guitar, bass and a Brazilian guitar called the cabuco, along with lots of percussion. The sisters perform at the Lula Lounge, 1585 Dundas St. W., Toronto, on Nov. 26. Doors open at 9 p.m. and show time is 10 p.m. Tickets are $10 in advance at umanota.ca or $15 at the door. You can listen to Malungo on soundcloud at https://soundcloud.com/jabumorales, and it will be available for download on iTunes. For more information about maracatu, visit www.baquedebamba.com or contact Aline Morales through Facebook.

A play about the writing life

DOROTHY LICHTBLAU
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Initially, Seminar may seem yet another story about the effect a tough, arrogant yet potentially enlightening teacher has on his students. It is that. However, centrally, this smart comedy crafted by an astute writer, is about the writing life.

Pulitzer Prize nominee, playwright, author and screenwriter, Theresa Rebeck offers a harsh yet affectionately comedic rendering of young literary aspirants intent on success. In just 90 minutes Rebeck takes audiences on a wild ride with five noteworthy individuals who get caught in a gamut of entanglements due to their common passion for the written word. She then brings everyone home chuckling about what he/she has learned on the trip. Amazingly, the journey mostly takes place in the living room of one of the seminar participants.

The first scene begins mid conversation. Izzy (Grace Lynn Kung), Martin (Nathan Howe), Douglas (Ryan James Miller) and Kate (Andrea Houssin), four aspiring 20-something writers, are verbally strutting and sparring while waiting for Leonard (Tom McCamus), the famous novelist whom they've each paid $5,000 for a 10-week master class. All the young writers have demonstrated some talent. Now, each is looking to Leonard to push them toward success though each apprentice spells the S word differently.

Izzy is a highly confident and pragmatic young woman who is sexually available for fun or benefit. She is more interested in fame than profundity. Douglas, an Ivy Leaguer with schlep, is a nice guy who can be tiresome and pompous. Martin, the poorest of the bunch, is also the most protective of his work. For him writing is close to a calling. Yet, he isn't ready to expose his work to a reader. A well-heeled Bennington grad, Kate is bright and a self-proclaimed feminist, who is mired in the past vis à vis her family and her writing. She wants to be validated and liked. The seminar is being held at her posh Upper West side Manhattan apartment.

Each of the young actors offers a solid and lively performance. Together, they are a tight ensemble.

When Leonard arrives, the energy in the room changes. He is a man with large appetites and no hesitancy about satisfying them. His non-altruistic mission is to blast open his students' notions about powerful writing and literary accomplishment. His methods are brutal. Without compunction he spews brilliant but scathing remarks about the novices' work and cutting assessments of their characters. Even his praise raises the fear of a price to pay. After a couple of sessions with the unrelenting Leonard, the students are about ready to jump ship. But they don't. Instead, while Leonard is away on a foreign assignment, they go madly off in diverse directions.

McCamus' Leonard wonderfully elicits fear and loathing yet doesn't alienate the audience. In control of Leonard's enormous personality, McCamus capably reveals the many aspects of this complex character. As the play progresses McCamus adds another piece to the Leonard puzzle. He won't submit to defeat, he is self-undermining, he is insightful, he is gripped by narcissism and at bottom, like his students, he is passionate about writing.

My guess is that Rebeck is too. In between the lines of a satisfying story, she laughingly warns us about the literary life. Her tips aren't astounding but worth reviewing. A writer's life is hard, the pay is poor, there is no guarantee of success and even if you gain wide reputation it often is short-lived.

Why do it? Go see Seminar. ■

Confessions of a reformed leftie

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Ottawa music producer and political activist Fred Litwin has been "out" for decades, not only as a gay man, but as a proud and articulate Conservative who prefers to be a "free thinker" rather than be fashionably left on a spectrum of important political causes.

In his new book, Conservative Confidential: Inside the Fabulous Blue Tent, Litwin walks us through his political conversion to Conservatism after becoming gravely disillusioned with the left shortly after 9/11.

Litwin is founder of Ottawa's news-making Free Thinking Film Society. He's also the architect of a gay-friendly wing of the Conservative Party of Canada whose social gatherings inside the "fabulous blue tent" at Conservative conventions were famously popular during the Stephen Harper era.

Now as an author, he's manufactured a cogent and compelling rebuttal of modern leftist politics in Canada, America and the liberal West. Litwin writes with a strong voice: international commentator Daniel Pipes described his book as "an eloquent mix of the personal and the global."

The point of no return in Litwin's conversion came shortly after 9/11, when he began encountering interpretations that the catastrophe was all America's fault. The Toronto Star's Haroon Siddiqui, for example, asserted that the attacks occurred because America was "indifferent to the suffering of too many peoples, from Afghanistan to Chechnya to the Middle East... thus driving the ordinary folk there to seethe in silence against America and the crazed ones into fanatical acts."

Then he looked at Noam Chomsky's book on 9/11: "It was all typical Chomsky – bash Israel, bash American foreign policy, blame the United States for Al Qaeda, condemn the United States as a terrorist state – all 21st-century regurgitations from the 1960s. I sighed and put the book back. I was done with the left."

In bringing out all the usual suspects, the book presents a worthwhile rehash of many great and embarrassing moments in Canadian and global politics, including some we may have forgotten.

Remember when Prime Minister Jean Chrétien seemed to blame America in an interview with the CBC on the first anniversary of 9/11? "You cannot exercise your powers to the point of humiliation for the others," Chrétien said. "That is what the western world – not only the Americans, the western world – has to realize. Because they are human beings too. There are long-term consequences."

Or how about Liberal MP Carolyn Parrish complaining to an Egyptian newspaper about the "influence of the Jewish lobby" in Canada, cursing our neighbours to the south ("Damn Americans, I hate those bastards") and stomping on a George W. Bush proxy-voodoo doll?

These are not just blasts from the past, of course. Some of these fringe Liberal attitudes may again resurface in Justin Trudeau's majority Liberal government. Indeed, isn't the historic Liberal insistence on Canada's role as "honest broker" in the Middle East really just a smokescreen to apportion a disproportionate dollop of blame on Israel and the West?

Litwin also reminds us that Justin Trudeau's brother and advisor, Alexandre Trudeau, is a rabble-rousing filmmaker whose 2012 documentary, The New Great Game, defended Iran's nuclear weapons program while vilifying Israel. The film, which ran on the CBC, was produced in co-operation with Press TV, the Iranian state-owned broadcaster.

Litwin had his own run-in with the Iranians in 2011 over plans by his Free Thinking Film Society to screen Iranium, a film that deals with the brutality of the Iranian regime and its covert quest for nuclear weapons. A complaint from the Iranian Embassy initially compelled Library and Archives Canada (LAC), where Litwin had booked a theatre, to cancel the screening.

After the press got hold of the story, however, LAC decided to allow the screening after all, but protests and threats forced closure of the building. Thanks to all the publicity generated, the film was eventually shown to a capacity crowd in a different venue. Canada ultimately sent a diplomatic note to Iran that stated, "Canada is a free country and freedom of expression is a core value that won't be compromised."

Similarly, when the Free Thinking Film Society scheduled a screening of the film Obsession, which traces the rise of radical Islam and its incitement to global jihad, a complaint from an Ottawa professor prompted a cancellation and much publicity – the film ultimately attracted a sold-out house in another venue.

Litwin also showed the film Reclaiming Our Pride by Toronto lawyer Martin Gladstone, which protested the inclusion of QuAIA ("Queers Against Israeli Apartheid") in the Toronto Gay Pride parade. Litwin points out that Uzma Shakir, the city official who decided the term "Israeli apartheid" was not discriminatory, had a serious undeclared bias. Shakir, Toronto's director of equity, diversity and human rights, had previously demonstrated antipathy towards Israel and was a regular contributor to Rabble.ca, the media sponsor of Israel Apartheid Week.

Another local institution – the CBC – also comes under Litwin's scrutiny as he targets a bevy of producers, commentators and hosts (including Tony Berman, Avi Lewis, Jian Ghomeshi, Eric Margolis, and Robert Fisk) who were famously antagonistic to Israel. But he rises to the defence of Harper's Conservatives over the left's false presumption that the Conservatives had a hidden agenda to fight a holy war against gay rights.

"By 2015, I'd already spent nine years in the enemy camp, and I'd never even heard any war drums," he writes. "I found no anti-gay war rooms, and for most of those years, I'd been a completely 'out' gay Conservative."

Don't let the word "Conservative" in the title fool you into supposing the book is past its "best before" date. With a Liberal majority government now enshrined in Ottawa, issues raised in Conservative Confidential now seem more relevant and cautionary than ever. ■

Kids' entertainers make the world go round

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Lisa Sonshine and Brock Burford, better known as Sonshine & Broccoli, have been singing their way into Canadian children's hearts for 11 years.

Singer Sonshine is full of light and excitement with a jubilant personality to which her fans, kids ages two to 10, gravitate.

Burford's childhood nickname of "Broccoli" stuck, and pretty much describes the singer/guitarist's playful demeanour.

Following the successes of Sonshine and Broccoli Jam in 2004, and their second album Feel The Beat in 2009, the duo recently launched their third children's album It's A Beautiful Day.

The album is a collection of 12 songs ranging in style from rock to pop to bluegrass, including a gospel song.

"Kindie Pop and Kindie Rock is a new wave of writing for children's music where adults, as well as kids, can listen. If you took the children's lyrics out, it would be a pop song you would hear on the radio," explained Burford. "On this album we wanted to expand our story-telling skills, elaborating on themes of conquering your fears and freedom of expression."

Lisa Sonshine and Brock Burford

> If you took the children's lyrics out, it would be a pop song you would hear on the radio.

With songs such as Making a Fort, Wave Hello, Sing It Out, The Painter, Rock Paper Scissors, Time Travel Song, and Try Something New, one can't help but anticipate where the lyrics will lead.

"My favourite song on the album is Music Makes the World Go Round. It contains both melodies and crossover melodies, where Lisa is singing one part and I am singing another part, and we harmonize together but in different rhythms. I like the song structure and the melody and I love the music. It has a beautiful flow and the message is what I like most: music does make the world go round and it connects everyone together," Burford said.

Fresh out of the musical theatre program at Sheridan College, Sonshine saw herself headed to Broadway, while Burford aspired to be a rock star.

Nevertheless, life had other ideas.

One day Lisa, was asked to lead a sing-a-long mom-and-tot music class.

"I called Brock, who was my best friend, and asked if he could help me out. We wrote The Welcome Song and The Goodbye Song," said Sonshine.

"I always responded well to kids and Lisa was a child whisperer. It capitulated from there," added Burford.

Touring across Ontario this summer, Sonshine & Broccoli performed some 50 shows. One show in particular left a huge impact on the performers.

"We did a show at Camp Aim, a therapeutic camp for children. We rocked out so hard it became a big dance party. The counsellors got these kids out of their chairs and some even out of their wheelchairs. It was one of the best shows we have ever done. The energy was over the top. I left Camp Aim knowing that music is a universal language.

"We were so inspired from our performance at Camp Aim that we penned Music Makes the World Go Round that night," said Sonshine.

What's next for Sonshine & Broccoli?

"We have submitted It's a Beautiful Day to the Junos and are hoping for a Juno nomination, if not a Juno award. We will continue building our brand, touring, and working on getting a television show," Sonshine said. ■

Sonshine & Broccoli will be performing songs from their newest album It's A Beautiful Day at Associated Hebrew Schools Chanukah party on Nov. 29; Temple Sinai Chanukah party on Dec. 12 and performing at Kidstock Feb. 7, with proceeds going to Chai Lifeline. Visit: www.sonshineandbroccoli.com

From emerging artists to emerging elders

Evelyn Tauben

Refreshingly, there has been a rise in the number of initiatives dedicated to fostering Jewish creativity and innovation, informing more vibrant Jewish conversations and communities.

These excellent holistic programs, mostly retreats and multi-stage incubators, are aimed almost exclusively at young people. Although I count (for the next three years and one month) as a young person, I wonder about the value of this staunch demographic focus.

Tent seminars, a fabulous new program of the Yiddish Book Center in Massachusetts, are one-week intensives hosted in various cities that have explored creative writing, food, museums, comedy and fashion. As their website states, these immersive, free workshops are "for anyone who's curious about the connections between Jewishness and modern culture." Anyone, that is, in their 20s.

Most projects cast a slightly wider net aimed at Jews in their 20s and 30s, including PresenTense, a social entrepreneurship incubator in over 15 cities internationally, and the ROI Summit, a global gathering in Israel of change-makers and community-builders. Closer to home, ProMontreal has supported young entrepreneurs under 40 for 15 years, and Toronto's new Centre for Jewish Innovation, Genesis, equally concentrates on mentorship for young adults – though director, Alana Kayfetz, acknowledges that its focus is more about stage of life than a strict age cap.

Based in New York, Asylum Arts is another visionary, nascent project framed as "a global network for Jewish culture" that convenes retreats in international locations for essential cultural conversations and professional support. They focus on "artists within the emerging spectrum," which, as director Rebecca Guber notes, "means different things within various international contexts," while conceding that the average age of participants is 33.

Many of my colleagues have passed into the no-man's land of their 40s between the revered emerging artist or young entrepreneur and the so-called established professional. No longer worthy of support, they are assumed to have achieved clarity of vision and self-sufficiency at the magic age of 41.

What happens to those launching a startup at 49 or creating a genre-bending performance at 62? How do they receive support for a Jewish project from the Jewish community upon graduating from young adulthood? How do they "develop new relationships with an international Jewish artist community, develop needed skills to advance their careers, and delve deeply into their own Jewish identity within a creative context," as Asylum retreats offer participants?

Granted, I have benefited from outreach efforts to younger Jews, which give us a voice and a like-minded cohort. I have also been the staffer charged with developing "cool programs" for young adults (largely the impetus for Tent, as academic director Joshua Lambert explained to me). Ultimately though, I found that separating the young from the young-at-heart was a false dichotomy, counter to the larger goal of connecting people with Jewish culture, and with each other.

People of all ages come together at the KlezKanada Laurentian Retreat in Lantier, Que. to discover and create Yiddish and Jewish culture. AVIA MOORE PHOTO

The projects mentioned here are not misguided, but they are missing an essential aspect of Jewish life: intergenerational transmission. At the annual KlezKanada summer retreat in the Laurentians, the very young to the very old gather to celebrate Yiddish and Jewish culture. While the multi-aged faculty are experts, the learning is not just top-down. Seasoned artists are exposed to experimental practices as much as the "young people" are trained in traditional modes. Unmatched collaborations form across generations. Participants are connected to the spectrum of the community, not just the segment primed for procreation.

As we witness more seniors creating and innovating well into their advanced years, as well as people launching second and third careers, I hope to see more projects that are as conscious of developing intergenerational spaces and opportunities for not-so-young creatives as of targeting young adults. Let's take our lead from Kohelet, 11:6: "In the morning sow your seed, and in the evening do not hold back." Cultivating the creativity solely of those in the morning of life holds back the potential of those evening (and mid-life) years that are ripe for the picking. ■

Opening night crowd gathers at Water juried art show.

RON STANG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, WINDSOR

This city's Jewish community is aging and to some extent in need of revitalization and reaching out to the community around it.

That's why the Windsor Jewish Community Centre this month has taken on a unique approach to engaging both with its own members and the wider public with its Water event, which includes a juried art exhibit, as well as symphony and dance performances.

Inspired by Tashlich, the Rosh Hashanah ritual of "casting off" sins and seeking renewal by symbolically throwing bread or food into a body of water, Water was also meant to be symbolic of the Windsor area, since the city is on the Detroit River and much of its identity comes from the river and the Great Lakes.

Windsor-born Gabrielle Pescador (née Bernstein), a multimedia artist now living literally across that river outside Detroit, and who came up with the "water" theme, said the river is "very unique" to the city and was influential in her growing up here. "It was a very important feature of my childhood memories," she said.

Pescador's family also happened to play a significant role in building the city's landmark shul, the Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue, in 1929.

"Water is a very significant symbol in art and in spiritual traditions as a cleanser, a transformer, as something representing the transitory nature of life or the creative process, or God, or the sacred," she said.

She and her husband, Javier, also an artist, decided that a juried art exhibition, which includes submissions of various media – from paintings to sculpture, video and sound – from artists across North America could explore and express this theme. "It had a lot of potential for artists to react to," she said.

The transcendent show had relevance to the religious and non-religious, Jew and non-Jew.

"Some people responded to it from a Jewish perspective, and some people were spiritual, some people were more connected to nature. We got a really wide response, which is really what we wanted. We wanted the show to not have one note," Pescador said.

Besides the art show, Water was kicked off by a performance of the Windsor Symphony Orchestra performing, appropriately enough, Handel's Water Music. There was also a performance by a local contemporary and non-Jewish dance group, HNM Dance Company, which has its studio in the JCC.

Pescador said the event allowed Windsor Jews to define themselves anew.

"The Windsor Jewish community is an aging community, and I think that the Jewish community in itself doesn't have to define itself by the old guard necessarily," she said, noting there's a whole new generation that could be inspired by events like this.

Water even delved into contemporary issues. Pescador said the Detroit River Canadian Cleanup Committee showed a film. "They were excited to have a multi-layered experience with respect to the river and how important water is to people."

Ronna Warsh, chair of the JCC board, said her organization has sought program renewal, in part sparked by its successful annual film festival, which is more than a decade old and attracts a Jewish and non-Jewish audience.

"It seemed pretty clear to us that cultural events were something that might attract people," she said.

Moreover, Warsh said some of the more recent programming was "routine or somewhat stale and unappealing, so you always have to change up what you're doing." ■

Unique Glasses Helped Karen And Her Twin Sister Sharon

An eye specialist diagnosed Karen and Sharon with juvenile macular degeneration and said "There's not much to be done." Our mom was heartbroken. Years later, mom read an article about an International Academy of Low Vision Specialists (IALVS) doctor who designed special glasses that helped people with macular degeneration. "More curious than skeptical, we went. And it changed everything! For the first time in thirty years we could read! He held up a piece of paper and I could make out every word."

Top musicians pay tribute to Ray Jessel

CJN STAFF

A host of music notables will pay tribute on Nov. 30 to Temple Sinai's first music director Ray Jessel, the Canadian composer and performer whom singer Michael Feinstein hailed as "the millenium's Noel Coward."

Jessel died last July at age 85, leaving a legacy of music that runs the gamut from Broadway musicals, accomplished classical compositions and chart-topping love songs from his TV days in Hollywood, to some of the cabaret world's most brilliantly funny ditties. Strangely, he gained notoriety just over a year ago when he auditioned for the hit TV show America's Got Talent.

"I learned so much from Ray," says singer Jackie Richardson, who will share the stage with performers including Theresa Tova, as well as Pam Hyatt and Lorraine Foreman, for whom Jessel wrote material in his early days before he was swooped up by partner Marion Grudeff to write the music for the Broadway show Baker Street.

Jazz FM's Jaymz Bee first fell in love with Jessel's work at New York's Birdland. Jaymz will sing the song that brought Jessel worldwide notoriety at 84 when he performed his composition What She's Got on NBC's America's Got Talent, which will be forever be fondly remembered as The Penis Song.

Ori Dagan, recent winner of Best Jazz Vocals Award at the Toronto International Music Awards, will sing Jessel's Hellzapoppin', which was a chart-topping hit for Louis Armstrong soon after it premiered in the musical of the same name at Expo '67 in Montreal. Jessel's wistful love song I'm Alright Now, popularized by John Pizzarelli on his New Classics recording, will be sung at this show by Sam Broverman.

Ray Jessel

Other areas of Jessel's musical brilliance will be illustrated in Morry Kernerman's presentation of an excerpt from Sonata for Violin and Piano, which Kernerman commissioned, which was premiered on CBC, and with a trio of Baker Street songs sung by Robert Missen, Allison Arends and David Warrack, including Richard Burton's top-of-the-chart's hit, A Married Man. ■

Remembering Ray Jessel, 8 p.m. Nov. 30, The Performing Arts Lodges Toronto, 110 The Esplanade. Suggested donation $20 will aid PAL Future (tax receipts available). Advance tickets 416-603-0625

Anne Frank's father added to diary's authorship

JTA

The Swiss foundation that owns the publication rights to Anne Frank's diary is adding the famous diarist's father, Otto, as co-author, in what is widely viewed as an effort to extend the book's European copyright.

If the authorship change goes unchallenged, the Anne Frank Fonds, which Otto Frank established, will retain control over all printings of the book until 2050, The New York Times reported.

In most European countries, copyrights automatically expire 70 years after the author's death; in this case, the copyright is scheduled to expire on Dec. 31. In Canada, The Globe and Mail reported, the term of copyright subsists for 50 years after the author's death, or 50 years after first publication of a literary work first published posthumously. So whether the diary is already in the public domain in Canada depends whether one agrees with the Fonds' position that Otto is a co-author.

Translators also own the copyright to their translations, the Globe article reported.

Anne Frank died in 1945 at the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, shortly before her 16th birthday. Otto Frank, the only immediate family member to survive the Holocaust, lived until 1980.

A foundation spokesman told the Times that legal experts had advised the foundation that adding Otto Frank as a co-author is justified because he "created a new work" by editing and reshaping the diary into "kind of a collage."

The copyright extension would most immediately impact the foundation's rival, the Anne Frank House museum in Amsterdam, which has been producing an online version of the diary that cannot go live until the foundation's copyright expires.

Both institutions had the support of Otto Frank, who bequeathed different materials to each, and the two have long had a contentious relationship. Decades ago, Anne Frank Fonds accused the Anne Frank House of commercializing the Holocaust victim's story by selling balloons and T-shirts at a travelling exhibit of the museum's artifacts and, in 2013, a Dutch court ordered the Amsterdam museum to return a cache of 25,000 documents loaned by the Swiss organization. Both sides accused each other of blocking a more amicable resolution to the conflict.

While is not clear yet whether the Anne Frank House or others will challenge the authorship change in court, and thus the copyright, a spokeswoman for the Anne Frank House told The Times that neither "Otto Frank nor any other person is co-author." ■

An Einstein first in Canada...

November 2015 marks 100 years since Albert Einstein created his theory of relativity. Canadian Friends of Hebrew University developed the Einstein Legacy Project (ELP) honouring both this landmark anniversary and Albert Einstein's role as one of the founders of Hebrew University of Jerusalem. The first in a series of ELP global launches took place in Toronto at the home of Judy and Larry Tanenbaum. ELP co-chairs Judy Tanenbaum and Tribal Planet president Jeff Martin presented the six ELP initiatives: The Einstein Museum, The Next Einstein, Citizen Science, Einstein 3D the Film, Genius: 100 Visions of the Future book and the Dinner of the Century. ■ – The Socialite

ASK ELLA

How to cope when children alter life plans?

Ella Burakowski
eb@thecjn.ca

Dear Ella,

Our inability to conceive has taken its toll on our marriage. Jake and I had a perfect engagement and wedding, we bought a home, and then the floor fell out from under us. We have been trying to have a baby for well over a year. My parents ask me for monthly updates, and Jake's parents don't say a word. My friends are having babies, showers, brises, and baby namings.

The stress is exhausting. Many nights I stay at work late so I don't have to face Jake. When we communicate, we argue. Our relationship has changed.

In vitro fertilization is our last option, but it's expensive. If that doesn't work, I fear Jake and I won't survive. How are we going to deal? How will we go on?

Empty Heart

Dear Empty Heart,

Your life plan has hit a major bump, and you are not facing this crisis together. Make no mistake: this is a crisis. You had a life plan, and with everything having fallen into place prior to this, your coping mechanisms are weak.

Communication is key at this crucial time, and rather than blaming and pulling away, you need to face this situation head on and together. If fact, you may need to involve a professional counsellor or support group to get you through this.

Try to take a step back and separate the emotion from the task at hand.

Work together, support each other, never ever assign blame, and put a concrete plan in place. Meet with a fertility medical expert, and be realistic. Give yourselves a deadline. Discuss an alternate plan, possibly adoption. You will be down at different times, so put your support and sensitivity into high gear.

If baby events upset you, stay away from them, and send a gift and your apology for not attending. Tell your parents to stop asking. Let them know you will inform them when there is something to tell.

Together you can get through this. You are fighting the same battle. Lean on each other, and don't lose sight of why you fell in love. Marriage is hard and rewarding. You have come to a crossroads. Stay on the same path, communicate and move ahead arm in arm. Whatever the outcome, you will get through it together and end up with a stronger bond.

Dear Ella,

My 33rd birthday is around the corner, and most of my life is on track. I'm dating a great guy, my career is taking off and I am making head way into paying off my student loans. I'm finally starting to reap the rewards of all the hard work I've put into getting to this stage in my life. However, there is a huge cloud hanging over me. Kids. I don't want any and the guilt is overwhelming – not so much for me, but for my parents, who talk endlessly about becoming grandparents. I would prefer to leave that for my sister to provide. How selfish am I? This decision was not made lightly. How do I tell them?

No Room for Kids

Dear No Room For Kids,

Many millennials are opting out of parenthood, so you are not alone. It's imperative that you came to this decision after careful deliberation, as there is no going back, so let's move forward.

Your parents raised you with hopes and dreams, and you are altering that path. Because of your decision, they will never have a grandchild from you, and that is something they need to accept, and grieve, if necessary. Share your reasons with them. Even if they don't agree, at least they will understand you did not come to this life decision without extreme introspection. Your comment about being selfish suggests you still have some emotional work to do, too. Once you are sure of your decision, embrace it. It would be so much worse to bring a child into this world for the wrong reasons. Stand tall, and live your dreams to the fullest. Just expect that you will come across some people who will never understand or agree with your decision. ■

Ella's advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

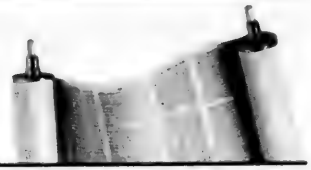
Vayishlach | Genesis 32:4-36:43



Rabbi Ilan Acoca argues that Jacob represents the voice of the Jewish People
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl explains why ancient animosities need not continue
Rabbi Catharine Clark says some injuries stay with us for a lifetime, and never fully heal

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Rachel our matriarch passed away tragically at a young age during childbirth. The Zohar says the reason she died young was due to a statement made by Jacob, our patriarch.

When Jacob left his father-in-law's Laban's home to return to his homeland, he left without informing Laban. Laban pursued Jacob, and when he finally caught up with Jacob, he accused Jacob of stealing his idols. Jacob was sure no one had stolen his idols, so he said, "With whomever you find your gods, he shall not live" (Bereshit 31:32). Little did Jacob know that Rachel had stolen the idols. The Angel of Death took the words of Jacob and used them to hurt Rachel until she passed away.

When Jacob comes to his blind father Isaac to get the blessing, Isaac touches him to find out who he is. After touching Jacob, Isaac says, "The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are Esau's hands" (Bereshit 27:22). Rashi interprets the verse as saying that as long as the voice is the voice of Jacob, the hands will not be the hands of Esau.

The voice of Jacob represents the voice of the Jewish People who through history used their prayers to ask God for salvation and help. The hands of Esau represent the hands of our enemies who want to annihilate us.

But I think it is even deeper than that. Words have the ability to build or destroy. What Rashi teaches us is that as long as we use our voice for positive actions – judging favourably, inspiring people and giving them hope – the hands of our enemies won't be able to touch us. God will judge us the way we judge others.

Let us all use our words positively and bring salvation to the world. Amen. ■

Symbolic conflict that escalated into physical violence characterized the relationship of Christianity to Judaism for more than 1,600 years. In our readings of sacred scripture, Jews and Christians interpreted biblical texts to portray each other in negative ways. The characters of Jacob and Esau were central to those expositions. Each religion claimed to be Jacob, the true Israel.

"The older will serve the younger" became the watchword of Christianity. Judaism was the first-born, represented by Esau. Christianity viewed itself as Jacob, the person and religion that had supplanted the older sibling. Esau had sold its birthright to Jacob, spurning the covenant for material benefit, a bowl of porridge.

Jews identified Esau as Edom, the Idumean nation to the south of Judea. Biblical Israel had bitter battles with Edom, and the Hasmoneans forcibly converted the Idumeans to Judaism. Herod, of Idumean origin, was a Roman client-king responsible for a reign of terror. Thus Edom came to be associated with Rome. Later, when Christianity became the state religion of the Roman Empire, the figure of Esau/Edom came to be identified as Rome/Christianity. For Jews persecuted by Christians, "Esau was a hunter" who demanded "that red, red stuff," the blood of the Jews.

As we know from our Torah portion, Jacob and Esau met and eventually restored relations. The historic animosity between them was diminished. In the last century, secular society created the possibility of better interfaith relations. Fifty years ago, the Vatican II declaration of Nostra Aetate profoundly changed Catholic-Jewish relations. Christians came to realize that the historic "teaching of contempt" against the Jews was a significant contributing factor to the Holocaust. Catholics and other Christians revised their belief to recognize the ongoing covenant of God and the Jewish People. We have moved from confrontation to co-operation. Ancient animosity need not continue. ■

Genesis chapters 45 and 46 mention many times that Jacob travelled to Egypt in wagons. It's odd that the Torah emphasizes the mode of transportation by which Jacob is reunited with his beloved son Joseph. It's not as if the reader would otherwise think that Jacob drove his SUV down the highway to the land of Pharaoh.

An old cheerleading injury leads me to think that the Torah is calling our attention to an issue that is not entirely resolved in this week's parshah, Vayishlach.

Just before Jacob encounters his brother Esau for the first time in 20 years, he wrestles with an angel. In this famous bout, Jacob suffers the first-recorded instance of a sports injury. The angel dislocates his hip.

After Jacob departs from Esau, we learn that he arrived "whole" in the city of Shechem. Rashi believes this description indicates that Jacob was cured of his limp. I have my doubts, though.

Twenty-five years ago when the human pyramid on which I was standing went down, I dislocated my hip. The doctor put it back together, but it still clicks and twinges every once in a while. There is no way I could walk from Israel to Egypt, no matter how excited I might be to see my child again.

I think that the Torah informs us that Jacob travelled in wagons to hint that injuries sometimes never entirely heal. Often we will carry with us our wounds, physical and emotional, for a very long time.

Nonetheless, like Jacob, we persevere. Hopefully, also like Jacob, we will journey with joy despite our aches and pains. ■

Norene Gilletz first recipient of Gil Marks memorial award

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A lot people retire when they turn 65. Many others slacken the pace of their lives when they're in their 70s. But at age 75, Norene Gilletz shows no signs of slowing down.

Indeed, Gilletz, a CJN food columnist, a food consultant and author of 11 kosher cookbooks, has had quite a busy year.

She edited three new cookbooks, she launched many new products for her line of kosher food, and last week she became the first recipient of the Gil Marks Memorial Award. She was honoured at KosherFeast, a pre-event for KosherFest 2015, which took place in Secaucus, N.J.

"I was shocked when they announced my name," Gilletz recounted. "I was speechless. What an honour.

"The best part is being a Canadian and being recognized by the international culinary community."

Gil Marks – he died of cancer last year – was a very special person and a "dear friend," she said. "He was an amazing human being. He was a rabbi, a scholar, and an award-winning kosher food author."

Gilletz said that for the award, leaders in the kosher cooking world were asked to nominate a respected culinary professional who is a mentor and a support for others in the field.

Her role as a mentor was very apparent when she edited The Silver Platter. Wholesome, Family-Friendly Recipes from the Kitchen of Daniella Silver, an international bestseller published in May.

Gilletz coached Silver for months. "I taught her the art of writing a recipe so other people could follow."

Gilletz also edited A Ta'am to Remember: Recipes and Recollections from the Terraces of Baycrest, a community cookbook to be released this month.

Elaine Kaplan, the project manager, said that without Gilletz's leadership there would not have been a cookbook.

As well, Gilletz edited Vegan-Up, an international cookbook that will be also be released later this year.

Norene Gilletz Kitchen, her kosher food line, expanded the number of products considerably this year. Her soups, meatballs, tapenades, salads and Koogletz can now be found in the kosher section of Sobey's at Clark and Hilda avenues, and selected kosher stores. "I tell people, if you want to cook, buy my cookbooks. If don't want to cook you can just buy my products," she said with a laugh.

She, Yehuda Goldberg and Mona Pasternak, her partners in the food-line venture, were recently featured on Food Factory Canada, a television show on Food Network Canada. "It was huge fun," said Gilletz. "It was seven hours of shooting for six minutes of tape."

Norene Gilletz

> The best part is being a Canadian and being recognized by the international culinary community

She also has a large following on Facebook. "We have 5,000 friends on Norene's Kitchen and counting. I always joke, 'My kitchen is crowded, but there's always room for more.'"

Her writing career began with Second Helpings Please! She was the editor of this best selling kosher cookbook, which was published in 1968 by B'nai Brith Women in Montreal. "It all started at a tea membership," she recalled. "Our baking was so delicious someone suggested we write a cookbook."

Eleven cookbooks, hundreds of food columns and countless food demonstrations later, Gilletz is still very much on the go.

In fact, this interview was conducted, while she was en route to Ottawa for the Health and Wellness Conference sponsored by the Jewish Youth Library. She was the keynote speaker.

Last month, she led an interactive challah bake with 400 people in Winnipeg and then two weeks later she and Silver were part of the authors corner at KosherFest.

"It's a crazy pace," Gilletz admitted. "I decompress on Shabbas at shul."

She has already embarked on two new culinary projects. She is editing recipes for The Silver Platter 2 and she's working with Dr. Edward Wein, a biochemist, on recipes to help reduce the risk of dementia.

"I love what I do, there's always something new on the horizon," she mused. "Why should I slow down when I'm having so much fun?"■

Maya Halevy: 'science culture' binds us together

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Maya Halevy, director of the Bloomfield Science Museum Jerusalem for the past 20 years, has used her background as an architect and town planner together with her museology studies to help develop the science centre into an institution that promotes science culture and education in Israel.

During a recent interview with The CJN in advance of her visit to Montreal for the Association for Science and Technology Centres conference, as well as making time to visit science centres in Ottawa and Toronto, Halevy said that even in spite of the current wave of terror in Israel, she is focused on promoting science culture in the Middle East, "as we believe that with better education and better science and technology, people can see the benefit of co-operation."

Maya Halevy believes in promoting science education for all Israelis.

Can you tell me about your museum and its role in Israeli society?

The museum was established in its permanent place in 1992, but it was started as a pilot project in the Hebrew University of Jerusalem by Prof. Peter Hillman. He thought the idea of building interactive exhibits in museums would be a good idea.

I joined Peter Hillman in 1983, and we started together to realize what a science centre is in Israel. There are a lot in common in science centres in the approach, but still, you want to have it with local flavour, with local answers to the local needs.

The Jerusalem Foundation was very interested in the idea of building a science museum in Jerusalem, as they saw the potential of bringing science to the citizens of Jerusalem, bringing science to the children of Jerusalem, to the families.

From Day 1, we are really operating under joint auspices of two organizations; Hebrew University and the Jerusalem Foundation.

We see that we are helping young scientists, young researchers, young engineers, students who are working here as guides, or people with science-based careers. What they learn here while they are working as guides is to be better communicators of science. We see both sides.

Why is it important to promote science as part of the culture?

Our idea is that we would very much like to promote science education, we would very much like to develop a culture of science, because sometimes people don't look at science as part of their culture, and we believe that it is part of every citizen of the 21st century. We want to advance science among all communities. That is why we are working very hard to engage all communities of Israel, including the Jewish population, the Arab population, the secular and the religious. This is a kind of hub for people to meet around science and technology. We believe that science and technology is our common language, and if we believe that people share the same value when we speak about science and technology and when we speak about educating the future of young kids, we see this as a kind of common ground for working together, for meeting, for engaging.

We did an interesting project for a few years with the European Union, with 10 European countries, that we called "Engineers." It was about how to promote engineering into science lessons in elementary schools. I can tell you it was a great success in Israel, especially. The Ministry of Education decided to adopt the program that we developed, and it is now part of the curriculum in all elementary schools in Israel. So this is a way that the science museum can influence and make an impact.

> Young people are born as scientists and researchers and have a lot of curiosity and somehow they lose it while they are in school.

In what ways does the museum work to reach its goals?

We also work as a lab, because we are developing our own exhibits. We have a very professional workshop with many professionals from different disciplines – engineers, scientists, educators, people with social science and humanities backgrounds, and designers. We are all working together.

This is a lab for developing new exhibits and new tools to present science education, principles and phenomena. It is also a lab to develop new programs, new activities. So I can tell you that our main tool now is that we are trying to introduce – and we've already started to do it with a lot of success – a new approach to science, education and science culture.

This is called the "makers approach." Makers are people who we used to call do-it-yourself people. They used to do things with their hands. We looked at them as hobbyists. Today, makers are spread all over. It's a kind of new movement of people using tools and ideas, and they share them. Because technology is very accessible, because it is easy to do things with all the electronic devices, and it is very easy to share, there is a big wave of new approaches to people as innovators and entrepreneurs who call themselves makers.

We realize that this is a good approach for science education. It makes people engage in science education. We always say that young people are born as scientists and researchers and have a lot of curiosity and somehow, they lose it while they are in school.

We always try to understand why they lose it. We think they lose it because it's not very relevant to them, and because they don't see the challenge. Sometimes, you're finding the answer to a question that the teacher already knows the answer. So you don't feel like an explorer. And we want to very much to bring back the exploration spirit and the problem-solving process, and the ability to be engaged in it.

What are your ambitions for the museum's role in Israel?

We used to say that science museums are a nice place to visit, but today science museums have an important role in changing science education as an informal institution, because more and more we realize that informal learning is very important.

They can help to engage citizens with very interesting scientific discussions, especially when it comes to ethics, social responsibility. We want citizens to be engaged. We want citizens to know more when they need to make decisions. There are always questions, like the way the city makes water or getting renewable energy. Those kinds of issues, every person needs to understand them in order to make their own decisions. It's not just scientists or engineers who can take responsibility for us. ■

Symbolic language key to opening the vault of meaning

Backstory

PAUL SOCKEN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

You cannot simply "read" Jewish source texts. In order to understand them, you need to know how to interpret their unique language.

Reading their English translation only gets through one layer of meaning. There are other layers. The authors of the Bible, prophets, megillot and Talmud wrote in imagery, poetic expressions and symbolism that need to be clarified in order for them to reveal their profound meaning.

In Why Read Talmud in the Twenty-First Century, a collection of essays I edited, Jeffrey Rubenstein analyzes a brief story from the Talmud:

A man is removing rocks from his field and putting them into the public domain when a Chassid asks angrily why he is removing rocks from a domain that does not belong to him and putting them into his own domain. Some time later, the man sells the field and stumbles on the same stones while walking. "That Chassid spoke well to me," he says.

This is a peculiar tale. The man was removing stones from his own property and throwing them into the public domain, but the Chassid rebuked him for doing the opposite. We do not understand the significance of the event until the end of the story, when the man trips. What was his property no longer is, and the public property is filled with stones. In the final analysis, acting selfishly caused the man's fall.

The story highlights the fact that people often feel a sense of entitlement and act in their own best interest, but concludes with the message that nothing is ever certain and circumstances change. We are all vulnerable. If we cling stubbornly to what is ours with no respect for what belongs to others – the "public square" – then we lose perspective and cannot understand the concept of the greater good. The story illustrates how what belongs to all is what is most valuable and endures.

The famous scene in the Bible with the talking donkey is another example of how stories are illuminated through explication. In the story, the fearful king of Moab, Balak, hires a revered, pagan prophet, Balaam, to curse the Israelites and ensure their destruction. As the events unfold, Balaam fails to see an angel sent by God wielding a sword in front of him, but the donkey he is riding does, and refuses to move. Balaam strikes the donkey repeatedly before the donkey rebukes him and proclaims his innocence.

> We are not used to struggling with a profound text and persevering until it yields its meaning

Why does the shrewd and cunning Balaam not see what the simple donkey sees?

Balaam is on a mission that he knows is wrong. Although he had been told by God not to curse the Israelites, he is seduced by greed and glory. He is frustrated at being unable to circumvent God's command, in spite of repeated efforts. The story is not really about a donkey and an angel, but about moral blindness in the pursuit of evil deeds.

In each of these two cases, we witness a different kind of blindness. The man removing the stones does not foresee that neglecting the public good and focusing only on what he perceives to be his best interests will backfire and cause him harm. Balaam's overwhelming desire for money and glory leads a renowned man to subvert God's direct command. As in text, so in life. We are guilty of not seeing what is before our eyes, and even when we do, we often do not know how to interpret and understand it. These stories teach us to open our eyes.

For Jewish source texts to resonate with us today, we must understand that symbolic language is the key to opening the vault of meaning. It is easy for skeptics to dismiss texts they have not fully understood because they have read them only superficially. We are not used to struggling with a profound text and persevering until it yields its meaning. But the rewards for those who do are enormous. These stories help us gain perspective and a deeper insight into life, and assist in developing ethical and spiritual character. You don't read any serious text, you study it. ■

Doo Doo's heroics were no joke, and 'offensive' subway promotion removed

He wasn't clowning around

Thornhill Ont.'s Doo Doo the Clown, a.k.a. Shane Farberman, became a global sensation after rescuing two women who were being harassed by a 25-year-old man who police said was high on crystal meth. While driving home in full makeup Nov. 22, Farberman saw a man jumping on cars near Bathurst and Front streets in Toronto and called 911. After the man hit the women, Farberman urged them to jump into his SUV, joining two clowns who work for him. The incident was captured on dashcam video that went viral. The 32-year clowning veteran received a bravery award from Toronto City Coun. Norm Kelly.

Amazon pulls ads with Nazi imagery

Amazon pulled Nazi-symbol-laden ads for its new The Man in the High Castle streaming TV show from a busy New York subway line after requests by New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo and Mayor Bill Blasio. The ads featuring modified Nazi eagles and wartime Japanese flags were removed from the 42nd Street shuttle after causing a stir Nov. 24. The series, based on a 1962 novel by Philip K. Dick, depicts an alternate history in which the Nazis and Japan won World War II and partitioned the United States. Jewish groups criticized the promotion, and Blasio said it was "irresponsible and offensive."

Israeli exec says Avis turned him away

A vice-president of Teva pharmaceuticals accused Avis of declining to accept his Israeli documents when he tried to rent a car Nov. 20. Dov Bergwerk said an agent at Avis' Manhattan branch told him it was policy not to recognize Israeli documents, and the manager sided with the employee. But Bergwerk says he has rented from Avis many times, including two days earlier at the same location, and has an Avis loyalty card. Avis head office confirmed his documents were OK, but the manager said she wouldn't rent to him because he argued with her. In a Nov. 22 statement, Avis said it doesn't tolerate discrimination, but added an "investigation suggests that this customer is unfairly maligning us with unfounded accusations." ■

Education always on agenda

In the article, "CIJA renews effort to alleviate school funding," (Nov. 19), Mordechai Ben-Dat, co-founder of Grassroots for Affordable Jewish Education, is quoted as saying, that he is "encouraged the organized Jewish community is putting affordability back on the agenda." While we share his enthusiasm about all of our collective efforts, and we look forward to working with him and the many committed individuals and organizations who comprise the task force, it is important to note that affordable Jewish education has always remained central to the agendas of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Affordable Jewish education is of paramount importance to both organizations and a core mandate of UJA Federation's Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education. What we are currently undertaking, in partnership with the Toronto and Ottawa Jewish federations, is an approach that will bring together all of our vibrant community's varied initiatives with a unified focus on securing additional support for our schools, and their constituent parent and student bodies.

Swimming in the right pool

Columnist Bernie Farber, post-election, still remains upset at the Canadian Jewish community's partisan support of Stephen Harper ("Learning the lessons of political partisanship," Nov. 19).

He believes that "the first lesson of government relations was to swim in all political pools."

Left-wing ideologues fail to realize that the Jewish community and so many others recognize these as, yes, "political pools" which pale in significance to the "pool" of honesty and moral fortitude.

Sam Mitnick

Rabbis must lead by example

In his column reflecting upon the decision of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College (RRC) to admit students with non-Jewish spouses or partners, Rabbi Dow Marmur correctly points out that "Clergy don't reflect their congregations. Clergy lead their congregations" (Rabbis must lead, not follow," Nov. 12).

This decision by the RRC certainly doesn't represent the feelings of all rabbis and members of this branch of Judaism, many of whom have been outspoken in their disagreement.

As a longstanding member of Toronto's Reconstructionist Congregation Darchei Noam, I can vouch for the fact that we have always been welcoming to intermarried families, many of whom have been very active in all facets of life in our Jewish community.

However, the rabbi is not just one of us. The rabbi must lead by example. If we believe in the continuity of the Jewish People, we cannot allow ourselves to water down what is the principal leadership role in the Jewish community.

Canada as an 'honest broker'

How well will Justin Trudeau's government handle foreign policy issues your question of the week asks (Nov. 19). No doubt decidedly better than Canada's previous government.

Regarding Israel, few actually know Canada's longstanding policy on key issues in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Look at the official website of the Department of Foreign Affairs, Trade and Development. It's reasonably balanced, fulfilling Canada's proper role as an "honest broker." Our previous government disregarded it, focusing instead on one-sided actions.

Chanukah's branding problem

The holiday is supposed to be about overcoming assimilationist tendencies, but the rampant commercialism of the December season dilutes the message

RABBI AVI FINEGOLD
FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LIBRARY, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Scheim: There is no shortage of insights – spiritual, historical, and otherwise – to be derived from Chanukah. The joyous holiday's theme of Jewish religious survival in the face of rampant assimilationist pressures reassures us in these modern times that unsettling demographic trends can be overcome.

However, it is an easy-to-miss aspect of the Chanukah ritual that may convey one of the most important messages of the holiday today. After lighting the candles, we recite Hanerot Halalu – "These lights… are holy and we are not permitted to make any practical use of them, other than look at them." This restriction stands in harsh contrast to the commercialism of the December season.

Are we able, in this value-driven world, to stand back, look at the Chanukah lights, and derive nothing in return other than a quiet moment of inspiration?

Rabbi Finegold: You touch on a sore spot of mine. Every year, the commercialism of the season hits me harder, though I have learned to bite my tongue lest I be considered the Chanukah Grinch. The truth is there is absolutely nothing in the Chanukah story that leads one to gift-giving. Even the idea of Chanukah gelt and its association with the dreidel has fallen prey to historical research.

This is especially hard now that I have young children who expect to receive gifts and gelt. Not to worry, though – while I refuse to buy into the commercialism, my wife and all the kids' grandparents are more than happy to indulge them.

I like to point out that the Chanukah victory is one of overcoming assimilationist tendencies within our society. As modern Jews, we need to remember that integration does not have to equal assimilation, and that while we have a requirement to publicize the mitzvah, there is a strong component of family woven into the lighting of candles at home.

Perhaps we could take the outsize exposure that Chanukah receives and use it to our advantage. Perhaps a nicely crafted message that emphasizes the message of the holidays and a reminder of what the candles represent might bring the emphasis back to the mitzvah of Chanukah.

Rabbi Scheim: The major controversy so far this pre-winter holiday season has been Starbucks' decision to remove Christmas imagery from its festive cups. People are up in arms (Donald Trump among them!). And yet none of the complainers seem troubled by the transformation of the most significant Christian holiday of the year into a shopping frenzy.

This may enable us to separate ourselves from the seasonal commercial trends and to tout our differences, emphasizing, as you suggest, the values of family and faith preservation in the face of profoundly challenging odds (while enjoying tasty treats at the same time).

Allowing Chanukah to be seen as the Jewish alternative to Christmas represents a lost opportunity of colossal proportions. Rather, Chanukah should remain as our sages intended – a paradigm of Jewish historical and spiritual resilience, and testimony for our uncanny ability to find and to preserve light even in the darkest of places.

Rabbi Finegold: The issue, as you articulate it, seems to be purely one of proximity. If only Chanukah had a different place in the calendar, we would be able to give it its own identity. I would add that the relatively late addition to the calendar also didn't do Chanukah any favours in defining itself. To use current language, Chanukah seems to have a branding problem.

While I am not an expert in the field, I would recommend that as rabbis we take a two-pronged approach. First, we should differentiate between Christmas, which has a gift-giving component integral to its identity (because of the gifts that the Magi brought to Bethlehem), and Chanukah, which does not. Then we begin to emphasize the "paradigm of historical and spiritual resilience" and tie the identity of the holiday to our own identity.

The joke goes that all Jewish holidays can be summed up by the line "They tried to kill us, we won, let's eat." To me, that punchline seems to point to something profound: we celebrate our resilience by sharing a meal with friends – not by participating in a commercial buying spree and outdoing each other with how much we can spend. ■

The honest broker the UN desperately needs

In early November, less than three weeks after the Liberal party won a majority in the federal election, newly appointed Canadian Foreign Minister Stéphane Dion was quoted as saying that the Trudeau government would assume the role of "honest broker" in the Middle East. As The CJN reported at the time, it was unclear whether Dion was cited correctly, but that did not stop many in the Jewish community from worrying that Justin Trudeau's Liberals would abandon the strong support for Israel adopted by the Stephen Harper government that preceded it.

Now, perhaps we have some more clarity on the matter.

Last week, the United Nations General Assembly adopted six non-binding resolutions against Israel. As Ron Csillag reports in this week's CJN, Canada voted against all of them (see page 12).

The latest UN resolutions cover the usual gamut of perceived Israeli abuses, and express a one-sided view of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Among the resolutions are calls for continued "efforts to promote the realization of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to self-determination, to support the achievement without delay of an end to the Israeli occupation that began in 1967 and of the two-state solution on the basis of the pre-1967 borders," an expression of "grave concern about the extremely detrimental impact of Israeli settlement policies, decisions and activities in the occupied Palestinian territory, including east Jerusalem," and a reiteration of the UN's determination that "any actions taken by Israel, the occupying power, to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on the Holy City of Jerusalem are illegal and therefore null and void and have no validity whatsoever, and [it] calls upon Israel to immediately cease all such illegal and unilateral measures."

As the monitoring organization UN Watch noted, there were no resolutions directed against serial human rights abusers like China, Cuba, Saudi Arabia and Venezuela. Islamic State (ISIS) wasn't mentioned. Neither were Palestinian terrorists.

Israel, meanwhile, was also censured for its "continued occupation of the Syrian Golan and its de facto annexation," which "constitute a stumbling block in the way of achieving a just, comprehensive and lasting peace in the region." If you assumed the United Nations' concern when it comes to Syria would be on the bloody civil war that has killed hundreds of thousands, displaced many more and threatens to engulf the world in an even more ferocious conflict, well, you just don't know how the UN operates.

In other words, the latest resolutions against Israel should come as no surprise. This is one of those biases that Israel and its supporters assume, if not accept, is inevitable. And while groups like UN Watch do well to report on the UN's Israel infatuation, few believe the situation can or will change anytime soon.

Even so, the fact that the Trudeau Liberals took a stand against these six resolutions might at least allay the concerns of some Jewish Canadians. In these early days, it appears Canada's new leadership will continue to publicly support the Jewish state, as the Harper Conservatives did. That's encouraging news, not least because the UN is in desperate need of a true honest broker when it comes to Israel. ■ — YONI

ESSAY

Combatting discrimination in all its forms

Joel Reitman

As Parliament returns this week, our community should be encouraged by the constructive relationships we have with the major federal political parties. The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs' (CIJA) non-partisan approach is appreciated by the Liberals, the Conservatives, and the NDP.

As the vice chair of CIJA's national board, co-chair of CIJA GTA, past chair of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC), and someone who has been active in politics for years, I have a unique view on how our non-partisan approach to advocacy enables us to advance the public policy interests of the organized Jewish community.

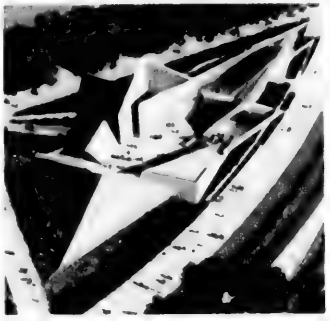
Cross-party relationships, nurtured over decades, have helped CIJA achieve important outcomes. For example, in the last Parliament, CIJA and our partners built unanimous, all-party support to change Canadian foreign policy to reflect the experience of Jewish refugees from the Middle East and North Africa. Canada is the first country outside of Israel to acknowledge, through a formal decision of cabinet, the plight of the nearly one million Jews who were forced to flee their homes after the creation of the Jewish state.

For years, our community was troubled that Canada was the only G7 nation without a memorial to the victims of the Shoah in its capital. Next autumn, after years of effort, that will change when the National Holocaust Monument is unveiled in Ottawa. CIJA is honoured to have continued the work of the Canada Israel Committee and Canadian Jewish Congress, and partnered with government and community members across Canada to create a striking memorial to the victims of this most egregious incarnation of anti-Semitism.

We combat discrimination in all its forms. As a member of the Canadian Coalition for Genetic Fairness, CIJA is advocating for the prohibition of genetic discrimination. This is particularly relevant for Jewish women because the BRCA genetic markers that indicate an elevated risk for breast and ovarian cancers are disproportionately prevalent among Ashkenazim, making genetic testing a very important diagnostic tool for our community. The Liberals, Conservatives and NDP all affirmed their commitment to banning genetic discrimination during an election debate hosted by CIJA and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. We will continue working with all parties to see this campaign pledge become enshrined in law. We will also work with all parties at the provincial level to ensure that Canadians are protected from genetic discrimination in jurisdictions across the country.

Because these issues span the federal-provincial divide, so, too, do our relationships. In Ontario, specifically, we were pleased when Premier Kathleen Wynne announced her upcoming mission to Israel at CIJA's 2015 Words and Deeds dinner, building on her government's pledge to establish a trade office in Israel. This commitment to promote bilateral ties is particularly important as the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement takes hold in Europe.

Regarding BDS, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has repeatedly spoken out on the issue in support of Israel's fundamental rights. When the prime minister reached out to CIJA leadership immediately following the election, he reiterated that his government would maintain Canadian support for Israel. We applauded the government last week when our diplomats walked the talk at the United Nations. The federal government is working closely with our community and has kept its pledge, maintaining Canada's principled opposition to the annual barrage of resolutions at the UN General Assembly that single out Israel for one-sided condemnation, one of only eight countries out of 193 to do so.



The National Holocaust Monument in Ottawa is to be unveiled next autumn.

There is, perhaps, no better example than Bill C-51 of how our relationships are allowing us to participate in consequential policy debates. Because the Jewish community is an at-risk group, CIJA is active in the discussion around the contentious anti-terrorism bill that became law during the last Parliament. Like the Liberals, we supported the bill with caveats. As a result of our just, thoughtful, non-partisan position, our intervention was welcomed by all three parties.

Our views were reflected in the Liberal party's orientation toward the bill and our House of Commons testimony was quoted, alongside the testimony of other experts testifying on the bill, in a government release. Even the NDP, which voted against the legislation, offered praise, most notably for our proposal that the chair of the security intelligence review committee be designated an officer of Parliament.

When Trudeau phoned CIJA leadership, C-51 was an important part of the discussion. The prime minister affirmed his close, longstanding relationship with CIJA and the organized Jewish community. He indicated that he wanted our meaningful and mutually beneficial relationship to continue, on C-51 and the wide array of issues on our community's public policy agenda.

From working with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to reduce the cost of Jewish education, to community security, to combating discrimination, and to the myriad other issues on our list of priorities, CIJA is deeply committed to improving the quality of Jewish life across Canada. Our work is possible because of relationships. As we welcome the new Parliament, we invite you to start a relationship with us, learn about our work, take our community survey, or just tell us how you feel. Together we can make a difference. ■

Back in September, the Conference Board of Canada took a look at the economy of Calgary and didn't like what it saw.

Although the city had done quite well for the first nine months of 2014, by the end of the year, the falling price of oil was beginning to have an impact on various sectors of the economy – everything from the oil patch itself to housing starts, construction and the service industry.

The conference board's Metropolitan Outlook, which examined the economies of 13 Canadian cities, predicted Calgary's economic performance would be among the country's worst in 2015. Its unemployment rate would climb from 5.1 per cent in 2014 to 5.9 per cent this year, and to 6.1 per cent in 2016.

Economic growth was expected to plunge from 5.1 per cent in 2014 to negative 0.5 per cent this year.

It was only a matter of time for the effects to be felt by the city's Jewish population, which numbers around 8,500. Early into the oil recession, there wasn't much to report in terms of changes to community fundraising or a draw on community resources. But that has changed in recent months, though not to crisis proportions, said Judy Shapiro, associate executive director of the Calgary Jewish Federation and Marty Hornstein, executive director of Jewish Family Service Calgary (JFSC).

Still, for those who've lost their jobs because of the economic downturn, the situation is grave, even embarrassing. A number of people who were asked to comment for this story declined to do so.

Some who have been brought low by the changing economic circumstances are lawyers and engineers who had done well for themselves – to the extent they had been spending $40,000 a year to send their children to university. Now, they're facing the prospect of having to scale back their lifestyles. Some who had moved to the province, have left. But "a lot are sticking around to see what will happen," Hornstein said.

This isn't Hornstein's first rodeo, riding the ups and downs of an oil patch recession. It happened in the 1980s and again in the 1990s, he said.

"This time it's different, because more people have businesses related to the success of the city," he said.

Many of those who had moved to Alberta, not necessarily to work in the petroleum industry, but to participate in the economic boom prompted by high oil prices, are suffering. Jobs aren't coming back anytime soon, and they are facing difficult decisions.

"We're counselling people who live in their homes, that have sentimental values, that they can't afford to live there anymore," Hornstein said.

Still, for many people, that's tough advice to take.

"They're going through a death-like experience," he said.

"A lot of it centres on Jewish pride – 'I don't want to let people know I have to move into an apartment,'" he added.

Community organizations have noticed the changing economic circumstances in a variety of ways. You can see it in the annual food drive, which is held on Kol Nidrei night. Pitches are made at the city's synagogues, and "this year we got less than we've received in previous years," Hornstein said. "We got 10 per cent less than we usually get. The food goes to the side of the story that is the saddest, to people who need the food."

"Our requests from people for basic needs increased by 15 per cent," he said.

Something similar is happening three hours north, up Highway 2 in Edmonton, where some 5,500 Jews live.

Larry Derkach, executive director of Jewish Family Services, said "indicators of economic stress in Alberta have been striking: weekly reports of large layoffs, 23 per cent increase in food bank use over last year, another drop in oil prices. Certainly this is also having an impact on vulnerable members of the Jewish community in Edmonton, with issues [like] job loss, food insecurity, financial stress and stress on relationships. We are experiencing increased demands, but unfortunately, I cannot put numbers to that for Edmonton's Jewish community at the moment."

Lynne Preston, executive director of the Calgary Jewish Community Centre, said the effects of the oil downturn are only now beginning to be felt.

Some of the JCC's offerings haven't been affected, such as its daycare and after-school programming. But enrolment in its program for two-year-olds, geared to stay-at-home moms, has dropped by half, likely because it's seen as a luxury that people can no longer afford.

Enrolment in the JCC's summer camp was on par with that of previous years, but numbers for the mid-winter camp are down 10 to 20 per cent, she said.

"I think we're starting to feel the effects of the downturn now. A lot of layoffs hadn't yet occurred in the summer. A substantial number of layoffs took place in the last three or four months," she said.

The media's Islamaphobia obsession

Henry Srebrnik

In the days after ISIS terrorists carried out its attacks in Paris, virtually every media outlet immediately rushed to produce stories about a feared anti-Muslim backlash. For example, these two headlines appeared in the Nov. 21 edition of the Charlottetown Guardian: "Paris Muslims facing hostility after attacks" and "Don't let concern mask racism, says Ontario premier."

The media all seem in lock-step on this issue, and these sorts of stories are so ubiquitous now that you can count on one appearing the day after any terror activities related to Islamists. A visitor from Mars might get the impression that Parisians, or Torontonians, are running around bombing mosques and killing Muslims.

It all makes you wonder who decided on the "party line" to be taken by the media?

The great British economist John Maynard Keynes argued that the ideas of economists and political philosophers are more powerful than is commonly understood. "Practical men," he wrote, "who believe themselves to be quite exempt from any intellectual influences, are usually slaves of some defunct economist."

And so it is with journalists. They have become intellectual prisoners of those academic ideologues they studied in university. Theorists such as the immensely influential literary theorist Edward Said believed western populations are innately racist, xenophobic and bigoted against those he called non-western "others." His acolytes believe that such negative attitudes now manifest themselves after every atrocity. They also contend that the perpetrators are mainly disturbed criminals, the products of poverty, unemployment and alienation, and not of religious fanaticism.

In other words, the reaction to terrorism is mainly "Islamophobia," and has little to do with well-founded fear.

This term is, by the way, a very effective means of putting critics on the defensive, by portraying them as hysterics. But the word "phobia" describes irrational fears. One may suffer from a phobia regarding moths, but to fear potential terrorists is a different matter altogether.

Of course, I'm not speaking about those who assign collective guilt to all Muslims and Islam. One can differentiate between such odious people and those who have genuine concerns. After all, does anyone assume that opposing Nazism meant condemning all Germans?

The frustration felt by many who chafe at this political correctness and self-imposed censorship has led to the explosion of blogs. They have become the modern Internet version of the samizdat, the clandestinely printed material that circulated in the old Communist states.

These self-published works include analyses of political events and often suggest alternatives to the government's handling of issues. Their proliferation today tells us something about our "official" media.

Ever since politicized radical Islam came to the fore in the 1970s, intellectuals on the left have lionized it as a new form of anti-capitalist "liberation." In 1978, Michel Foucault, an academic god in most university humanities departments, travelled to Tehran, then in the midst of revolution against the Shah.

"It is perhaps the first great insurrection against global systems," wrote Foucault of Avatollah Khomeini's rise, "the form of revolt that is the most modern and the most insane."

As the noted political philosopher Michael Walzer wrote recently in the American social democratic journal Dissent, "I frequently come across leftists who are more concerned with avoiding accusations of Islamophobia than they are with condemning Islamist zealotry."

They, he continued, "are so irrationally afraid of an irrational fear of Islam that they haven't been able to consider the very good reasons for fearing Islamist zealots and so they have difficulty explaining what's going on in the world."

Ideological hegemony does not require secret police or torture chambers to keep people in line. The media are perfectly happy to take the lead. ■

Making space for Jewish 'prosumers'

Daniel Held

Two innovations in Jewish education have recently struck a chord with me.

First, a new social startup called OneTable was created to welcome Jews to the "oldest new way to do Friday night." With the support of materials, invitations, a Shabbat coach, and an online platform, OneTable helps you – anyone – "Make connections. Make meaning. Make Shabbat dinner." OneTable Shabbat dinners are hosted by anyone – those who grew up making Shabbat and those for whom it's new – and anywhere – in homes, at friends' homes, in restaurants, outdoors, and elsewhere. The online platform helps hosts find guests and guests find hosts, and the support helps hosts craft meaningful Shabbat experiences that speak to them. In its first few months, hundreds have already participated in home-grown meals.

The second is PJ Our Way, a pilot project to extend PJ Library – which currently sends free children's books to kids aged six months to eight years – to children aged nine to 11. PJ Library's regular books are selected by a central committee of experts and mailed out, en masse, to 125,000 Jewish households each month. To my three-year-old, it doesn't matter that someone else is choosing the book. To nine-to-11-year-olds, however, it does. PJ Our Way has set up an interactive website to allow participants to choose the books that are right for them and to share their feedback with others. Through blogs, videos, and polls, kids can tell others about what they read, and make their own decisions about what to read themselves.

What strikes me about both of these initiatives – and plenty of others – is the emphasis on empowering participants as "prosumers" – to be both producers and consumers.

The term prosumer was coined as early as the 1970s, but only came into use with the development of Web 2.0 in the early 2000s. Web 1.0 is like a newspaper: information is produced by one person and consumed by others. Web 2.0 is based on user-generated content – videos posed on YouTube, tweets on Twitter, posts on Facebook and maps generated on Google Maps. A prosumer both produces and consumes content or experiences. Increasingly, young Jews are demanding the ability to play an active role as prosumers of Jewish experiences, rather than passive consumers.

Hillel has been fostering the needs of prosumers for decades. Empowering university students to create their own services and Shabbat meals, advocacy social activities, part of Hillel's success in engaging young adults has been its trend-setting work in building prosumers. Similarly, UJA's Community Connect initiative has set up the infrastructure for young adults to plan and run programs for their peers.

Unfortunately, not all of our community organizations are equipped to serve the needs of prosumers. Supplementary schools that teach a prescribed curriculum without addressing students' interests, synagogue services that are performative rather than interactive, and organizations that lack transparency and forums for participant input and direction will all fail in a market driven by prosumers.

At its core, Judaism is designed for prosumers. OneTable captures this in leveraging of Shabbat meals. Chevrutah, the traditional form of text study in which partners challenge and ask questions of each other and the text, is another prime example. And, of course, the Passover seder, during which each of us imagines ourselves as if we left Egypt, is the primary example.

To succeed in engaging the next generation of Jews, we all must return to these prosumer roots. Our institutions must redeploy themselves as engines to propel the creativity of producers who will create high-value content that will be compelling enough to be consumed. At the same time, we need more new ideas – like OpenTable and PJ Our Way – that will reinvent the landscape of Jewish engagement for a new generation. ■

Chanukah, Hanukka, Hanukkah: how's that again?

Jean M. Gerber

Time to light the menorah for C/Han/nuk/ka – and do I add an "h"? There are several ways of spelling our holiday of national liberation. Maybe those variations are telling us something. I suggest we look deeper at what seems a simple, heroic story of national liberation.

The rabbis were wary of the Hasmonean dynasty. While it began with a victory over persecution from the Syrian Greeks, descendants of the original family turned their reign into typical oriental imperial rule, scooping up nearby provinces including Edom, from whose royal family came the blood-soaked Herod.

So the rabbinic frame of the holiday emphasized a miraculous lamp burning one day's oil for eight days.

But there's more to it. Judea was hardly unaware of the Hellenistic world, having been in its orbit since before the time of Alexander The Great (c. 323 BCE). Ruled first by the Egyptian Greeks, then the Seleucids based in Syria, ordinary Judeans saw Hellenistic cities all around them and heard spoken Greek, probably picking up enough to manage in daily life. It was not the Hellenistic world itself that began the crisis, but the increasingly assimilationist Jews that birthed opposition.

There is even dissent over who threw the first punch. Was it after the ascent of Antiochus Epiphanes, but before his attempt to crush out the religious rituals of the Jews that opposition arose? Was there already armed opposition to Greek rule before the edicts? Hellenists among the Jews had bribed their way to the high priesthood, and as far as Antiochus was concerned, he had won the Judean part of his kingdom over to his ideals. Did this surprise opposition, then, give rise to his persecutions and the Maccabean revolt?

Or was it his fault? Did he begin the quarrel by summarily imposing draconian decrees against circumcision, the Temple sacrifices, Shabbat observance, etc. immediately after he ascended the throne?

In the end, the Maccabees met the enemy – and some of them were other Jews. The ruling elite had already taken on many aspects of the Hellenistic world. So why would such a fierce advocate of a unified Hellenistic kingdom as Antiochus not expect everyone to follow in their train?

Unfortunately for the Greeks, there was unrest at home, an enemy at the emperor's back, and the traditional massed Greek army tactics were useless against the raid and run tactics of the Jews.

Still, it was touch and go. The Maccabees were leading a guerrilla army against Jewish Hellenizers as well as against Greek armies. The miracle was not just that they prevailed, but that they wrested back control of the country from some of its own people! As time went on, sadly, the Hasmonean dynasty fought brother against brother, fell out with the emerging rabbinic class, and eventually lost Judea to the Romans.

Yet Judaism itself was changed by its encounter with Greeks. For instance, note the thousands of Greek words in the Mishnah, and Greek names of the rabbis. Synagogues all over Judea/Palestine are decorated with pagan iconography, such as the zodiac, and even portray God Himself. Too, synagogues themselves were built on a Greco-Roman plan. Deeper than merely decorative art (which tells its own story) modes of rabbinic argument may have been borrowed from the Greek system of debate.

In fact, the situation in Judea is much like ours today in the West. We speak the local language, not Hebrew; most of us dress like everyone else; we read the same books, listen to the same music, go to the same movies, and so on. Happily, we are free from oppressive government persecution.

I'm not raining on the parade – I love latkes and sufganiyot, too, and of course the simple tale works for the kinder. But adults should be responsive to the whole story. Give ourselves time, while the kids are opening their gifts, to probe deeper into the historical ambiguities. No matter how we spell them. ■

Islamism: extremism, not material deprivation, is the problem

Paul Michaels

A week after the Paris attacks, Doug Saunders, the Globe and Mail's international affairs columnist, raised what he called "one of the crucial questions of our age": why most immigrant communities "succeed" while a few produce "marginal, dangerous patterns" including "violent extremists."

He argued, in a lengthy feature based on a year-long international studies project, that material structural factors – economic improvement, including small business opportunities, better schooling, housing, and enhanced transportation, which currently vary almost district by district in Belgium – would create conditions for successful integration that "can avert extremism before it starts."

Ideological factors, such as extremist religious fervour and indoctrination – versions of radical Islam – played no part in Saunders' analysis. There is no reference to individuals, even when their material circumstances are favourable, making moral choices – especially extremist and violent ones.

Nor is there any account of why many immigrant communities around the world lacking such material conditions for successful integration have not turned to terrorism – a word, along with "Islamic," that Saunders avoids.

In contrast to Saunders, mere days after the Paris carnage, renowned French writer and philosopher Bernard-Henri Lévy told Globe and Mail readers in an opinion piece that it is wrong to view the assailants as marginalized.

Levy was asked in a Ha'aretz interview: "All the terrorists who have been identified were disciples of extremist Islam. To what extent should France do more to guarantee better integration of its Muslim citizens into society?"

Levy responded: "Of course the problem of integration hasn't been solved and of course it must be solved. But I'm not willing to accept the link implied by your question between it and jihadism. Those who perpetrated the attacks in France are not les misérables. They aren't people who suffered from [failed] integration. It's important to oppose this connection, this correlation, because they're mistaken."

Ha'aretz added that Levy mentioned, as examples, both Mohamed Atta, leader of the 9/11 attacks, who was not a marginalized immigrant in Germany, and former Briton "Jihadi John."

The role of religion and, particularly, religious extremism and indoctrination must be faced honestly, Levy argued. And he called upon the French government to ban imams who preach hate.

Reflecting on the Paris attacks, New York Times columnist David Brooks cited a new book by Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, Not in God's Name: Confronting Religious Violence, in which, according to Brooks, Rabbi Sacks "argues that ISIS is in fact typical of what we will see in the decades ahead. The 21st century will not be a century of secularism… It will be an age of desecularization and religious conflicts."

Religion, including Islam, is not itself inherently violent, but, as we're witnessing today with Islamists of one stripe or another, in extremist and politicized hands it can – and indeed has – become just that.

For Levy, the major religious conflict now is not between Islam and the West, but rather is a struggle within Islam itself, between what he calls the "enlightened" and the militantly radical or "fascist" visions of the faith. This "primordial opposition," as he terms it, is "the only clash of civilization that matters." And it cuts several ways: between Sunni and Shia branches, as well as between various rival Sunni factions.

While ISIS now monopolizes global attention, let's not forget that the dominant Shia power in the region, the "Islamic Republic" of Iran, is designated by the U.S. State Department as the primary state sponsor of terrorism in the world.

Iran's Lebanon-based proxy, Hezbollah, and Iran's own Revolutionary Guards' Quds Force (both listed by Canada as banned terrorist entities), have long been aiding Syrian President Bashar Assad, backed by Russia, in the slaughter of his own people. They've contributed immensely to the deaths of more than 200,000 Syrians, far exceeding ISIS' grim toll.

No wonder maverick Algerian writer Boualem Sansal predicted recently that Iran, bent on becoming the regional hegemon, will soon dominate a tormented, increasingly fractured Sunni Arab Middle East. ■

Trudeau government backs Israel at United Nations

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In the first test of its support for Israel in international forums, the new Liberal government of Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has voted against a raft of Arab-sponsored United Nations resolutions targeting the Jewish state.

The anti-Israel resolutions are non-binding and are introduced around this time every year. Most have been or will be adopted first by committees of the UN, then voted on at a plenary of the General Assembly.

Canada abstained or voted against all the measures in committee, standing with Israel, the United States and the tiny Pacific island nations of the Federated States of Micronesia, Marshall Islands, Nauru, and Palau. Canada's votes were unchanged from last year, continuing a more Israel-friendly shift at the UN that began with former Liberal prime minister Paul Martin and continued under former Conservative prime minister Stephen Harper.

On Nov. 24, the UN adopted six of the resolutions, drafted by the Palestinians and Syria. These skipped committees and went directly to a plenary of the General Assembly. Canada voted against all of them.

They included calls to "promote the realization of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to self-determination, to support the achievement without delay of an end to the Israeli occupation that began in 1967 and of the two-state solution on the basis of the pre-1967 border."

Another expressed "grave concern about the extremely detrimental impact of Israeli settlement policies, decisions and activities in the occupied Palestinian territory… including on the contiguity, integrity and viability of the territory."

One resolution noted "that any actions taken by Israel, the occupying power, to impose its laws, jurisdiction and administration on the Holy City of Jerusalem are illegal and therefore null and void and have no validity whatsoever, and calls upon Israel to immediately cease all such illegal and unilateral measures."

Another said Israel's annexation of the Golan Heights – referred to as "the Syrian Golan" – is a "stumbling block in the way of achieving a just, comprehensive and lasting peace in the region."

The Geneva-based group UN Watch "applauded" the Trudeau government for its votes and "for being on track to continue without change Canada's policy of firmly opposing repetitive, disproportionate and one-sided resolutions… that are designed to delegitimize Israel, the Middle East's only democracy."

Canada's voting record is "entirely unchanged from last year," UN Watch pointed out. "This upholds the UN Charter's principle of equal treatment of all nations, and prejudice to none."

Still, Hillel Neuer, UN Watch executive director, lashed out at the passage of the half-dozen anti-Israel resolutions.

"Surreal barely captures the scene whereby the world is under assault by terrorists killing in the name of Islam and martyrhood – as Palestinians are doing while stabbing Israeli Jews – and the UN's response is to reflexively condemn Israel in six separate resolutions, all of which are one-sided," Neuer wrote on the UN Watch website.

On the resolution that condemned Israel for retaining the Golan and demanding its return to Syria, Neuer said: "It's astonishing. At a time when the Syrian regime is massacring its own people, how can the UN call for more people to be subject to [President Bashar] Assad's rule? The timing of [the] text is morally galling and logically absurd."

The "farce" at the world body, he added, "underscores a simple fact: the UN's automatic majority has no interest in truly helping Palestinians, nor in protecting anyone's human rights. The goal of these ritual, one-sided condemnations remains the scapegoating of Israel."

UN committees recently passed 13 other resolutions, all targeting Israel. Canada abstained on two and voted no on 11. A 20th, "Assistance to the Palestinian people," will be considered later this month. The remaining motions are expected to be passed by the General Assembly by mid-December, Neuer told The CJN.

Canada's votes "speak to Prime Minister Trudeau's commitment that he's reiterated time and again that his government will continue the multi-partisan support for Israel that characterized the previous government," said Noah Shack, director of public policy at the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

One-sided anti-Israel resolutions "not only denigrate Israel but the UN itself," Shack added. Ottawa's stance this time "is bigger than just a symbolic show of support from Canada. This is a statement of support for the UN and for fairness for Israel."

Anthony Housefather (Mount Royal) and Michael Levitt (York Centre), two of six new Jewish Liberal MPs, praised their government's votes. "We are pleased to recognize that the government of Canada led by Prime Minister Trudeau has demonstrated its continued support for Israel's security, democracy, and stability by maintaining our country's UN voting record on Israel," they said in a statement Nov. 26.

"We will persist in opposing initiatives that vilify or single out Israel, including the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement," they added.

"We call upon the United Nations to stop this annual attempt to vilify and demonize Israel, and we hope this year will be the last year we need to vote on these resolutions."

The Israeli Embassy in Ottawa declined to comment on the votes, and the Department of Foreign Affairs, Trade and Development Canada did not respond to requests for comment by The CJN's deadline. ■

B'nai Brith dementia home creditors left high and dry

plungen@thecjn.ca

One Kenton Alzheimer's Centre of Excellence (One Kenton) and B'nai Brith Hillel of Toronto were declared bankrupt last week after failing to make a proposal to creditors by a court-imposed deadline of Nov. 23.

B'nai Brith Hillel was found to have liabilities of nearly $11 million, while One Kenton owed nearly $90,000, according to records from the Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy Canada.

The bankruptcies likely mean that more than two dozen of One Kenton's unsecured creditors will receive little or nothing, despite the sale of the facility last month.

At the same time, Isaac Weinroth, One Kenton's original executive director, has also been left high and dry in a separate court claim of $140,000 for unjust dismissal. His case was subject to a stay of proceedings in June after One Kenton and B'nai Brith Hillel sought court protection from creditors.

The bankruptcies are the latest developments in a series of events that have marked the decline of what had been billed as a first-class facility offering state-of-the-art care for those suffering from Alzheimer's and other forms of dementia. One Kenton opened in December 2013 to much fanfare and with a $5.4-million federal government grant to support it. It was the brainchild of former B'nai Brith Canada CEO Frank Dimant and other members of the B'nai Brith board. The facility was constructed on two plots of land at 1 and 3 Kenton Place, owned by B'nai Brith Hillel, and offered 45 beds, charging residents more than $7,500 a month.

B'nai Brith Hillel is a non-profit corporation headquartered at 15 Hove St., the same address as B'nai Brith Canada. Its officers and directors are current and former B'nai Brith Canada personnel, including Dimant, its vice-president, and Gerry Weinstein, a former B'nai Brith Canada national president, who is president of B'nai Brith Hillel.

One Kenton was never more than half full, and as of two weeks ago, it was home to only 19 people.

One Kenton sought court protection from its creditors in June, when it became clear that its debts far exceeded its income and it was rapidly running out of money.

The trustee was tasked with, in part, finding a buyer for the facility.

Two weeks ago, One Kenton was acquired by One Kenton Memory Care Limited Partnership, a new entity that will continue to operate the facility as an Alzheimer's residence. It is headed by Avi Gottlieb, the president of Avcon Construction, the company that built One Kenton and held a second mortgage on the property.

Weinroth was hired to serve as the facility's new executive director.

Gottlieb declined to reveal the purchase price, and neither Michael Mostyn, CEO of B'nai Brith Hillel, B'nai Brith Canada and One Kenton, nor Farber & Associates, the trustee overseeing the facility, responded to CJN requests for an interview.

Whether there is any money to pay Weinroth or the creditors listed in court documents remains to be seen. Two meetings of the creditors of One Kenton and B'nai Brith Hillel are set for Dec. 15.

Weinroth said he had been told by the trustee not to expect any funds.

Shlomo Assayag said he is unaware of any proposal to creditors. His company, KosherMeats2U, which provides meats, poultry, cold cuts and other items to retail and wholesale customers, is owed $1,551.56. "My understanding is that the money is gone," he said.

KosherMeats2U has continued to supply One Kenton with food, and it has been paid since June.

Jerusalem Foundation head envisions city as cultural hub

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Yohanna Arbib, the new president of the Jerusalem Foundation and a woman who has made Jewish activism a priority in her life since she was a teenager, was in Toronto last week to introduce herself to current and potential donors.

The Italian-born and raised Arbib immersed herself in Jewish leadership when she was just 16, with Keren Hayesod, Israel's central fundraising arm.

"Israel has always played a major role in my life since I was a child. My family had left Libya in 1948. They left because the situation for Jews wasn't as good as it used to be and I think throughout my family history, I realized that Israel is the centre of Jewish life and Israel is the only country that can guarantee the future of the Jewish People," Arbib told The CJN during her visit to Toronto late last month.

"Having understood that, and I'm a very passionate person, I realize that what I wanted to do in life is to be a part of the history of the Jewish People and to play my role and my part in making Israel relevant, strong, and in unifying the forces of Am Yisrael around the world."

After years of serving a number of roles in Keren Hayesod and making a name for herself as a Jewish leader, in 2009 Arbib became the youngest chair of the organization's world board of trustees.

She has held top leadership roles with other organizations including Aleh, an Israeli organization that serves the disabled, as well as the Jewish Agency for Israel, before being named as Jerusalem Foundation's president earlier this year.

Arbib, a businesswoman and philanthropist, said she is eager to leave her mark on the 50-year-old organization that has, to date, raised more than $1 billion to develop museums and film festivals, commercial development and scientific discovery, as well as promote civil society and social justice in the Old City for people of all ethnic, religious, and cultural backgrounds.

"We want to create the circumstances in Jerusalem whereby Jerusalem becomes an attractive place for tourism. Clearly culture plays a big role and the museums and the cultural centres we support as a foundation make Jerusalem an important cultural hub in Israel, but also internationally," she said.

During her two-day visit, Arbib met with donors and volunteers of the foundation's

Yohanna Arbib and Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat

Toronto chapter, and invited them to be part of the 50th anniversary celebration and campaign planned for next year.

Arbib said part of her mission is to raise awareness about the work the foundation does for Jerusalem, which, in turn, benefits Israel, and the Jewish community around the world. "We feel that the foundation has a unique role in making Jerusalem a city that is for the well-being of its citizens – to attract international tourism, to be the home and centre of Jewish life, but also to be a city of peace and serve as a model for humanity as a whole," she said.

She said the current wave of terror Israel is facing doesn't inhibit its efforts. Rather, it strengthens the mission of the foundation.

"The foundation caters to the entire population of Jerusalem, from the ultra-Orthodox, to the Arabs, to the secularists, to the religious. What we're dealing with today actually strengthens the mission of the foundation because it underlines the fact that all of the Jerusalem residents need to be given opportunities for a better life."

She said the foundation aims to cater to all of Jerusalem's diverse needs.

"Culture, together with education, with heritage, with taking care of the vulnerable and the economic instability – these are the areas where the foundation is present. Cultural institutions in times of crisis can work as a bridge to try to lead a normal life," she said.

"We see the situation... since the Paris attack, we see what is happening in Europe – in France, in Belgium, in Italy. People are very scared and they don't know how to tackle the situation. I think the resilience of the people of Jerusalem during this wave of terror, they understand how to tackle a situation of emergency, and their answer to terror is that life must go on," she said, adding that the foundation started an emergency campaign to support underprivileged youth and cultural institutions that suffer most during tense periods. ■

Rabbi seeks owner of Torah crowns he found on bus

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Rabbi Hartley Perlmutter was surprised recently when he stepped onto a TTC bus, paid his fare and began to make his way to the back of the nearly empty bus.

"As I neared the back, I noticed something metallic shining on one of the seats in the back row," Rabbi Perlmutter told The CJN.

"Intrigued, I moved closer and realized that lying on the seat was a pair of silver Torah rimonim, or crowns," added Rabbi Perlmutter, 27, who teaches at Bnei Akiva Schools.

Looking around the almost-empty bus travelling in the Wilson Avenue and Bathurst Street area, only one person sat near the rear of the vehicle. Rabbi Perlmutter lifted the rimonim to see if the passenger near the back of the bus would indicate ownership.

"But all I got was a blank look."

He said his mind began to race.

"Where were they from? Who left them here? Why were they being taken –perhaps for maintenance? Stolen? In the process of being donated? Why were they not wrapped up and protected?"

An inscription suggests the crowns are more than 100 years old.

> Where were they from? Who left them here?

After examining the rimonim, which are used to adorn Torah cases that house the Torah scrolls and the handles of Torah rollers of both Ashkenazi and Sephardi Sefer Torah scrolls, Rabbi Perlmutter realized from the inscription that they were more than 100 years old.

The markings in Hebrew script describe the circumstances under which the rimonim were originally donated.

He believes the rimonim are made of actual silver, as they are tarnished. Beyond that, he doesn't want to reveal more about the items or where and when they were found, "in order to use that information to verify that the person is telling the truth."

Recalling stories of individuals who used social media to post lost and found items on Facebook, Rabbi Perlmutter posted a picture of the rimonim and urged as many people as possible to share the post in the hope their owner would eventually see the posts.

Rabbi Perlmutter noted, "I included a caption on the post that said, 'I just found a pair of Torah Rimonim on a TTC bus. Anyone with info to help me return these to their owner would be appreciated. Please share to spread the word.'"

"To date, the post has been shared 75 times, but the owner still remains a mystery," Rabbi Perlmutter said. "So I thought The CJN could help send out the message of the lost rimonim." ■

If you have any information about the rimonim, please contact rimoniminfo@gmail.com.

Make no mistake about it, European anti-Semitism is back

Donald Carr

The latest in a long series of discriminatory actions by the European Union (EU) against Israel is the implementation of a requirement of distinguishing labels on goods and produce shipped to Europe by Israel from the disputed territories. A further distinction is to be made between those items of "Palestinian origin" and those of "Israeli origin." Such a step clearly encourages the public of all states which are part of the EU to boycott products which have an Israeli origin.

This is reminiscent of the early days of the Nazis. Placing restrictions on Jewish businesses was the forerunner of ever increasing discrimination of the Jews and the ultimate attempt to eliminate them.

As proof of the logical result of this new requirement, a Berlin department store withdrew all Israeli goods from its shelves, explaining that it would sort out what came from the territories and put the goods back after proper labelling. The store only made the decision to put all the goods back on its shelves after public pressure began to mount.

Such orders from the EU also encourage those who clamour for a boycott of all Israeli products and of any interaction with the Jewish State – the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement, whose intent is to demonize and totally isolate Israel, with the ultimate aim of wiping it out.

Based on its preoccupation with the Jewish State, the EU appears to be fast becoming very similar to the United Nations, where it is an accepted fact that there is an automatic anti-Israel vote for all resolutions presented to the General Assembly.

With so many rogue states in this world, and with the ongoing occupation of so many neighbouring lands by other states, one might reasonably ask the EU: why this outlandish concentration on Israel? Recently in the New York Times, Eugene Kontorovich pointed out that the EU continues to accept produce labelled as "Moroccan," even when it comes from West Sahara, illegally occupied by Morocco since 1975.

(It is to be noted that such distinguishing requirements, by law, cannot be employed in Ontario and Quebec. The Ontario government under former premier Bill Davis enacted the Discriminatory Business Practices Act many years ago, back when the Arab League was attempting to require certificates of origin for items shipped to Arab countries, in an effort to exclude products made in Israel. Quebec and Manitoba followed suit.)

It is true that European nations are not generally considered to have the same predilections as those states which control the General Assembly of the UN. Why then does the EU reserve separate and "special" treatment for the Jewish State?

One is inevitably drawn to the conclusion recently enunciated by at least two prominent American commentators, who belong to disparate sides of the political spectrum – syndicated columnist Charles Krauthammer and lawyer/commentator Alan Dershowitz. Both are certain we are experiencing (note, not "witnessing") the resurgence of the anti-Semitism that stalked Europe for almost 1,900 years.

History books are replete with the endless discrimination against Jews and their businesses, the pogroms as well as other pernicious assaults and slaughter. After the results of the Nazi Final Solution, with all of its barbarous torture, dehumanizing and murder of millions, were revealed, the world was shocked, and for a time it was temporarily inappropriate to demonstrate hatred of the Jews. The culmination of centuries of wanton, irrational hatred – state organized, but willingly abetted by so many citizens of occupied European countries – caused anti-Semitism to be hidden for a while. But that "while" is now over. And we Jews had better realize it.

Europe, with the exception of well-intentioned individuals and, prominently, the Czech Republic, is revisiting the elimination of Jewry, only now it is concentrated on the new scapegoat – Zionism/Israel. Spurred on by Arab and Islamist encouragement, hiding behind the condemnation of "occupation," "persecution," "withdrawal of human rights," "apartheid" and other spurious calumnies, the EU is applying a double standard, or a standard where none applies to others. It's time to face facts: Europe is re-occupying its traditional place as the breeder and feeder of anti-Semitism. Make no mistake about it. ■

Jewish-Muslim dialogue begins with a simple question

Michael Diamond

The question of Islamist terrorism has become a primary focus of late, and due to the dramatically evil manifestations of Islam's most extreme adherents, the dominant emotion pervading many of these discussions has been fear. Fear of the known, and of the unknown.

On a rational basis, the fears are justified. But much of our fear is based on ignorance of the "other," because the level of dialogue between Muslims and Jews has been limited.

The resulting ignorance of Muslim beliefs and practices is not useful for our Canadian society. Ignorance begets fear. Fear can lead to behaviour that may simply create a self-fulfilling prophesy. If we behave as if we expect every member of a particular group to be an extremist, then we create conditions that increase the likelihood of that taking place.

Reduction of ignorance requires learning. That in turn suggests that we look for opportunities for dialogue. There are nascent organizations working to do just that. Recently, Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto hosted an evening of Muslim-Jewish dialogue with the catchy title "We Refuse to be Enemies." To have such dialogue can only help us to understand the "other." And if what we learn turns out to be that much less problematic than that which generates our fears, then ignorance reduces and fear subsides.

Of course the reverse is also true: if we learn that the naysayers are indeed correct, and that there are Islamist cells in Canada, ready to be awoken, and that there are imams preaching hatred and violence in our neighbourhoods, then our fears would justifiably increase. Either way, knowledge through dialogue and other forms of learning is the pathway.

Yet, I wonder whether there should be certain conditions that accompany such dialogue. I believe there is a core question that should be asked and answered in any case of public dialogue between Jews and Muslims. Namely, does the individual who intends to participate in the dialogue with us accept Israel's right to exist as a nation among other nations?

If the answer to what ought to be a relatively innocuous question is yes, then there is a basis to have a useful dialogue, because the individuals in question have clearly accepted our legitimacy as a people by accepting the legitimacy of Israel.

But if the answer is no, then the dialogue may be counter-productive.

After all, while dialogue can generate knowledge, it is also meant as a way to build a relationship that can foster greater understanding between peoples. If one does not accept the legitimacy of the other, then there is no relationship to be had.

We Jews are only too quick to accommodate the other in order to be accepted, perhaps because we are such a small group and because millennia of abuse at the hands of others have left us constantly looking over our collective shoulders. However, it is in that willingness to over-accommodate that we often weaken ourselves.

On the other hand, if we set up preconditions to dialogue, we cannot begin to break down the barriers that the dialogue is intended to eliminate. It is indeed a conundrum.

We need to draw the line somewhere and avoid unconditional dialogue. And I think we are entitled, perhaps obligated, to ask about Israel's right to exist so that we know what and who we are dealing with, particular where the dialogue is a part of a public event.

The same question might also be asked in private relationships and discussions. Shouldn't you, as a Jew who values your people, and sees Israel as a core piece of the Jewish puzzle, want to know the answer to this core question from those non-Jews with whom you interact? I would, and have asked the question. Wouldn't you? ■

Toronto-born rabbi installed at Ottawa's lone Reform shul

DIANE KOVEN
OTTAWA CORRESPONDENT

A full weekend of festivities surrounded the recent installation last month of Rabbi Rob Morais at Temple Israel, Ottawa's only Reform synagogue.

Coming to Ottawa directly from Michigan, where he served as spiritual leader of Temple Beth Israel in Jackson and as director of the Jewish children's museum in Detroit, Rabbi Morais, 47, is originally from Toronto. He has had a long association with Rabbi Steven Garten, who served Temple Israel, a congregation of about 300 member families, for 18 years and who will continue his involvement with the congregation as rabbi emeritus.

"I was blessed to have Rabbi Garten, Temple Israel's rabbi emeritus, participate in the installation service. I first got to know Rabbi Garten when he came to [Toronto's] Holy Blossom Temple the year before my bar mitzvah. Over the years, we have had many opportunities to work and study together as rabbinic colleagues. I am very grateful that as rabbi emeritus he will continue to play a vital role in the life of Temple Israel," Rabbi Morais said.

After being ordained at Hebrew Union College – Jewish Institute of Religion in 1997, Rabbi Morais worked with Rabbi Garten at Camp George, the Reform movement summer camp in Ontario, for a number of years. The Camp George connection was felt during the Nov. 13 Friday evening Kabbalat Shabbat service, attended by more than 200 congregants of all ages and led by the folk group The New Gershonites (Judy and David Gershon, and their son, Jared) who are known to many from their work at Camp George. Following a spirited, participatory, musical service, attendees enjoyed a vegetarian and dairy potluck dinner, and many stayed for an after-dinner sing-along as well.

The installation of Rabbi Morais took place during Shabbat morning services the next day. Joining Rabbi Garten in officiating were rabbis Laurence Kotok and Sharon Sobel of New York, both of whom have played important roles in Rabbi Morais' spiritual and professional development, and who shared a number of anecdotes about him. Clergy from other local congregations as well as from churches and mosques attended the installation and service as well.

Following a kiddush luncheon, an adult education panel featuring Rabbi Morais, Rabbi Garten and the two guest rabbis discussed "What it means to be a Reform Jew today."

An open house on Sunday afternoon provided an opportunity for people to meet the new rabbi. Congregants Miriam Burke and Reg Angel co-chaired the installation weekend committee.

Said Rabbi Morais, "Over the coming months and years things are going to change, but…we are not going to change just for the sake of changing." He paraphrased Pirkei Avot, the sayings of our ancestors: "The day is short, there is much work to be done; sometimes people are reluctant to volunteer but the reward is great and the one who governs the heavens is pressing us to do our best."

According to temple past president Lorne Rachlis, who served on the rabbi selection committee, "This was a wonderful weekend, full of joy, enthusiasm, optimism and spirituality. Rabbi Morais' official welcoming weekend is a good omen of good things to come for Temple Israel." ■

Post-1948 Jewish refugees ignored, community event told

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The world knows all about the estimated 600,000 Arab refugees that resulted from Israel's 1948 War of Independence.

By contrast, how many are aware that 850,000 Jews were expelled from or fled Arab lands in the Middle East and North Africa during Israel's tumultuous birth?

The need to spread that less-well-known narrative was emphasized Sunday night at Adath Israel Congregation, where about 500 people gathered to hear first-hand accounts of the Jewish exodus 67 years ago and its ongoing implications.

The program took place on the eve of the day – Nov. 30 – that an Israeli law enacted last year set aside as a national day of commemoration for Jewish refugees from Arab lands and Iran. It also fell on Nov. 29, the day in 1947 when the United Nations approved the partition plan for the Palestine Mandate and the creation of a Jewish state.

Millennia-old Jewish communities from Algeria, Tunisia, Libya, Iraq, Egypt, Yemen, Syria and other nations virtually disappeared in the ensuing hostilities of 1947-1948, the event heard, but provided the nascent Jewish state with more than half its immigration until 1951.

Of the total number of Jewish refugees, about 650,000 went to Israel, noted Sam Azoory, head of the Iraqi Jewish Association of Ontario, who put the total value of their abandoned property at $100 billion, a figure that was later revised to $300 billion. The value of property left by fleeing or expelled Arab populations in 1948, he said, is $3.9 billion.

Jewish-owned real estate left behind equalled an area four times the size of modern Israel, Azoory added.

Videotaped testimonies of Jews forced from their homes were played, and Prof. Ron Levi of the University of Toronto's Munk School of Global Affairs recalled the plight of his Egyptian-born parents who met in Israel. Ted Sokolsky, former UJA Federation of Greater Toronto CEO, made a pitch for Sephardi Voices, an organization that collects the oral testimonies of Jews displaced from North Africa, the Middle East and Iran.

The world continues to cling to the "false narrative" that 1948 produced only Arab refugees, stated keynote speaker Irwin Cotler, Canada's former justice minister and an international human rights advocate.

In 2012, Cotler proposed that the Canadian government officially recognize the plight of Jews who fled or were expelled from their homes in 1948. Following hearings, the House of Commons standing committee on foreign affairs and international development produced a 17-page report on the issue, and in March of last year, Canada accepted its recommendations, becoming only the second nation in the world after Israel to formally recognize the plight of Jewish refugees from Arab lands.

Cotler said the UN bears "express and continuing responsibility for a distorted Middle East narrative." He noted that since 1948, there have been more than 180 UN resolutions dealing with Palestinian refugees, "yet not one makes any reference to the plight of Jewish refugees."

As well, there are 10 major UN agencies spending billions on Palestinian refugees but none devoted to Jewish ones. The UN marked all of 2014, Cotler said, as a year of solidarity with the Palestinian people.

"So much for equal justice. It smacks, frankly, of UN apartheid," Cotler said to applause.

The time has come, "indeed it is long past, to restore the plight of this forgotten, forced exodus to the peace and justice narrative in the Middle East, from which it has been expunged."

In an "action plan" he proposed, Cotler called on the UN to include mention of Jewish refugees in its annual resolutions on displaced Palestinians, and to establish a document and research centre to tell "the 850,000 untold stories. These voices also have to be heard at the UN."

Cotler called on the UN Human Rights Council to address the issue of Jewish refugees and on international agencies to compensate them.

He said there is no need for a separate UN agency to deal only with Palestinian refugees. To applause, Cotler called for the transfer of the file from the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) to the UN High Commission for Refugees.

As well, Arab countries and the Arab League "must acknowledge their double aggression" in launching the 1948 war against Israel and against their Jewish citizens. "The culture of impunity that has underpinned their silence must end."

All bilateral peace talks between Israel and Palestinians and all frameworks for peace proposed by the United States or the European Union must also include mention of Jewish refugees, Cotler added.

"The exclusion and denial of the rights of Jewish refugees from Arab countries continues to prejudice authentic negotiations between the parties, and a just and lasting peace," Cotler stated.

DJ Schneeweiss, Israel's consul general in Toronto, acknowledged that this is "a story never told well, neither to ourselves or the outside world. But the more we tell it, the more impact we can have. If we don't tell it, who will?"

The program was sponsored by several Jewish organizations, including B'nai Brith Canada, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Israeli Consulate, Hillel Ontario, the Iraqi Jewish Association of Ontario and Stand With Us Canada. ■

Quebec police to head search for Nazi-looted Stern art

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

The Sûreté du Québec (SQ) is now on the hunt for Nazi-looted art.

The provincial police force has taken over the files from U.S. law enforcement on the Max Stern Art Restitution Project.

This means it will be the SQ, rather than the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, that interacts with Interpol in the ongoing worldwide search for the hundreds of artworks the late German-born Dominion Gallery owner was forced to hand over to the Nazis in the 1930s.

Clarence Epstein, director of the Concordia University-based project, said a Canadian law enforcement unit makes more sense, given that the Stern estate and its three beneficiaries – Concordia, McGill University and the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU) – are in this country.

Because of its expertise, the SQ handles art crimes investigations for all of Canada, he added.

While the Quebec force will not be investigating the whereabouts of the Stern art, it is now "the first point of contact" for other Interpol affiliates on this matter, Epstein explained.

Two officers from the SQ's economic crimes section, leader Lt. Alain Gaulin and Sgt. Alain Dumouchel, an artworks investigator, were on hand at an event held by the CFHU at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts (MMFA) on Nov. 23 to pay tribute to the project's work.

For the SQ, there is no statute of limitations on theft, unlike in Germany, where such a law continues to hamper the restitution of what are believed still to be a significant number of works from the Stern collection, Epstein said. Thanks to this protection, German private collectors and auction houses continue to generally be unco-operative in Stern estate claims.

Stern, who ran an art gallery in Düsseldorf before World War II, lost more than 400 works after the Nazis forced him out of business because he was Jewish. The final 200 were liquidated at a forced sale at Cologne's Lempertz auction house in 1937, after which Stern fled to England.

Despite his efforts, Stern himself only got back a limited number of works, thanks largely to the Canadian armed forces.

The project, which was launched in 2002, has grown into a global quest involving numerous parties in the art and legal spheres in Canada, the United States, Europe and elsewhere, Epstein stressed.

A total of 12 paintings have been recovered to date, the first in 2006. The 11th, the 1837 Scandinavian Landscape by Andreas Achenbach, was returned in 2013 to the Stern estate by an unidentified consigner after it was put up for auction in Germany.

The small, but valuable, work had remained in storage in Berlin until very recently, when the MMFA asked if it could borrow it, and it was on view at the event.

The most recently recovered is a self-portrait of the 19th-century Wilhelm von Schadow, which the City of Düsseldorf restituted last year. The painting is now on loan to the Düsseldorf City Museum, where it has been on display for several decades.

The museum, with the collaboration of Concordia, is planning for 2018 a major exhibition dedicated to Max Stern (1904-1987) and the Galerie Stern, which was founded by his father Julius.

The MMFA is also currently showing Franz Xavier Winterhalter's 19th-century masterpiece Girl From the Sabine Mountains, restituted in 2008, but only after a legal battle. Its elderly possessor, a German baroness living in Rhode Island who had inherited it from her father, went to court to keep it.

Not only did the Stern estate win the case, but the ruling set a legal precedent in the United States. A Federal Court established that art that its owners sold under duress from the Nazis is stolen property and allows law enforcement agencies to seize such property on U.S. soil.

That was how the project's database came under the purview of Homeland Security. The project, however, continues to work closely with the New York State Holocaust Claims Processing Office.

Six of the 12 recovered pieces have been sold, Epstein said, with the proceeds going back into the project, which will carry on indefinitely. Others are on loan to museums in the Netherlands and Germany.

The project's chief investigator is the high-profile Washington-based art hunter Willi Korte.

Besides seeing justice done, the project's aim is educational: raising awareness about Nazi-looted art and, more broadly, the Holocaust.

A documentary film about Nazi-plundered art, focusing on Stern's story, is now in production in Canada at the initiative of the CFHU and the project.

Directed and written by Phyllis Ellis, Stolen is to be shown around the world through Hebrew U's Vidal Sassoon International Centre for the Study of Anti-Semitism, said Sissy Federer, one of the film's executive producers.

Subtitled The Last Prisoners of War, the film will bring attention to the fact that most of the 650,000 artworks confiscated by the Nazis have not been restored to their rightful owners.

Stern was a generous benefactor of the MMFA during his lifetime, noted Iris Amizlev, curator of world cultures and intercultural programs, donating more than 50 works there, including the large Henry Moore sculpture on view at the event. ■

People are losing jobs in oil, related industries

And that could have an effect going forward. "There could be a change next summer, a softening in [camp] numbers if they continue the way they are," she predicted.

"I'm hearing a lot more stories telling of friends and family being laid off," Preston continued. "Those people are losing their jobs in the oil industry, banking, related industries, like electricians and plumbers."

"So far the impact hasn't been great, but we're only just starting to feel the effects," she added.

Hold on, said Calgary lawyer Gordon Hoffman. Things are not that bad.

"We're still fine. We're still busy," he said of his law firm.

Furthermore, there hasn't been a major impact on the Jewish community, he added. There have been some layoffs, he acknowledged, but that happens even in good times, along with bankruptcies, he said.

"It's a cyclical economy. Up and down. This is the engine of the country. We'll be busy again," he said.

Hoffman, who's held a variety of senior positions in Jewish organizations, said Albertans are coping with the situation and "there are lots of people who are busy."

"We have a great province," he said, "with charitable people and caring people."

They are stepping up to help those less fortunate than themselves. Charitable giving is up, he said.

"Sure there are concerns, but the people who have the wherewithal are standing up to fill the breach," he said.

The federation's Shapiro believes the community's major fundraising effort this year shouldn't be too affected by the oil recession.

Last year, the community raised about $2.9 million, and "it looks like we're on target to raise the same or a bit more," she said.

Meanwhile, the community's Integrated Bursary Program, which provides funds to families who need help to pay for Jewish schools, camps, youth groups and education programs, has seen a jump in requests.

"This year, we had 83 applicants, as compared to 77 last year – close to an eight per cent increase," she said.

A lot of that demand was driven by newly arrived immigrant families, many from Russia, by way of Israel. "They picked a really bad time to come to Calgary," Shapiro said.

Based on what she's hearing from friends and colleagues, there will be "a trickle down" effect from the downturn. "It is only now being felt."

With layoffs beginning in earnest in September, you can expect less spending, a drop in real estate values, less spending in the service industry and then more layoffs yet again, she said.

It's a vicious circle, but it's still fairly early in that process.

"I don't think we've seen the bottom," she said.

Hornstein said JFSC staff are seeing some of the most troubling manifestations of a slumping economy. Some of those let go from well-paying jobs are now suffering depression, anxiety and worse.

Lynne Preston

"We've seen an increase in the last few months in the incidence of domestic violence," he said.

Still, the numbers are not really high. Altogether, 12 families are seeking counseling within the JFSC system for issues including domestic violence, housing arrangements and help with the legal system.

"I told our annual meeting that our customer base is going up by 15 per cent," Hornstein said.

As for revenue to help pay for the increased demand for services, prospects don't look too good right now. Currently, JFSC receives 10 per cent of its funding from the city of Calgary, 20 per cent from the community's UJA campaign and another 20 per cent from the United Way, which is expecting to see a drop in the funds it raises.

> I'm hearing a lot more stories telling of friends and family being laid off.

The remaining 50 per cent comes from grants, foundation gifts and fundraising the agency does on its own.

"Fundraising is going to be a challenge," Hornstein said.

In Edmonton, fundraising in both the UJA and United Way campaigns "are in full swing, both being important sources for our work as well as indicators of community philanthropy in general," Derkach said.

"Last year both campaigns did well, and while concerns have been raised about the potential impact of the economy, I have not heard alarm bells yet. I believe Edmonton's economy has not been as hard hit as Calgary's, and sectors other than oil and gas are doing well.

"But even so, it is important to remember that the more vulnerable people in society – those with the lower end jobs, with no savings, with limited job and English skills, with family or health complications – are always among those who suffer first, and that includes those in our own Jewish community who come to Jewish Family Services," he said. ■

B'nai Brith has 'a moral and ethical responsibility'

But any debt accrued before that "is pretty much lost, from the last time I heard, about a week ago," Assayag told The CJN last week.

According to court documents, B'nai Brith Hillel had debts in June totalling $10.9 million. At the top of the list are secured creditors, who are paid in priority to unsecured creditors.

The Bank of Nova Scotia held a first mortgage of $8 million, of which more than $7.3 million was still owing. The bank had advanced another $500,000 in a credit facility that was implemented in June.

In addition, the trustee and its legal counsel incurred bills of around $300,000, most of which had been paid by early November.

Among the unsecured creditors of One Kenton, with claims of $250 or more are ACE INA Life Insurance, $1,017.36; Bond Securcom, $2,555.21; Dr. Ilana Horvath, $1,000; Ecolab, $2,100.95; Green House Processing & Marketing, $1,869.75; Isaac's Bakery, $1,213.90; Kosher City Plus, $413.90; KosherMeats2U, $1,551.56; R.L. Landscaping, $6,045.50; Rochelle Berg, $1,734.08; The BAMM Group, $45,251.25; Veritas Investments, $5,121.16; and Pearl Gladman, whose given address at 15 Hove St. is the same as B'nai Brith Canada's headquarters, $2,500.00.

Isaac Weinroth

B'nai Brith Hillel's creditors include B'nai Brith Canada itself, which is listed in court documents as being owed nearly $1.6 million; B'nai Brith Congregation Synagogue, $16,666.00; B'nai Brith Foundation District 11, $24,195.00; and the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith, $5,310.25.

The Canada Revenue Agency has bills outstanding of $650,000.

Weinroth is frustrated with the turn of events that has left him with a claim of $140,000 that remains unaddressed, plus substantial legal fees.

He believes that it should never have come to this and that B'nai Brith Canada has a moral and ethical responsibility to compensate him, since One Kenton was always a B'nai Brith project.

According to Weinroth, he was let go in April 2014 and was not provided sufficient severance. Attempts at mediation proved unsuccessful and he filed his claim in September 2014, well before One Kenton's court-sanctioned restructuring efforts.

Weinroth said he saw the writing on the wall when One Kenton sought court protection from creditors – he did not expect to receive what he believes is owing to him.

Nevertheless, "they have a moral and ethical responsibility to resolve my case and provide me with the severance I'm entitled to," he said.

"I should have received a severance package on April 10, at the same time I got a letter saying I was terminated…I think for an organization that claims it looks out for human rights and social advocacy, it's not leading by example," he said. ■

The battle over EU settlement labelling has just begun

RAPHAEL AHREN
JERUSALEM

The fight over the European Union's (EU) labelling for settlements goods is far from over.

On Nov. 29, Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu ordered the Foreign Ministry to reassess the organization's role in the peace process, ordering diplomats to suspend all contacts with EU institutions until that process is completed. But most European governments, unimpressed with what they see as Israeli posturing, have been readying to implement the controversial measure.

Most, but not all. While the European Commission's instructions to mark Israeli goods from outside the pre-1967 lines are mandatory for all 28 member states, at least one country has repeatedly vowed to defy them.

"We do not support that decision," Hungary's Foreign Affairs and Trade Minister Péter Szijjártó declared last month at an Israel Council on Foreign Relations event. "It is an inefficient instrument. It is irrational and does not contribute to a solution [to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict], but causes damage."

Szijjártó's statement earned him praise from Netanyahu, but raised eyebrows among EU officials. The union's ambassador to Israel, Lars Faaborg-Anderson, approached his Hungarian colleague a few days later, informing him that labelling was not a matter of choice but binding legislation for all member states.

The Hungarian ambassador, Andor Nagy, remained unfazed.

"Our ministry is currently checking what we can do. Because if it's a mandatory issue we have to fight with the Commission," he told the Times of Israel. Labelling will not be the first issue Brussels and Budapest disagree about, he added, and if necessary, Hungary will take the matter to the courts.

Szijjártó studied economics in the United States and believes that Palestinian employees would be the first to be hurt if Israeli settler companies were to move their operations to Israel proper, Nagy added.

Either way, Hungary is not backing down, the ambassador asserted. "Because we think this is not the right tool to solve the Israel-Palestinian conflict." Hungary only imports some halvah products and dates from the West Bank, and therefore affixing special labels on them would be purely symbolic, he added. "And if we are speaking about symbolic issues, we think this is not the right measure."

The organization promotes the export and sale of products from Jewish settlements in Judea and Samaria, and aims to fight BDS organizations of Israeli settlement products. HADAS PARUSH/FLASH90 PHOTO

European officials view these kind of comments mostly as grandstanding, assessing that Budapest will eventually come around and, like everybody else, implement the Commission's "Interpretative Notice on indication of origin of goods from the territories occupied by Israel since June 1967," which was published on Nov.11.

After all, they argue, the foreign ministers of all 28 member states in May 2012 decided to "fully and effectively implement existing EU legislation and the bilateral arrangements applicable to settlement products." In other words, the note the Commission sent out a few weeks ago merely gives guidance on how and what to label, but in no way creates a new rule that Budapest or any other country can choose to disregard.

That goods manufactured outside Israel's internationally recognized boundaries should not be labelled as "Made in Israel" is a European consensus, the EU insists, and the need for labels is thus not optional.

"The European Commission expects all member states to comply with EU legislation," an official in the union's delegation to Israel said.

The note itself stated that the member states themselves are responsible for enforcing the proper labelling of settlement goods and need to "ensure that penalties for infringements of provisions of Union law are effective, proportionate and dissuasive." The Commission will ensure compliance with the member states' obligations "if need be by way of infringement proceedings."

The overwhelming majority of EU states have nothing to worry about, as they intend to fully implement the labelling guidelines. Britain, Belgium and Denmark have already implemented voluntary guidelines on labelling. And in April, the foreign ministers of 16 EU states urged the union's foreign policy czar, Federica Mogherini, to advance the publication of labelling guidelines, arguing that "this is an important step in the full implementation of EU longstanding policy, in relation to the preservation of the two-state solution."

Indeed, the Times of Israel inquired in several embassies of EU member states, all of which except Hungary and Germany – indicated they plan to implement the guidelines with no ifs, ands or buts.

"We are going to implement them because we don't have a choice. The understanding that each country has the freedom to make an independent decision is false," a senior diplomat from a European country said. EU states have been obligated to label settlement goods since 2012, but most waited for instructions from the Commission, the diplomat added. "Some countries did it right away. Others waited for guidance from the EU to do it in a harmonized way."

What about Germany? Jerusalem expects Berlin – considered Israel's best friend on the continent – to defy the guidelines or at least ignore them for as long as possible. During a cabinet meeting in late November, Netanyahu said the German government "came out against product labelling." He was likely referring to a press release by the Bundestag faction of Chancellor Angela Merkel's CDU party denouncing labelling, and to vague statements attributed by a German newspaper to the country's food and agriculture minister, Christian Schmidt.

However, there are no definitive statements from government officials that indicate that Berlin opposes labelling of settlement goods. Germany is, for obvious reasons, not enthusiastically embracing a demarche that many Israelis consider anti-Semitic. Several German officials contacted for this article were extremely careful in discussing the matter, pointing to its "political sensitivity" and arguing that they simply do not want Israel's enemies to "exploit" the matter. But at the end of the day, they indicated, Germany, too, will adhere to EU legislation and start labelling.

A lesser discussed aspect of the labelling controversy is the technical matter of the EU's plan. Who labels what, when, where and how?

It is up to the member states to guarantee the correct labelling of imported goods, but "the retailer will have to ensure the products have the right indication of origin," an official in the EU's Israel embassy explained. "In practice, it might be that the producer, the exporter or the importer labels the products before or after the exports take place."

Every country has different control mechanisms in place for noting imported goods' countries of origin. Israel, knowing that technically all states are required to adhere to the EU's labelling guidelines, hopes that friendlier countries will interpret grey areas and undefined aspects of the guidelines in Israel's favour. Indeed, some countries are expected to rush to ensure settlement goods are labelled as such, while others (like Hungary or Germany) might take their time before enforcing the commission's guidelines.

Russian jet breached Israeli airspace, minister says

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

Israel's Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon confirmed last Sunday that a Russian jet had breached Israeli airspace recently, and that the matter was "immediately fixed through communications channels" that exist between the two countries.

In an interview with Israel Radio, on Nov. 29 Ya'alon was asked about claims by a senior defence official that Russian jets had penetrated Israeli airspace, and whether the IDF had a policy for responding to such overflights in light of the recent downing of a Russian jet by Turkish warplanes last week.

"I remind you that about a year ago we shot down a Syrian Sukhoi-24 plane that penetrated into our territory, and we also shot down an unmanned aerial vehicle," Ya'alon said. "When we understood that the Russians were planning to act inside Syria, we immediately met – also the prime minister – with [Russian President Vladimir] Putin, including the [Israeli] chief of staff and the assistant chief of staff...we created an open channel for co-ordination so as to prevent misunderstandings, because Russian planes are not trying to attack us and therefore it is not necessary to automatically – even if there is a mistake – to shoot them down."

Ya'alon said that there had been one breach in which a Russian plane had entered a few kilometres into Israeli territory, after which the Russians were "immediately contacted" and the plane "immediately returned to Syrian territory."

On Nov. 28, Amos Gilad, director of the political-security bureau in the Defence Ministry, said at a public event in Be'er Sheva that Russia has breached Israeli airspace more than once since it began intervening in Syria, but that the close security co-ordination between Jerusalem and Moscow had prevented any incidents like the one on the Turkish-Syrian border last week.

"Russian air force pilots at times cross into Israeli airspace. [But] thanks to the excellent security co-ordination [between Israel and Russia], which started right after the meeting between [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu and Putin [in September], and in which defined areas of operation were set, the Israel Defence Forces and the Russian military agreed on security arrangements," Gilad said.

Amos Gilad YOSSI ZAMIR/FLASH 90

Gilad also said that Syria has collapsed, a fact that Israel must internalize about its northern neighbour.

"Syria is a dead state, and Israel must understand this and prepare accordingly," Amos Gilad said. "[Syrian President Bashar] Assad's grip on the country is faltering, it is a land without rule," Gilad said, according to Army Radio.

With swathes of Syria falling into the hands of opposition forces, including jihadist groups, Assad has increasingly relied on support from allies Iran and the Lebanon-based terror group Hezbollah, both sworn enemies of Israel.

According to unconfirmed reports, Israel has attacked positions in Syria on a number of occasions, targeting primarily weapons shipments to Hezbollah in Lebanon. The IDF reportedly bombed Syrian regime and Hezbollah positions in the Qalamoun mountains late on Nov. 23.

Israel is reported to have been behind a series of air raids on Syrian territory since the Syrian civil war began in March 2011.

During his meeting with Putin in September, Netanyahu said that he told Putin in "no uncertain terms" that Israel would not tolerate Tehran's efforts to arm Israel's enemies in the region, and that Jerusalem has taken and will continue to take action against any such attempts.

"This is our right and also our duty," he said. "There were no objections to our rights and to what I said. On the contrary: there was readiness to make sure that whatever Russia's intentions for Syria, Russia will not be a partner in extreme actions by Iran against us." ■

Netanyahu meets with world leaders in Paris

JTA
PARIS

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met with several world leaders Nov. 30 at the United Nations climate change conference near Paris, including Prime Minister Justin Trudeau, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and U.S. President Barack Obama.

Netanyahu shook hands with Abbas after the group photo of the some 150 world leaders in attendance at the conference, which is being held at Le Bourget Airport just outside the French capital. Abbas and Netanyahu had been standing in the same row, with only one person between them.

It was the first time the leaders have come face to face since September 2010.

In a video of Netanyahu's meeting with Trudeau, which can be seen on YouTube, Netanyahu extols the "superb" relationship between Israel and Canada that can be made "even stronger," and invites his interlocutor to Jerusalem.

While Trudeau is noncommittal about such a visit ("when it works out," he says), he too praises the "very strong friendship and relationship between Canada and Israel."

He adds that he "looks forward" to continuing that friendship, perhaps seeking to assuage concerns in Jerusalem that his government will be less chummy toward Israel than that of his Conservative predecessor, Stephen Harper.

Netanyahu also met on the sidelines of the summit with Obama for about 10 minutes. They were joined at the end by U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry, according to reports.

He reportedly also spoke on the sidelines with French President François Hollande, German Chancellor Angela Merkel, British Prime Minister David Cameron and Britain's Prince Charles, Italian Prime Minister Matteo Renzi and, according to some reports, European Union foreign policy chief Federica Mogherini.

Netanyahu was also scheduled to have official meetings with Russian President Vladimir Putin, as well as the prime ministers of Poland, Japan, Australia, India and the Netherlands, according to the Jerusalem Post. ■

Labels on West Bank goods are mandatory, says EU

"Israel is in contact with the EU member states in order to explain our opposition to the EU labelling directive. Our position is well understood," Foreign Ministry spokesperson Emmanuel Nahshon said, refusing to further elaborate.

While the "correct" labelling of settlement goods is mandatory for all member states, the way the labels are placed is not. They could thus be large, conspicuous notices placed prominently on the product, or discreet notes hidden somewhere between the ingredients and the nutritional information on the back.

According to the EU Commission, marking products from the settlements as "Made in Israel" would be "incorrect and misleading." But while the directive suggests the formulation "product from the West Bank (Israeli settlement)," that is merely a recommendation. Each member state needs to decide how it wants to phrase the label, as long as it makes clear that the goods are not from Israel and were not made by Palestinian-owned companies in the West Bank.

Theoretically, therefore, the formulation "Proudly produced by Jews in Judea and Samaria" – the West Bank's Biblical name – would be acceptable if a member state decides that that is what the label should say. An EU official confirmed to the Times of Israel that such a label "would be fine" in any country whose government chose that particular formula for the labels.

> We think this is not the right tool to solve the Israel Palestinian conflict
> ANDOR NAGY
> Hungarian Ambassador

This won't happen, of course. But it demonstrates to what extent the implementation of the Commission's guidelines is up to the discretion of each member state. Israeli diplomats across the continent are aware of that, and they are currently busy trying to persuade their interlocutors in the various capitals to make their labeling of settlement goods as painless as possible. ■

Jewish teens convicted for killing Palestinian

JTA
JERUSALEM

Two Jewish teens were found guilty of the murder of a Palestinian teen who was burned to death in the Jerusalem forest. The verdict in the kidnapping and killing of Mohammad Abu Khdeir, 16, was handed down Nov. 30 in Jerusalem District Court

The court also found that the third defendant, Yosef Haim Ben-David, 31, of the Adam settlement in the West Bank, carried out the crimes for which he was accused, but delayed issuing a verdict due to the last-minute submission of an insanity plea.

Attorneys for Ben-David submitted a psychiatric evaluation just days ago, that calls into question whether he was responsible for his actions at the time of his crime. Ben-David has a history of mental illness, and has been under medication for his condition, the original indictment said.

Khdeir was beaten unconscious and then burned to death in the Jerusalem Forest on July 2, 2014, to avenge the kidnapping and murder of three Israeli teens the previous month, Ben-David told police at the time of his arrest.

The teens have not been identified because they were minors at the time of the crime. They will be sentenced next month. One of the teens was convicted of attempted aggravated kidnapping, aggravated assault, attempted arson, murder and abduction for the sake of murder. The other was convicted of murder and abduction for the sake of murder.

The teen's father, Hussein Abu Khdeir, called the decision to delay a verdict for Ben-David a "crime," and "utterly meaningless," according to reports. He accused the attorneys for Ben-David of "misleading the court." He has called for life sentences in prison for all three of those involved in the murder of his son. ■

Right now Israeli nerves are stretched to their limit

Sagi Melamed

On a sunny winter morning, I went to Zichron Ya'akov for a business meeting. Visiting the Zichron Ya'akov pedestrian mall is like taking a little vacation. Cute stores with fun merchandise one doesn't need… houses from the 19th century… residents and tourists speaking foreign languages… good ice-cream…

I was early for my meeting at Tishbi restaurant, so I asked the waitress if I could leave my black briefcase by our table while I went out for a stroll until the meeting. I said there was no bomb and nothing of value inside, only papers. "We're not responsible for it, but as far as I'm concerned it's OK if you leave it," she responded.

After about 10 minutes of walking around the mall, I returned to the restaurant. Even from a distance I could see there was a problem. The server was waiting for me outside the restaurant, flustered and embarrassed. "You have to take your briefcase! People here are hysterical, they already called the police! Please, take it away quickly!"

I went over to the table and picked up my briefcase. Two older women were sitting at the next table. I felt as if they had been waiting for me to turn up so they could berate the person responsible for causing their distress. One scolded me loudly: "What on earth were you doing putting your case down here and then leaving? At a stressful time like this! It's totally irresponsible!"

I apologized for the unpleasantness and explained that the server had given me permission to leave the briefcase next to the table. "In that case it's her fault!" declared one of the women, while other diners nodded in agreement. "Why did you leave a briefcase here and terrify everyone?" the hysterical woman kept asking.

I tried another tack. "Do I look dangerous to you?" I asked.

"What's that got to do with anything?" she answered. "Terrorists don't look dangerous either."

I took my briefcase and went out to continue my stroll. Five minutes later, I returned, this time accompanied by the two women with whom I was scheduled to meet. I had already warned them the other diners were liable to give me strange glances.

When the hysterical woman spotted me, she renewed her attack: "You again! Back and forth, back and forth… Maybe you're from the income tax authority!"

This was too much. "It's bad enough you thought I was a terrorist. Now you're accusing me of being a taxman?"

Right now Israeli nerves are stretched to their limit. One cannot blame that hysterical, impolite woman. When from every alley and corner Palestinians are popping up, some mere teenagers, brandishing knives to fulfil the dream of killing a Jew, one can only be rendered speechless at the intensity of the hatred and animosity behind those knives. It is equally impossible not to wonder whether we can ever live here together – and if not together, then how?

And yet, Israel has known worse times. Thugs will not break us, not with knives and not with bombs. Strain our nerves? Yes. Postpone the dream of peace for generations? Yes. But break our spirit? Never.

We must remember that ultimately, the key is not what our enemies do, but what we do. Whether the attacks and hatred will divide or unite us. To quote my friend Ram Shmueli, who, following a career as an air force pilot and senior commander, now devotes his time and charisma to building unity in Israel and strengthening the ties between its different components: "We must create a new 'national hope' in the social realm as a vital complement to national security."

So to the woman who was angry with me and yelled at me because of the briefcase: On edge – understood. Stressed to the limit – naturally. But let's avoid hysteria and try not to take out our anxieties and stresses on each other. ■

Some Jewish refugees to the U.S. really were Nazis

A look at the similarities between Syrian and wartime Jewish refugees

RON KAMPEAS
JTA WASHINGTON

Much has been written about whether Syrian refugees today bear similarities to the Jews who sought refuge from Nazi Europe.

Most Jewish organizations believe there are parallels. Then, as now, the mass exit was chaotic and precipitated a crisis in Europe. Then as now, opponents argued that the refugees would provide cover for infiltrators from among the group they were fleeing. Then, as now, the world looked to the United States for leadership. Then, as now, American popular opinion opposed allowing in the refugees.

Here are some other facts about Jewish refugees and the United States from the period that may be relevant today:

Heeding calls from Jewish organizations, president Franklin Roosevelt in March of 1938 called for an international conference to absorb Jewish refugees from Germany and Austria. As the spring wore on, however, according to Walter Laquer's Holocaust Encyclopedia, the Americans surprised other potential absorbers of refugees by not really organizing anything.

"By late spring 1938, the United States had abdicated all responsibility for the conference preparations and looked to representatives of various regions, notably Latin America, to sponsor rescue proposals on their own territory," Judith Tydor Baumel writes in the article.

A number of the several dozen nations slated to attend – particularly those in Latin America, which were susceptible to American influence – braced for pressure to take in Jewish refugees.

Any hopes the United States would provide leadership were dashed in July, when the conference finally convened in Evian on the French-Swiss border. Myron Taylor, a steel magnate with no foreign policy experience who was named conference chairman announced the United States was ready to take in 27,370 immigrants – its pre-existing quota.

Other nations attending, relieved that the United States was essentially ready to do nothing more than it was already doing, followed suit. (Nonetheless, according to the same encyclopedia, the United States took in 43,000 Jewish refugees in 1939. By comparison Canada took in less than 5,000 Jews during Hitler's 12-year rule.)

Neither Marlene Dietrich, the German movie star, nor Bela Bartok, the Hungarian composer, was Jewish.

But both the "Blue Angel" and the 20th century melder of folk and "serious" music stood up for the Jews in their countries, making them unwelcome at home.

Dietrich, like many other Europeans who had found success in film in their own countries, had already moved to Hollywood before the rise of the Nazis, but in 1937, she enraged the Nazis by becoming a U.S. citizen.

She showed sensitivity to Jewish sensibilities well past the war; in Israel on a visit in 1960, she asked her audience's permission before singing in German, according to the Central Zionist Archives.

"Bartok firmly opposed the rise of Nazism, its persecution of the Jews and the banning of their work. He was not a Jew, but said he was ready to become one just to protest against the persecution which was extending itself to Austria and Hungary," according to a listing of famous refugees on the UN High Commissioner for Refugees website.

He didn't convert, but he did leave for the United States in 1940, dying there in 1945. His remains were re-interred in his beloved Hungary in 1988.

The director of the best ever movie about refugees knew from refugees.

Like Dietrich, Michael Curtiz – born in Hungary as Kertész Kaminer Mano – moved to Hollywood by choice, before the rise of the Nazis.

His sister was not so fortunate, and she and her family were sent to Auschwitz, where her husband died, according to a nostalgia entertainment website. Curtiz paid part of his earnings into the European Film Fund, a charity that helped refugees from Europe establish themselves in the U.S. film industry.

His best-known film is an aching testament to love surviving the separations wrought by war: 1942's Casablanca.

Opponents who warned of Communists and Nazis among the Jewish refugees were not entirely wrong.

The Intercept reported recently on the propaganda by opponents of Jewish immigration during the Nazi era – many of them outright anti-Semites who cited fears of Communist and Nazi infiltrators.

These fears were grossly overblown, but not unfounded.

Samuel Dickstein, a Jewish congressman from New York, bears the distinction of being the only congressman known to also have been a spy. Dickstein, who made his name seeking Nazis in the United States in the 1930s, helped establish the House Un-American Activities Committee in that decade. (The committee was set up to track Nazi infiltrators, but two decades later it became notorious for seeing Communists everywhere.)

According to documents unearthed in the post-Soviet era by historians Allen Weinstein and Alexander Vassiliev and revealed in their 1999 book, The Haunted Wood, Dickstein was also accepting cash from the Soviets for sharing information and – on at least one occasion – for attempting to obtain U.S. citizenship for an Austrian spy for the Soviets.

His handlers didn't like him much, as Politico reported last year: "Moscow concluded that Dickstein was 'heading a criminal gang that was involved in shady businesses, selling passports, illegal smuggling of people, getting citizenship.'"

At least one Nazi also attempted to infiltrate the United States as a Jew. In 1942, astute FBI agents correctly identified Herbert Karl Friedrich Bahr as a Nazi seeking refuge in the United States, claiming to be a Jew, according to an account earlier this month by Smithsonian.

Not every argument against the Jewish refugees was necessarily bigoted. Then, as now, there were opponents who said allowing refugees in was an affront to applicants for permanent entry into the United States who had gone through the legal process and waited patiently for years.

In May of 1939, the St. Louis floated off the coast of Florida, so close passengers "could see the lights of Miami," according to the St. Louis entry in the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum's online encyclopedia.

The passengers, desperate, pleaded with Roosevelt through cables. A State Department telegram sent to a passenger stated that the passengers must "await their turns on the waiting list and qualify for and obtain immigration visas before they may be admissible into the United States."

The St. Louis was forced to return to Europe, although Britain took in 288 passengers. Of the 620 who returned to the continent – some to countries that had yet to be occupied by the Nazis – 258 were murdered by the Nazis. ■

The St. Louis was turned away from the United States and Canada.

MK resigns over sexual assault allegations

JTA
JERUSALEM

An Israeli lawmaker from the Jewish Home Party will resign from the Knesset over sexual assault allegations.

Yinon Magal informed party leader Naftali Bennett on Monday that he will resign following the accusations by two women who worked with him when he was editor of the Hebrew language news website Walla, as well as others.

At least four women in recent weeks have accused Magal, who is married, of making lewd comments and sexual assault in the past.

Magal had resigned last week from his position as Jewish Home's Knesset faction chairman in light of the allegations. He apologized for his actions.

"I made a mistake in my past conduct, which is even more unbecoming for the public official I am today," Magal said in a statement last week. "I apologize from the bottom of my heart to those who were hurt. I am determined to correct my behaviour and also to repair things on the personal and family level."

On Monday, Magal reportedly said in a statement announcing his decision to resign that, while his actions were not criminal, people were hurt by them, leading to his decision.

Bennett, who is currently in the United States, called Magal's decision "proper." ■

Adorn your table with Star of David desserts

RANDY FINGRUT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Star of David, also known as the Magen David, or Shield of David, is an easily recognized six-pointed star that, according to legend, hero King David carried as an image on his shield.

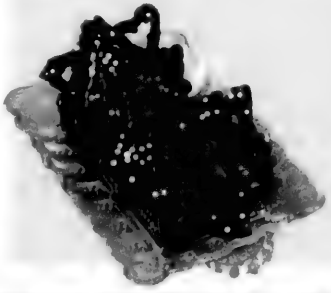
The origins of the shape are likely not strictly related to the Jewish faith, and ancient Jewish artifacts are highly unlikely to contain this symbol. Around the 17th century the Magen David started to appear on the outside of synagogues, to identify them as Jewish places of worship. It is not known why this symbol was chosen.

Jewish scholars have attributed deep theological significance to the symbol. For example, it has been pointed out that the top triangle points upwards, toward God, while the lower triangle points downwards, toward Earth and the people there. Some scholars note that the intertwining of the triangles makes them inseparable, like the Jewish people. Others say that the three sides of each triangle represents the three types of Jews: Kohanim, Levites and Israelites. It was also thought that the star brought good luck.

The nine-branched menorah that we now use on Chanukah is commonly adorned with the Star of David. So why not use the Star Of David to accent our tables and ultimately our food? Brightly embellished Chanukah tableware and paper goods can easily be found at party and dollar stores. With these unusual recipes, you can learn to fill your dessert table with delicious "Star of David" Holiday desserts. Happy Chanukah!

Magen David Pretzels

- 2 cups semi-sweet chocolate chips
- 8 oz. pretzel sticks
- blue and white candy sprinkles or pearl nonpareils



Melt the chocolate chips in a large microwave safe bowl in the microwave for one minute. Stir until smooth. Dip the pretzels into the warm chocolate. Use the chocolate as "glue" placing ends together into triangles, place on parchment paper. Cool in refrigerator. Microwave the chocolate for 20 seconds to re-melt. Place one pretzel triangle over another triangle in the opposite direction, using chocolate as glue. This will make a Star of David.

Drizzle on a bit more chocolate and sprinkle with blue and white or pearl sprinkles.

Serve your guests Chanukah pie with a twist

Magen David Pie

Filling

- ❑ 1 cup sugar
- ❑ 3 tbsp. corn starch
- ❑ 3/4 cup water
- ❑ 4 cups frozen blueberries
- ❑ 1 1/2 tbsp. lemon juice
- ❑ zest of one lemon

Combine sugar, cornstarch and water in a heavy bottomed saucepan. Heat rapidly until thickened. Remove from heat and add 2 cups of the blueberries. Return to heat until filling becomes an even purple/blue colour. Remove from heat and add remaining blueberries, lemon juice and lemon zest. Cool.

Pie shell

- ❑ 2 1/2 cups all-purpose flour
- ❑ 1 tbsp. sugar
- ❑ 3/4 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1 cup chilled unsalted butter, cut into 1/2-in. cubes
- ❑ 6 tbsp. (approximately) ice water
- ❑ blueberry filling
- ❑ 1 egg to glaze pastry

Mix flour, sugar, and salt in processor. Add butter; pulse until coarse meal forms. Gradually blend in enough ice water to form moist clumps. Gather dough into ball; divide in half. Form dough into 2 balls; flatten into disks. Wrap each in plastic; chill 2 hours or overnight.

On a lightly floured surface, roll each disk into a 14-in. circle, 1/8 in. thick. Place 1 circle on a parchment-lined baking sheet, and cool until firm, about 30 minutes. Fit the other circle into an 11-in. fluted round pie pan. Trim dough flush with top edge of pan. Refrigerate until ready to use.

To make the Star of David lattice: Remove baking sheet from refrigerator. Using a clean ruler as a guide, cut dough circle into 16 1/4-in.-wide strips with a sharp knife. Lay 6 strips of dough on another parchment-lined baking sheet in parallel lines. With 6 more strips, one at a time, weave them at a 90-degree angle to the first strips. Starting in the centre, weave 1 new strip diagonally under and over the top layer. Continue with each additional strip, 1 in. apart, reversing to over and under with every other strip. Repeat procedure with the remaining 6 strips, but in the opposite diagonal direction. If dough strips become too soft, return to refrigerator until firm. Adjust strips with your fingers, if necessary, to create star lattice pattern. Freeze on baking sheet until ready to use.

Spread cooled fruit mixture evenly on dough in pie pan. Carefully slide frozen lattice on top of filled pie shell, centering it on filling. Trim edges and press edges to seal. Brush top of lattice with beaten egg.

Preheat oven to 400. Bake tart for 15 minutes. Reduce heat to 375 and continue baking for 40 minutes or until crust is golden brown and filling is bubbling. Cool in pan on a wire rack. ■

Books serve as enlightening gifts for Festival of Lights

ELAINE COHEN
SUPPLEMENTS CO-ORDINATOR

Families and friends will gather on Dec. 6 to light the first Chanukah candle. Dinner guests invariably bring gifts for the children, and books serve as fine keepsakes.

Here is a sampling of recent publications to accommodate readers in primary grades and middle school or junior high school readers. Distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada, the titles are timely and enlightening.

When Germany occupied Denmark in 1940, the king, political dignitaries and countrymen initially surrendered. However, a group of teenagers sought revenge. Knud and Jen Pedersen, sons of a respected clergyman, were the prime movers behind the RAF and Churchill Clubs in Odense and Aalborg, Denmark. The clubs were named after Winston Churchill and the British RAF that the boys admired for standing up to Hitler. The youth were ashamed of their nation, lamenting Denmark should have emulated Norway and fought back. Their other neighbouring nation, Sweden adopted a neutral stance.

Despite lack of resources and training, the boys created havoc for German troops by repainting Nazi signs and insignia and destroying property. They were caught and imprisoned for over two years, but their heroics inspired other Danes to rise against oppression. Ultimately, tiny Denmark helped save more than 700,000 Jews from being delivered to German death camps.

The Boys Who Challenged Hitler by Phillip Hoose, distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books, is geared for young adults, but mature readers of all ages will find this hardcover nonfiction book enlightening. Although Denmark's deeds are common knowledge, Hoose reveals facts and treats readers to impressive first-hand reports by Knud Pedersen. Hoose, an award-winning American author was alerted to the Danish teenagers' heroics in 2000 when he visited a museum in Denmark.

> Their heroics inspired other Danes to rise against oppression.

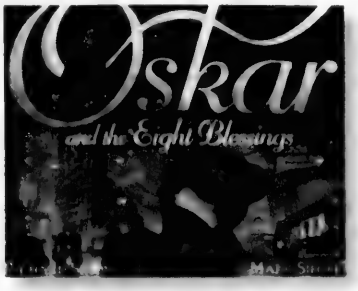
Upon his return to the United States, Hoose contacted Pedersen about writing the story, but was refused because of an earlier offer. Hoose's second attempt in 2012 was accepted. Pedersen implied the initial plans fell through and he was eager to get started. He offered to host Phillip and his wife, Sandi, at his cottage in Denmark and encouraged them to visit soon.

In addition to conducting numerous face-to-face interviews with Pedersen and other principals involved, Hoose collected maps, drawings, photographs, copies of documents and pertinent background material. The layout of the book is innovative and newsworthy. First-hand reports, narratives, boxed information and illustrations bring the story to life. After the visit, Hoose kept in contact with Pedersen until the 88-year-old war resistance hero died in December 2014. Hoose briefs readers on the fate of all the principals involved in the story. In addition to his contribution to the war effort, Pedersen, an accomplished artist, felt everyone should be privy to prized artwork. Hence, he founded the world's first art library in Copenhagen.



Oskar and the Eight Blessings by Richard Simon and Tanya Simon is distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada, and is perfectly timed for Chanukah. Oskar, a young refugee from Europe, arrives alone in New York City on the seventh night of Chanukah in 1938.

The bewildered lad's only clue to his future digs is a photo and address of an aunt he has never met. Oskar's astute parents sent him off after enduring Kristallnacht. His father's parting message drives home the underlying theme of the story. "Oskar, even in bad times, people can be good. You have to look for the blessings."

Readers, ages four to eight, as well as older peers, parents and educators, will be mesmerized by illustrator Mark Siegel's magnificent paintings. He conveys Oskar's trepidation, fascination and gratitude while finding his way in the immense city lined with high buildings and strangers. The New York co-authors have independent writing careers but Tanya Simon worked in tandem with her husband, Richard, to bring his topic to fruition. To discover his motive, check out the "Author's Note" at the end of the book.

Young readers of this book are subliminally introduced to meaningful information. Furthermore, the dates, styles, celebrated personalities and events are accurate. The authors embrace the Festival of Lights and note the seventh night of Chanukah in 1938 coincided with Christmas Eve. The authors allude to the spiritual significance of the holidays and show how Oskar received acts of kindness from strangers of every persuasion. ■

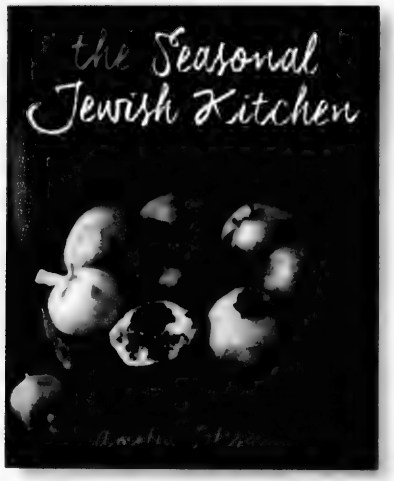
Cookbook features recipes for all seasons



SYBIL KAPLAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Amelia Saltsman's background makes for an interesting source for her new cookbook, The Seasonal Jewish Kitchen. Her mother is Romanian, and her father is Iraqi. They met in the Israeli army and immigrated to Los Angeles where Amelia was born and grew up.

She is a regular contributor on food in the media. She and her family live in Santa Monica, Calif.

One day while cooking and sharing her ideas on the social media and her blog, the responses were so overwhelming, she realized "that a new generation of cooks was looking for a fresh approach to Jewish food." Thinking about her own family heritage then led her to explore her family's culinary roots more deeply.

The result is 146 recipes plus 135 colour photographs. Each two-month section contains information about the holidays of that period. Recipes go from starters, salads and soups to side dishes, main courses and desserts.

Saltsman says the recipes are labelled as meat, dairy, pareve and fish, as well as vegan or gluten free. "The food philosophy is that you should use well-raised, whole, real foods. There are no artificial ingredients used in any recipes."

Recipes are included from Tunisia, Morocco, Germany, Syria, Yemen, Persia, Bulgaria, Hungary, Eastern Europe and, of course, Romania and Israel.

For Chanukah, here are two of her recipes.

A fresh approach to traditional cooking

Best potato latkes

- ❑ 2 lb. peeled starchy potatoes
- ❑ 1 small onion
- ❑ 2 heaping tbsp. unbleached all purpose flour or potato starch
- ❑ 1 tsp. kosher salt
- ❑ ½ tsp. baking powder
- ❑ freshly ground black pepper
- ❑ 2 lightly beaten eggs
- ❑ mild oil (grapeseed, sunflower or avocado)
- ❑ sea salt

Using the large holes of a box grater or a food processor fitted with the grating disk, grate the potatoes (about 5 cups).

Grate the onion on the large holes of the box grater or fit the processor with the metal S blade and grate.

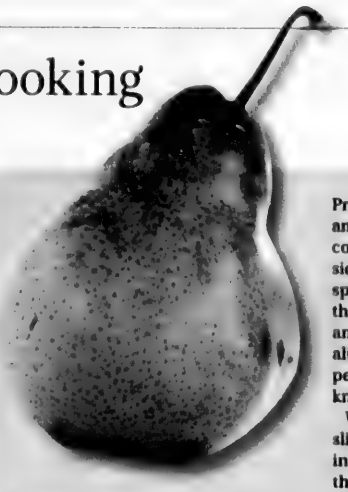
In a large bowl, stir together potatoes, onion, flour salt, baking powder and a few grinds of pepper. Stir in eggs.

Line 2 or 3 sheet pans with paper towels. Place the prepared pans, the latke batter, a large spoon and a spatula near the stove.

Heat 1 or 2 large skillets over medium heat. Pour into skillets not more than ¼-in. oil. When the oil is shimmering and a tiny bit of batter sizzles on contact, start spooning in the latke batter, making sure to add both solids and liquids. Using the back of the spoon, flatten each spoonful into a circle 3 to 4 in. in diameter. Do not crowd the latkes in the pan. You will get 4 or 5 latkes in a 12-in. skillet.

Cook the latkes, flipping them once until golden on both sides, 5 to 6 minutes total.

Transfer the latkes to the prepared baking sheet. Cook the remaining batter in the same way, stirring the batter before adding more to the pan and adding oil as needed at the edge of the pan. Arrange the latkes on a warmed platter, sprinkle with sea salt, and serve with applesauce or sour cream. Yield: 24 latkes



Roasted smashed apples and pears

- ❑ 3 lb. medium-size apples and pears
- ❑ a few sprigs thyme (optional)
- ❑ 2 to 3 tbsp. water, fresh lemon juice, Calvados, pear brandy or eau-de-vie, hard cider or dessert wine
- ❑ ground cinnamon or nutmeg (optional)

Preheat the oven to 375. Halve the pears and apples through the stem end, then core them, and place the halves, cut side down, on one or more sheet pans, spacing them 1 to 2 in. apart. If using the thyme, scatter it among the pears and apples. Cover the pan tightly with aluminum foil. Bake the apples and pears until tender when pierced with a knife tip (30 to 40 minutes).

When they are cool enough to handle, slip the fruits from the skins and back into the pan, scraping any pulp from the skins. Discard skins and thyme stems.

Mash the apples and pears with a fork, stirring in enough water or other liquid to help scrape up any brown bits from the pan bottom and lighten the texture of the fruit.

Scrape the mixture into a bowl and serve warm at room temperature or cover and refrigerate up to a day ahead and serve cold. This can also be made with all pears or all apples. Yield: 3 cups. ■

Cookies are easy to make and always a hit

EILEEN GOLTZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Chanukah and cookies are two words that seem to go together (along with latkes and sufganiyot, of course).

I try, every year, to come up with a few new and exciting cookies recipes that can be made ahead of time, can be doubled or tripled and are so delicious that everyone will be begging for recipes.

Vanilla rolled sugar cookies

The best frosting is a glaze made with powdered sugar and milk or non-dairy substitute of your choice. Keep it thin and you can colour it with food coloring.

- ❑ 1 1/2 cups butter or margarine softened
- ❑ 2 cups sugar
- ❑ 4 eggs
- ❑ 2 tsp. vanilla
- ❑ 5 cups flour
- ❑ 2 tsp. baking powder
- ❑ 1 tsp. salt

In the bowl of an electric mixer combine the butter and sugar and beat until smooth (at least 3 minutes). Add the eggs and vanilla and beat until combined. Slowly, on a low speed, add the flour, baking powder, and salt. When combined, cover, and refrigerate the dough for at least two hours or overnight.

When you're ready to cut out your cookies, preheat oven to 400. Lightly flour the surface you're going to be rolling the dough on and then roll out 1/3 of the dough to about 1/4- to 1/2-in. thick. Cut the dough into shapes with your cookie cutter. Place cookies 1 in. apart on parchment paper covered cookie sheets. You can decorate with coloured sugar or sprinkles at this point or wait until they are baked and cooled to frost. Repeat with the scraps and the remaining dough, 1/3 at a time. Bake 6 to 9 minutes (they should be just lightly golden on the edges) Makes 3 to 5 dozen depending on the size of the cookies.

Nut squares

Crust:

- ❑ 1/2 cup sugar
- ❑ 1/2 cup plus 6 tbsp. butter or margarine, softened
- ❑ 1 egg
- ❑ 3 cups flour
- ❑ 1 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. baking powder

Filling:

- ❑ 1 1/4 cups butter or margarine, softened
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups packed brown sugar
- ❑ 1/4 cup plus 1 tbsp. granulated sugar
- ❑ 1/3 cup honey
- ❑ 1/3 cup light corn syrup
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups toasted pecans pieces
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups toasted walnuts pieces
- ❑ 1/2 cup toasted hazelnut pieces
- ❑ 1/4 cup whipping cream or non dairy substitute
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. vanilla

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 10-by-15 in. baking pan. Line the pan with parchment paper. An overhang on the ends help to remove the cookie from the pan after it is baked and cooled so that cutting is easier).

In the bowl of an electric mixer cream together the sugar and butter for at least 3 minutes. Add the egg and beat until combined.

In another bowl, combine the flour, salt and baking powder. Add the flour mixture to the butter mixture and mix just until dough comes together (do not over mix). Press the dough into the prepared pan, making sure that the dough goes up the edges slightly. Bake for 15 to 18 minutes or until the crust is just slightly browned (do not overcook). Remove the crust and cool. Reduce the temperature to 300.

While the crust is cooling combine the butter, brown sugar, sugar, honey and corn syrup. Bring the mixture to a boil. Boil for between 2 to 3 minutes but no less and no longer than that. Remove the mixture from the heat and stir in the nuts, cream, salt and vanilla. Mix to combine and then gently spoon the nut mixture into the crust. Return the pan to the oven and cook for 35 to 40 minutes, or until the filling is bubbling. Don't worry if it looks a little runny, it will set up as it cools. Let it set up for at least 4 hours (or overnight) before you try to cut it. Cut into small squares or rectangles. Makes up to 48 cookies depending on the size. ■

The CJN gets many books sent to our office for review. Unfortunately we are unable to fully review each one. Below are some recent publications that our editors determined would make perfect gifts for the reader in your home.

Holocaust related:

A bestseller in France, But You Did Not Come Back, a memoir by Marceline Loridan-Ivens (Penguin Random House), is an astonishing addition to the library of literature on the Holocaust.

Loridan-Ivens was 15 when she and her father were sent to concentration camps. Written as a letter to her father, whom she would only see once after their arrest, this deeply moving account has earned comparisons to Elie Wiesel's Night.

It was little more than 75 years ago that human history witnessed an unprecedented crime – the deliberate mass murder of millions in the aim of removing a whole people from the earth. Acclaimed historian Timothy Snyder has spent years in the painstaking effort to recover the experience of the victims, the intentions of the killers and the history of the Europe they shared. Black Earth: The Holocaust as History and Warning (Tim Duggan Books) is a remarkable work of scholarship that offers a new and innovative interpretation of the Holocaust and a frightening warning about our future.

Inspired by her mother's experience during World War II, Ella Burakowski captures a chilling chapter of family – and human – history in her debut novel Hidden Gold: A True Story of the Holocaust (Second Story Press). After the Nazis invade Poland, the Gold children and their mother must set out on a path of near-constant flight and hiding to survive. Hidden Gold follows the family as they struggle to find a safe haven, unsure of whom they can trust.

Fiction:

From Alice Hoffman, bestselling author of The Dovekeepers and The Museum of Extraordinary Things, The Marriage of Opposites (Simon & Schuster) centres on Rachel Pissarro, a formidable and passionate woman who defied her tight-knit community on St. Thomas and pursued a forbidden love affair that made her an outcast and gave birth to painter Camille Pissarro – the father of impressionism.

The Book of Stone by Jonathan Papernick (Fig Tree Books) is an arresting psychological thriller set in pre-9/11 Brooklyn. As an estranged son attempts to find meaning and purpose in his life, his family's dark history is peeled back, layer by layer, against the backdrop of religious extremism.

The Girl Who Was Born That Way by Sheridan College professor Gail Benick (Inannna Publications) is the story of the Berk family trying to bury its Holocaust past while starting over in postwar United States. It centres on the dynamics between the family's four daughters, the two oldest of whom who grew up in the Lodz Ghetto, the two youngest in an idyllic American suburb.

Memoir:

Born to Holocaust survivors and brought up in Melbourne, Australian journalist Ramona Koval was kept in the dark about her parents' lives before Australia. From a young age, she felt that the man she called Father was not her biological parent, but she had only her feelings to go on. A quest for identity, recounted with sensitivity and humour, Bloodhound: Searching for my Father (The Text Publishing Co.), takes hold of the reader and never lets go.

In The Pater, My Father, My Judaism, My Childlessness (Toby), writer and journalist Elliot Jager tackles what has until now been an almost taboo subject: what it feels like to be a childless Jewish man. After a 30-year estrangement from his chassidic father, a halting reconciliation is overshadowed by the elderly man's desire that Jager father a male child.

Non-fiction:

In Abraham (Random House Canada), Alan M. Dershowitz gives us a no-holds-barred history of Jewish lawyers: from the biblical Abraham through modern-day advocates who have changed the world by challenging the status quo, defending the unpopular, contributing to the rule of law and following the biblical command to pursue justice.

In The Grammar of God, A Journey Into the Words and Worlds of the Bible (Spiegel & Grau), Aviya Kushner tells the story of her vibrant relationship to the Bible, and along the way, illustrates how the differences in translation (from Hebrew to English) affect our understanding of our culture's most important work. The book is also a moving tale about leaving home and returning to it, literally and through reading.

Knopf Canada has just published Gratitude, a deeply moving testimony featuring four poignant essays by the late Oliver Sacks, previously published in the New York Times.

Young Readers:

Canadian Jewish Book Award-winner Anne Dublin wrote Stealing Time, A Jonah Wiley Adventure (Dundurn), in which the protagonist and his stepbrother Toby are hurled back in time to Egypt, China, France and other places. In order to get back to the present, they must overcome their personal issues and work together to solve the tough problems they encounter.

Also by Anne Dublin, 44 Hours or Strike! (Second Story Press) brings to life a crucial part of labour history – the 1931 Toronto Dressmakers' Strike – in a fast-paced story for young readers.

Stones on a Grave by Kathy Kacer (Orca Book Publishers) is part of Secrets, a series of seven linked young adult novels by seven novelists that can be read in any order. The series takes place in 1964. Life is about to change for seven teen girls when the orphanage they call home burns to the ground. On their own for the first time, each girl embarks on a journey of discovery, following clues to the families they never had and experiencing the world in ways they never imagined.

In Numbers by David A. Poulsen (Dundurn), Andy Crockett doesn't fit in at his new school – not with the goths, not with the jocks, and certainly not with the brains. Not even, really, with The Six, a group of misfits who hang out with each other mostly because they can't stand hanging out with anyone else.

As a young girl, Tuky Gestener lived a carefree, privileged life in Budapest. But when Hungary joined the German side in World War II, everything changed. Based on true events, Tuky, the Story of a Hidden Child by Shterni Rosenfeld (Hachai) tells the story of Tuky and her brother and cousin who went to hide with non-Jewish farmers in the country.

Poetry:

In his first poetry collection, Daniel Goodwin negotiates between love and war, the personal and the public, high culture and pop culture, the ancient and modern worlds. Three currents run through Catullus's Soldiers (Cormorant Books): the poet's love for his family, his ambivalent reactions to the wider world of politics and his private relationship with the muse as he wrestles with the limitations and triumphs of art. ■

Experts preach safety first when selecting children's toys

ELAINE COHEN
SUPPLEMENTS CO-ORDINATOR

Children today have access to an amazing array of sophisticated digital devices, games and toys.

The Better Business Bureau, Health Canada and other consumer protection agencies monitor these products for reliability and safety.

To avoid injury, consumers are advised to monitor safety alerts and product recalls. The agencies offer the following guidelines pertaining to gift selection and playtime supervision.

When buying toys, always pick age-appropriate products and even though some companies include this information with the packaging, it's best to check. For example, products with small, detachable parts are dangerous in the hands of babies and toddlers. Plush toys should be kept away from heat sources, such as stoves, fireplaces or space heaters. Discard damaged toys with loose parts and sharp edges.

Problems arise when parts become loose in squeeze toys, squeakers, and rattles. Even though babies and toddlers are apt to refuse a spoonful of delicious food, they never fail to pop other things into their mouths.

Button batteries and magnets can be lethal if ingested, therefore, product compliance and parental supervision are vital. Look for products with battery compartments that prevent easy access. For example, screw-closed compartments are often harder to open than the slide-open models. Among the many items that contain button batteries and magnets are musical greeting cards, board books and flashing jewelry. Adult supervision is necessary when young children are exposed to these items.

Health Canada points out the importance of adults as well as children adhering to battery instructions. Considering numerous games and devices require batteries, elders should beware of how to install, replace and store batteries. If one battery in the set wears out, replace all of them. Don't mix old and new batteries. Children should not be allowed to take battery-run toys to bed. Battery burns and leakage are hazards to avoid. Don't try to recharge batteries that are not rechargeable. Store batteries in a dry place out of a child's reach. If many months elapse between the times the toy is in use, remove and store the batteries in the interim.

Avoid toys with ribbons or cords long enough to wrap around a child's neck. Ride-on toys should be age appropriate and accommodate the child's weight. Furthermore, playtime must take place away from stairs, swimming pools, furniture and traffic.

Monitor volume control, when children spend hours with shrill loud sounding toys. Besides creating an unpleasant atmosphere for everyone around, the noise may affect the child's hearing. Discard broken balloon pieces to prevent little ones from swallowing latex and blocking their airways. Children love face paint and it adds a touch of flair to party time but in some instances it's best to play safe. As Health Canada points out, hypoallergenic indicates the product is "less likely" to cause allergic reactions rather than meaning 100 per cent safe. ■

Director gives Jacob Two-Two a makeover

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jacob Two-Two Meets the Hooded Fang was one of the first plays Jen Shuber ever saw. Now, she's co-directing a new production of it for the Young People's Theatre's (YPT) 50th anniversary season.

It's a very special feeling because my parents took me to see everything at YPT," she says. "But that was the first thing I ever saw, and I remember it so clearly."

Mordecai Richler's now classic children's book is celebrating its 40th birthday this year. Richler also wrote the play, which premiered more than 30 years ago at YPT – that's the production Shuber saw back in 1984. While YPT has since mounted it numerous times, it's getting a makeover for 2015.

Shuber and her co-director Allen MacInnis, who's also YPT's artistic director, worked closely with sisters Anika and Britta Johnson for eight months as they created new music for the show.

"We decided that if we were going to bring it back, we needed to find a way to make it resonate with modern audiences," Shuber says.

The Johnsons penned a score that's filled with pop and hip-hop influences. The now-iconic Jacob Two-Two story, however, remains intact. And Shuber knows it's still resonating with kids.

After the first few performances, children were humming the music and talking about the play as they left the theatre. "That's really the litmus test of doing my job," she says.

With a cast of 12, YPT brought on two kids – Drew Davis and David G. Black – to share the title role in alternating performances. This is a rarity for YPT because despite producing children's theatre, it usually features only adult actors.

"We really felt that for this particular piece, it would be important to have a child playing the lead role," says Shuber.

Along with co-directing, Shuber's the choreographer. She was also the choreographer for YPT's James and the Giant Peach last year and earned a Dora nomination for her work.

Shuber graduated from New York University's Tisch School with a BFA in acting and also attended the National Ballet School of Canada. She's now both a director and a choreographer in Toronto and she's recently worked with companies including Harold Green Jewish Theatre and Theatre Passe Muraille. She's also the program director of the Composium workshop for Theatre 20, which is dedicated to developing new Canadian musical theatre.

> We really felt that for this particular piece, it would be important to have a child playing the lead role.
> JEN SHUBER, co-director

As for Jacob Two-Two, Shuber stresses that it's enjoyable for both children and adults. "I think one of the amazing things about YPT is they put together productions and they assume that kids are smart and inquisitive, and it's a very high level of entertainment," she says.

As in all YPT shows, children can interact with the actors in a question-and-answer period following each and every performance.

This production is suitable for ages five and up. And, despite its ominous sounding name, it's not scary at all. Rather, it explores subjects relevant to youngsters as well as those who are young at heart.

"It deals with all kinds of themes, like secret heroes and the importance of friendship, standing up to bullies," Shuber says.

"But I think the one theme, the one that resonates the most with kids is that the show is about child empowerment."■

Jacob Two-Two Meets the Hooded Fang runs until Jan. 3, 2016 at the Young People's Theatre in Toronto. For tickets, visit youngpeoplestheatre.ca or call 416-862-2222.

Free Times Cafe brunch celebrates 20th anniversary

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Bella! Did Ya Eat?, the weekly brunch buffet that Free Times Cafe owner Judy Perly launched at the restaurant two decades ago, hasn't only been a boon to the business, but something that's kept her feeling personally anchored.

"I call it my Prozac," the 65-year-old Perly said with a chuckle, her mass of red hair coiled atop her head.

"There were times when the restaurant generally wasn't doing that well, and I said, 'This isn't good, but the brunch is good.' For 10 years, I came every Saturday night and cut up all the desserts for the next day. I was single at the time, and the brunch got me through some difficult times… It's helped me develop a better social persona, to get out there more and feel proud of myself."

This year marks the 20th anniversary of Bella! Did Ya Eat? as well as the 35th anniversary of the Free Times Cafe, the College Street restaurant that Perly, a former high school art teacher and private caterer, purchased in 1980 in an attempt to support her then-visual art career.

Featuring what Perly calls "home-cooked food from around the world" – dishes like quiche, pasta and falafel – Free Times also became known as a hub for folk and acoustic musicians, who, by 1983, were performing in the restaurant's back room seven nights a week.

Following a fire in 1990 that saw Free Times temporarily close down, the restaurant was struggling, and Perly, understanding the popularity of brunch and feeling a personal tug to get back in touch with her Jewish roots, conceived of Bella! Did Ya Eat?, an all-you-can-eat buffet featuring dozens of authentic, mostly Ashkenazi Jewish dishes like fried eggs and onion, herring, gefilte fish, smoked salmon, bagels, potato latkes, blintzes and challah – much of it made in house.

"I knew what my Jewish customers wanted – the food on the table before they got there, reservations so they could change them… I knew they were picky eaters so I needed a foolproof concept," Perly explained, noting that the brunch was successful from Day 1.

Bella! Did Ya Eat?, which, over the years, has expanded to include about 50 different dishes for a fixed price of $20, accompanied by a set of live klezmer music, offers two seatings every Sunday.

"We're the only place in the world to have weekly concerts of klezmer and Jewish music… We'll have Yiddish music or music by a Jewish composer, and sometimes a little Hebrew," Perly said, listing bands like Beyond the Pale, Sultans of String and The Shpielers as some of the regular performers.

A dozen or so bands have formed as a result of the weekly stage provided by the brunch, Perly said, and the brunch has been integral to the evolution of klezmer and Yiddish music in Toronto, which has seen something of a revival of late.

The restaurant's overall clientele is roughly 80 per cent Jewish, but Perly said the brunch draws more of a 50/50 ratio of Jews to non-Jews, the former often expressing the sense of nostalgia the experience evokes for the food of their childhood, and the latter appreciating the exposure to traditional Jewish fare.

Judy Perly in front of a picture she painted of her late mother, hung in the Free Times Cafe.

> We're the only place in the world to have weekly concerts of klezmer and Jewish music

While she regrets that more Jewish clients don't attend the brunch – something she attributes to the difficulty for many of driving from their north Toronto homes through downtown traffic – Perly said that the restaurant has a huge demand at Chanukah for their latkes, which can be ordered to go, and that Free Times is often rented out for private events like bar mitzvah parties.

"The brunch is layered with a lot of soul… Plus, we're situated right in the heart of the old Jewish neighbourhood, so it brings older Jewish people who themselves grew up here," Perly said.

Having grown up on Eglinton Avenue above her Canadian-born parents' business, Perly's Maps, Perly said Bella! Did Ya Eat? has made her feel more connected to her late mother, Bella, a number of whose belongings she has incorporated into the homey, old world décor of the restaurant's added-on bistro dining section, and to her eastern European grandmother, whose inquiring after whether her daughter had yet eaten supper inspired the buffet's name.

"I put all these from my mother's house into the bistro… as well as incorporating my mother and grandmother's dishes into the brunch because I didn't have my own children and wasn't doing Friday night dinners for them. I wanted to find a way to have more soul around my own life in terms of being Jewish."

Free Times Cafe will celebrate its 35th anniversary on Dec. 15 with musical performances, including a Yiddish cabaret, and a deluxe buffet featuring chicken, brisket, salmon and vegetarian dishes. ■

Chanukah: the greatest Hollywood blockbuster never told

Chaimie and Leizer

A few years back, Mel Gibson was set to make a Chanukah movie, but it never happened. This alone might be proof of Hashem's powers, if not insofar as defending the Jewish people, at least defending His script from a lunatic director – albeit a great one. (And, yes, reconciling that is a proverbial "YidLife Crisis.")

But seriously: it's lunacy that we still haven't cooked up an oily blockbuster for Chanukah. The truth is, we suck when it comes to marketing our very own brand: Judaism.

We at YidLife Crisis are humbly doing our bis! to change this. You're welcome.

On that note… do we have a Chanukah picture for you!

Picture it: Sicily, 1943. (Wait, no, that's us channeling Estelle Getty. Backtrack...)

Picture it: Judea, 200 B.C.E. In a time of Hellenistic influence, secular Jews entranced by implanted Greek culture shake the foundations of tribal Jewish identity in Israel. (Sound familiar? Picture us, but in togas. Actually, best not do that.) Enter a hardy family of rebels who take things into their own hands. Their name? Maccabees (technically, Hasmoneans, but Maccabees rolls nicer off the tongue).

OK, here's where it gets fun: we think there's a huge opportunity to play off the dual hot topics of mega-bearded hipster hunks and mega-bearded religious fundamentalists – and give them all washboard abs – wait for it – dripping in eight days of oil. We're thinking 300 meets Fiddler, or Twilight meets Sunrise/Sunset, where we have a few young male stars take over ancient Israel shirtlessly and shamelessly. We'd round up a few Jewish names – Jake Gyllenhaal works out nicely as a ripped halfie. Definitely throw in Zak Efron. Miles Teller's been working out, get him in there. Who else? Let's get an NFL endorsement with Julian Edelman, and he will literally close the film running a pigskin out of the Temple.

What of Antiochus? Throw in Alan Rickman and we'll truly have a minyan on set.

A proper Greek could work too: Zack Galifianakis in an Oscar-worthy performance where he flips to the other side (from comedy to serious roles. And conversion to Judaism, because why not?).

And the title? Days is big now, like 8 Days, or 8 Days Later. Maybe something with Fire in it, like Flames of our Fathers or the hip-hop tinged 8 Daze of Blaze. Acronyms are huge, so we might go with N.G.H.S. (Ness Gadol Haya Sham). And yes, it'll play in Israel as N.G.H.P.

Unconvinced? Fine, we can go the Disney route and create the Maccabees as a collection of adorable bearded bees. Link in a cross promotion with Seinfeld's Bee Story, and now we're selling small plastic LED chanukiyot as part of the first ever Glatt Kosher Happy Meals (re-branded "Reluctantly Satisfied Meals"). The possibilities are endless.

We think we're onto something here. But the grander, tragic problem is that few Jews would dare put something so "Jewish" onscreen. At least, there remain a few players who don't divorce themselves from their heritage. Spielberg and Weinstein could have changed their names to Lord Stephen Peel and His Honourable Harvard Winetasting, but didn't, proving they still have the proverbial beitzim to bring Jewish tales to screens.

If you ask us, it's time we "owned" our Judaism and broadcasted it. So, Steve, Larry, if you're listening: make this movie. Run with it. A Chanukah gift, if you will. We ask only to play the comedic relief of two Hellenists, the Rosenkrantz and Guildenstern of ancient Judea. We were meant to play the Bad Jews, plus did you see how enraptured we are with souvlaki in last year's Chanukah episode?

Hey, it's the least we can do to help (ourselves).

WE'RE WELCOME! ■

Children's book a first for Toronto-born rabbi

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

He's the author of more than 100 books about subjects including Jewish rituals and law, Jewish sexuality, and prayer, but Toronto-born Rabbi Ron Isaacs' latest book targets a different audience.

Rabbi Isaacs, the rabbi emeritus of Temple Shalom synagogue in New Jersey, where he served for the past 40 years, is the co-author of Farmer Kobi's Hanukkah Match, a Chanukah-themed children's book that also provides lessons on the Jewish values of welcoming guests, and compassion for animals.

"I never dreamed about doing a children's book until I found out about a member of my congregation, Karen Rostoker-Gruber, who I didn't know that well, and I didn't know that she was a writer," Rabbi Isaacs said.

Rostoker-Gruber is an award-winning children's book author and humorist, who has produced six picture books and four adult humour books. She is also a ventriloquist and performs with Maria, her puppet, in schools and libraries.

Rabbi Isaacs said that after speaking with her about writing children's books, he asked her if she'd consider working with him to write one.

"I asked Karen to show me things she'd written that had been rejected, just to get an idea of some of the books that she wrote other than the ones she published, which were short animal books," he said.

"There was one about a farmer that I found intriguing because the farmer had animals that could speak, and I read the story and I re-read the story and I said, 'I think you could take the bare bones of the plot and turn it into a Chanukah story without a whole lot of effort.'"

The story is about a young, single farmer on a moshav in Israel, who is preparing for a Chanukah date, with the help of his farm animal friends.

In an effort to impress Polly, who Farmer Kobi hopes will be his perfect match, the enthusiastic animals dote over their guest, offering her food and doing their best to make her comfortable, to no avail.

At the end of the story, which is peppered with animal-related puns ("eggz-actly" and "baa-baa ghanoush"), Polly leaves in a huff, which disappoints Farmer Kobi.

But there is a happy ending.

"Of course, this other character, Ruthy, shows up with a flat tire and you have to kind of imagine what happens, but she has her animals in the car, and she's invited in."

Although the story is built around the holiday of Chanukah, the main lessons demonstrate how guests and animals should be treated.

"It does have Chanukah baked into it, but one of the main underlying themes is how you treat a guest, and how hospitality to guests works, and how both the guest as well as the host have obligations to each other," he said.

"In this case, the guest who was the farmer's date, did not appreciate the fact that there were animals sitting at the table and was very rude to them. The animals could've gotten into a verbal fight with her, but instead, tried to calm her down by making her feel better, and offering to take her coat, and offering her food. They did everything they could to be accepted by her and she was still not happy with it, slams the door and walks out."

Rabbi Isaacs said he hopes this isn't the last children's book he gets published.

"We actually have another Farmer Kobi book that we wrote for Passover... whether it will get published or not remains to be seen, but it's a really funny one," he said.

"We have ideas for a Haggadah for families and it'll have a lot of funny stuff in it. We're still working... it is a lot of fun working with her so I hope this is just one of many books."

Farmer Kobi's Hanukkah Match, published by Apples and Honey Press, is available for order from Amazon.ca. ■

A stark look at a woman's life in Kabul

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Phyllis Chesler calls things as she sees them. She is the prototypical New Yorker, one who does not back away from letting you hear her opinion or the truth – or both when they coincide.

Chesler has been an indefatigable fighter all her life on behalf of human rights, a legendary advocate in the vanguard of the feminist movement that matured in the early 1960s. She is a psychotherapist, scholar, thinker and writer of some 14 books. These include the groundbreaking international bestseller, Women and Madness, and more than a decade ago, The New Anti-Semitism, a hard-hitting call to arms regarding the resurgent, social scourge. She is also the co-founder of the Association for Women in Psychology and the National Women's Health Network.

Chesler has never been known for pulling her punches and she pulls none in her latest book, An American Bride in Kabul: A Memoir.

An idealistic undergraduate student in New York in the late 1950s and early 1960s, Chesler falls in love with and eventually marries a suave, handsome, ostensibly wealthy, westernized young man from Afghanistan. Lured by a sense of romance, adventure and social purpose, she leaves her parents and the comfortable home in which she has been raised and moves with her new husband, Abdul-Kareem, to his native Afghanistan.

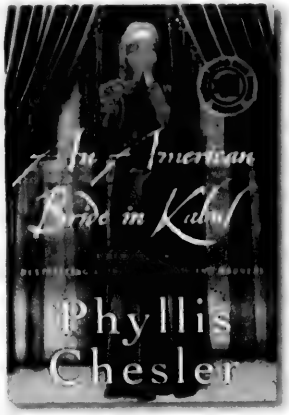
But the sense of adventure quickly collapses into a confined, suffocating existence as a kept foreign wife. The first hint of confounded dreams occurs as soon as she lands in Kabul when a government official confiscates her American passport. It is an ill omen of worse to come. She is not a citizen of Afghanistan, but in the eyes of the American diplomatic staff in Kabul, she is no longer an American. According to the customs and mores of Afghanistan, Chesler is property owned by her husband.

Still, the young bride develops a fondness for the natural splendour of the country and for some of her newly acquired family members who minister to her, especially during moments of high duress. Mostly, however, her time in Afghanistan as a foreign wife – indeed, a Jewish foreign wife – is a descent into hell.

Chesler describes her experiences in plentiful, pitiful detail. Her mother-in-law is an especially menacing presence in her life. "In the harem where I live, I am horrified by the way in which our slave-like servants are treated. The way my mother-in-law treats her female servants is criminal, tragic, barbaric, unbelievable – but apparently entirely normal in Kabul, both among the elite and among the peasantry."

The social, cultural and spiritual misery of her life is matched by its physical misery, which reaches its dangerous nadir when she develops hepatitis. "I fear that I will die and be buried in a Muslim cemetery somewhere out in the countryside. I have just turned 21 and am seriously contemplating my death. Even this is not as frightening as Abdul-Kareem's apparent indifference."

Chesler's experiences in Afghanistan do not make up the entirety of the book. Rather, they provide the jumping off point for a wider reflection on the impact of those experiences on her life as a feminist, human rights advocate. She is unsparing in what she describes as the extremely cruel exclusion – the purdah – of women in Afghanistan and throughout the traditionalist Muslim world. Inevitably, she also shares her thoughts on the burqa. "The burqa is not religiously mandated. In the past, many Muslim countries either banned the burqa or allowed women and their families to choose how women would dress. From a human rights point of view, the burqa demoralizes both the wearer and all women who see her: hobbled, hidden, invisible, unable or forbidden to join the social conversation."



An American Bride in Kabul: A memoir
by Phyllis Chesler

Palgrave Macmillan, 2013

This insightful account of her experiences and memories in Kabul, at times self-deprecating and humorous or biting and searing, also provides Chesler the opportunity to lift some heavy stones from her heart.

At her lowest physical and emotional point, seeking a way to spare herself further ill treatment, she writes: "This is difficult for me to write about. It is harder to admit that I was this foolish, this frightened, this alone, that I would actually jettison the religion of my ancestors for another religion about which I know absolutely nothing. But I did it. This is not something I ever tell anyone. Nevertheless I have never forgiven myself."

At a later point in the memoir, Chesler summarizes: "This is an accounting of sorts. A young Jewish American woman once came to this wondrous Asiatic country (Afghanistan) and fled harem life. She finally uncovered the history of what happened to the Jews of Afghanistan and she has told their story in order to redeem her soul. A young Jewish American woman once loved a Muslim Afghan man, and although it could never work out, they continued talking to each other down through the decades of their lives."

Subsequent sinister developments in the world, such as the rise of Al Qaeda, 9/11 and the shocking resurgence of anti-Semitism, become a backdrop for Chesler to apply some of the lessons of her Kabul life. She urges the West to face up to the challenge of arresting and turning back the march of radical, intolerant, xenophobic, violent Islamists.

"I am shaken by the inability of many people to understand that evil and injustice truly exist and that one cannot win every single battle against them. I am even more shaken by the refusal of educated and progressive Americans to understand that the concept of a global caliphate is fuelling thousands of Islamist terrorists, all of whom have explosives and some of whom have nuclear weapons.

"We can and should rescue girls and women one by one and relocate them either within Afghanistan or externally; some groups are doing this. But we cannot rescue every woman in Afghanistan – or stem the tide of Islamist violence against civilians everywhere, not only in Afghanistan, without first defeating the Islamist ideologically, politically, economically and militarily.

"One cannot reason with evil. One must defeat it," Chesler writes.

Her pointed words call to mind an occasion more than a decade ago when she told an assembly of journalists: "If we stand for peace and for justice, we may have to fight for it."

Chesler received the National Jewish Book Award for An American Bride in Kabul: A Memoir. In light of the times in which we live, it is an instructive read. ■

Art for seniors who are not artists

CYNTHIA GASNER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Acclaimed Canadian artist Martin Hirschberg is planning to present a different approach to art for seniors who have never painted.

Hirschberg, who recently sold his business, The Hirschberg Design Group, and now works as an interior design consultant, says he wants to take a new direction in art for seniors.

"I have been asked numerous times where these classes for seniors are offered," says Hirschberg. "At present to my knowledge, they are not – certainly not in the way I envision them."

Along with class discussions on artists and their techniques and hands-on painting, Hirschberg wants to emphasize the social possibilities. "Above all, it must be fun," he says. He notes that he now realizes that many seniors attend book reviews and lectures and look for activities.

"Now that I have more time, I want to bring people together for an enjoyable session, to make new friends and to end up with an original acrylic painting."

Artist Martin Hirschberg plans to offer art classes for seniors.

Hirschberg spoke to The CJN about the benefits for seniors in interacting and enjoying their time together and experiencing something new. He emphasized the importance of social, interactive, non-structured classes.

"To me, there is no such a thing as bad art, and it is important for us to step outside our comfort zones."

The art courses will include a history of acrylic paints, selecting colours and palettes, utilizing paints to produce different painting styles and works, including looking at Andy Warhol, Paul Cézanne, Vincent Van Gogh and the pop art movement. "It should communicate with your feelings."

He adds that experts in gerontology find that creative pursuits provide older adults with multiple benefits, not the least of which is to enhance function.

Statistics indicate that art reduces depression and anxiety and helps individuals to relax. It also offers sensory stimulation.

Hirschberg has shown his paintings in many Canadian galleries and in exhibitions in the United States. His paintings are in the permanent collection of the Art Gallery of Ontario and at the Rotman Gallery in Stratford. He is an active member of the museum committee of Beth Tzedec Congregation as well as a volunteer at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

This spring, Hirschberg will conduct morning and afternoon classes at the Avenue Road Arts School, 460 Avenue Rd., south of St. Clair Ave. West. ■

MICHAEL FERMAN
Robbins Hebrew Academy is pleased to announce that Michael Ferman will be joining RHA as the Director of Admissions and Alumni starting on December 7, 2015. Michael is an alumni of RHA (formerly USDS) and joins RHA from Adath Israel Congregation. We welcome Michael to the RHA community and wish him success in his new role.
About Robbins Hebrew Academy: At RHA, we want students to explore, discover, debate and imagine the possibilities. That's why we offer a cutting-edge curriculum that teaches our students to think critically and globally, in a community that builds self-esteem and lifelong character. It's why our students go on to become society's original thinkers and principled leaders. And it's why RHA is Toronto's first Jewish school to be CAIS accredited, putting us in the company of Canada's finest schools.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:
"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.
The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.
Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."
The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

MARRIED WITH KIDS

Measuring 'Jewish'

Lauren Kramer

"We're not very Jewish, are we, Mom?" The question from my six-year-old daughter Maya blindsided me on a Friday afternoon. The two of us were on a road trip in Olympia, Wash., and as dusk crept stealthily upon us in the mid-afternoon, she realized Shabbat was coming, and our usual celebration thereof was nowhere in sight. A caveat: I'd made challah and Shabbat dinner plans for the family back home before we left, but somehow I'd neglected to make arrangements for the two of us.

My mind started racing. We could pick up grape juice, candles and a challah-substitute from a grocery store in town and make Kiddush in our hotel room, I told her. It was better than nothing, but even as I said it, I knew it would be a pretty flat way to ring in Shabbat with just two of us in attendance. So I started surfing the Internet and learned the city had three synagogues. One of them, a Reconstructionist shul, was just a hop, skip and a jump from our hotel and had regular Friday night services, followed by an Oneg Shabbat. So we purchased an edible contribution to the Oneg and headed over in time for the 7:30 p.m. service.

I'm not overly familiar with the liturgy of a Reconstructionist synagogue, but Jews are Jews, and it was comforting to find ourselves in a Jewish sanctuary, even if the prayer book looked quite different from the one I was familiar with. A group of comparative religion students sat at the back of the synagogue, their cellphones nested in the palms of their hands. As I walked past them to the front pew, I said a silent prayer that they'd have the decency to put the phones away once the service began.

The rabbi was out of town and two lay leaders, clearly thrilled to have a couple of new faces in the room, led the service from the bimah that night. There was lots of singing and light in the shul over the next hour, and at Maya's suggestion, she and I volunteered to light Shabbat candles before the congregation and recite the prayer that welcomes the Sabbath. Later, at the Oneg, we sipped grape juice, munched on challah, hummus and vegetables and chatted with members of the community before heading back to the hotel.

> No matter how many times you go to shul, you have a very special Jewish soul

That's when I started pondering my daughter's comment earlier that day. How Jewish were we? In her books, when compared to our rabbi back home, it didn't seem very Jewish to be out on a Friday night with no plans for Shabbat. She was right, of course. I should have been much better prepared.

Our visit to the synagogue had redeemed the situation significantly, but I needed her to understand that Jewishness was not a gauge measured by synagogue attendance. "You are very Jewish," I told her. "No matter how many times you go to shul, you are Jewish and you have a very special Jewish soul."

Six-year-old eyes looked back at me, clearly wondering what on earth I was talking about. It was true, though. It had been Maya's questions, her prompting that led us to the doors of the synagogue that night. She'd reminded me it was not OK to skip even an occasional Shabbat, that there was no reason to, and especially not when we were strangers in a strange town.

It had taken a little effort to get to the right place at the right time, but we left the synagogue doors feeling connected and deeply comforted by the combination of Shabbat songs, familiar foods and warm "Shabbat Shalom" greetings.

I knew then that if Jewishness were measurable, hers would be one of great depth, even at so young an age. So the next time she wonders how Jewish we are, I'll be able to say with confidence, "Very, my darling. Very, very Jewish." ■

Maharat Rachel Kohl Finegold says mealtime can nourish our bodies and our minds
Rabbi Denise Handlarski sees in the Chanukah lights a reminder to pursue justice
Rabbi Yirmi Cohen suggests that religions need to be more tolerant of each other

Maharat Rachel Kohl Finegold

We have all experienced great dinner conversation. When we break bread as a group, fruitful discussion can flow, and perhaps even transformative ideas can develop.

In this week's parshah, just after the brothers have thrown Joseph into the pit, ostensibly to leave him there to die, the verse states, "And they sat down to eat bread" (Genesis 37:25).

It is unlikely that the brothers could casually break bread together in the wake of such a crime against one of their own. It seems that over the course of that meal, a thoughtful conversation ensued in which the brothers debated the morality of what they had just done. This led Judah to suggest that rather than leave Joseph in the pit, which meant certain death, they could sell him instead to merchants who were heading to Egypt.

According to the Midrash (Pesikta Rabbati 10), the phrase "And they sat down to eat bread" indicates more than simply a moment when the brothers fed themselves. It signifies that they fed the entire civilized world through what developed from that meal. Their decision to sell Joseph was what indirectly led to Egypt's prosperity during famine under Joseph's leadership. This ultimately led to the survival of so many, including Joseph's own family.

It was only because the brothers were willing to re-examine their actions during that fateful meal, to engage in lively and challenging dinner conversation, that they eventually proposed a different solution.

Let's take advantage of our communal meals – whether they are quiet family dinners, or nights out with friends – to create opportunities for thoughtful exchange of ideas. Mealtimes can be nourishing for both body and mind, and can create much food for thought. ■

If ever there was a time we needed the light of Chanukah, it is now. Lately we have seen horrific violence in Israel and terror attacks in Beirut, Paris and Nigeria. We as a global community are on edge. We have seen the darkest of what humanity is capable; we need to find our light.

My wish is that as Jews and Canadians we work hard to combat the darkness that may arise within ourselves and our communities. In Canada, there has been an immediate response highlighting both sides of humanity – the darkness and the light.

On the one hand, a mosque was damaged by arson in Peterborough, Ont., in an ugly display of Islamophobia. But then the community responded by raising in excess of $100,000 to support the mosque in its rebuild. Churches and the one synagogue in town offered up their buildings for Muslim prayer during the rebuilding. The community spoke loudly and clearly that the actions of a few do not represent the feelings of the many. It was a horrible event, with a beautiful response.

Similarly, many Canadians began raising objections to bringing in refugees from Syria, themselves fleeing terror. And yet there is another current that sees the humanity in the refugees. I am inspired by the myriad Jewish voices, across the political spectrum, speaking out against those who would close our borders to those in need. We need to be brave in the face of fear. And we need always to pursue justice.

We fight terror and radicalization in many ways, but part of that fight is acknowledging that love and hope need to be stronger than hate and despair. Isn't that the lesson of Chanukah? Our ancestors banded together to resist oppression. They fought hate. They worked to ensure difference would be respected. The light of Chanukah reminds us of their pursuit of justice, and our call to follow suit. ■

As we begin the Festival of Lights, with the backdrop of chaos in the world, in the wake of tragic events in Paris and Israel, we look to the Torah for inspiration. It's an appropriate time to discuss a mitzvah, "the Seven Noachide Laws," which were given to Noah after the flood to ensure that humanity would not degenerate into a jungle again.

At Mount Sinai, the Jews were charged to be a light unto the nations and to help the world recognize that there is a higher power to whom we are responsible, and who observes and knows our actions. The laws consist of prohibitions against idolatry, blasphemy, homicide, forbidden relations, robbery, and cruelty, along with one positive command: to establish courts of justice.

If enough of us incorporate these laws into our lives, we'd soon see a different world.

It's interesting that many religions say that if one doesn't accept that religion, one goes to hell. Parts of Christianity say that if one doesn't accept Jesus, one merits eternal damnation. In the Qur'an, one is called an infidel. Judaism is unique, as it says that a non-Jew does not need to convert, but only accept the Seven Noachide Laws and he's good the way he is, and goes to paradise. The world's religions need to be more tolerant of each other, as long as they keep these seven laws, not to kill, steal, etc.

Unlike the Shabbat candles, the Chanukah candles are lit when it is dark outside, and the Jew comes to illuminate the darkness. The Maccabees chased away the forces of darkness with swords. We do it with candles. As we gather around the menorah – and add a few calories as we savour those delicious latkes – let's also add more mitzvot. For our brothers and sisters in Israel, France and everywhere, may we merit the time where there will be no more darkness and only light, with the Chanukah menorah, in the Third Temple in Jerusalem, in our days. ■

London exhibit celebrates centenary of Ben Uri collection

NANCY WIGSTON
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A fine exhibit of visual art with Jewish and émigré roots has been drawing enthusiastic crowds to the Inigo Rooms, in London's Somerset House since early July. Two years in the planning, Out of Chaos: Ben Uri: 100 Years in London, on until Dec. 13, has been dazzling visitors with its centenary celebration of works culled from the permanent collection of the Ben Uri Gallery and Museum.

A hundred years ago, the Jewish community in Whitechapel in London's East End, founded an "art society," featuring works by artists of Jewish descent. Eventually the Ben Uri – the art society that began as war raged in Europe and modernism was sweeping the art world –achieved accredited museum status.

Ben Uri is now home to a permanent collection of 1,300 works by 390 artists, ranging across 30 different mediums. Its reach is truly international. A wide variety of artworks greet visitors to Out of Chaos, from 21st-century works like the enchanting Morning Crescent by Frank Auerbach, to mid-20th-century pieces by Marc Chagall and Chaim Soutine, and finally, to very contemporary conceptual pieces.

As co-curator Rachel Dickson explains, the 1915 gallery was "named after Bezalel Ben Uri, the first artist mentioned in the Bible, who decorated the Ark of the Covenant in the Temple in Jerusalem. [The name] also relates to Bezalel School of Arts and Crafts, founded in Jerusalem in 1906." Ben Uri remains the oldest Jewish cultural organization in the United Kingdom.

The themes of "identity and migration" anchor the centenary show, a refocusing, as it were, of Ben Uri's roots that reflects London's evolving multicultural realities. The celebration comes at a crucial time. Ben Uri's temporary home in St. John's Wood means that the public cannot view most of its vast collection, which has grown over the years to encompass migrant experiences both in and beyond Britain.

Ben Uri now describes itself as a "Museum of Art, Identity and Migration," a "very recent change," Dickson says, that came about "following an audit of the collection, when we realized about two-thirds of the works in the collection are by émigrés of some sort or other, born in one country, deceased or practising in another."

Choosing from the museum's vast collection was a daunting task. "The masterpieces of course selected themselves," Dickson says, "but lesser works were much trickier." Masterworks in the show include La Soubrette (1933) by Soutine. Writing in the Financial Times, critic Jackie Wullschlager called the Soutine "the best in the U.K.,... a violently tactile representation of a weary, wary maid in white apron."

Dora Holzhandler's My Grandfather in Auschwitz

Eva Frankfurter's West Indian Waitresses

Marc Chagall's Apocalypse en Lilas, Capriccio

Another stunning, rare piece is Chagall's Apocalypse en Lilas, Capriccio (1945), a work dating from Chagall's years as a war exile in New York.

Alongside famous names like these are also lesser-known artists, including a substantial representation of works by women. A portrait of two West Indian Waitresses, taking their break in a Lyons Corner House, was painted by Eva Frankfurther, whose family escaped Germany for Britain in 1939. Her work shows empathy for faces that were changing London in the 1950s – the same friends she made while working nights at a Lyons Corner House in Piccadilly and painting during the day.

It's hard not to have favourites in a show of this depth, and the exhibit's extensive website (www.benuri100.org) encourages viewers to comment on individual works of art, share their stories both on the site and on social media, and rate the pictures on a scale of one to five stars.

Many people love the painting chosen for the cover of the exhibit's companion catalogue (by Rachel Dickson and Sarah MacDougall). This striking anti-war painting in the modern style, Merry-Go-Round (1916) by artist Mark Gertler, drew praise from such luminaries as writer D.H. Lawrence. Others did not understand its meaning, and there were no buyers for what has become such a "powerful image" in Dickson's words.

Gertler, although frequently lauded by his peers, was unrewarded with success in his lifetime. In 1939, the Londoner of Jewish-Austrian heritage succumbed to despair. His unsold Merry-Go-Round – its vivid oranges and blues, its pleasure-seekers' smiles forever frozen in terror – found a home at Ben Uri, before being sold to the Tate in 1984, when "Ben Uri was in difficult financial circumstances, " says Dickson.

Ironically, it is now Ben Uri that needs to find a new home. Chair David Glasser says a successful search for a large space in central London will complete the evolution of the Ben Uri and create an accessible museum focusing on themes of identity and migration, underpinned by the Ben Uri's own history and collection. (Certainly the timing seems right.) A bid has been made for 30,000 square feet in Piccadilly, just down the road from the Royal Academy. What's needed now are philanthropists and visionaries to share and fund the Ben Uri's vision. ■

Rabbi Ron Kronish: Interfaith dialogue is part of peace

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Rabbi Ron Kronish is a writer, educator and the founder and director of the Interreligious Coordinating Council of Israel (ICCI), a department of the group Rabbis for Human Rights.

The ICCI's mission is to harness the common values of Judaism, Christianity and Islam and transform religion from a force of division and extremism into one of reconciliation and coexistence. It works with about 60 Jewish, Muslim and Christian organizations within Israel, as well as with some international groups.

Rabbi Kronish visited Toronto in early October to participate in the two-part Ralph & Roslyn Halbert Visiting Scholars lecture series, presented by Beth Tzedec Congregation, Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, the Multi-Faith Centre for Spiritual Study and Practice and the Anne Tanenbaum Centre for Jewish Studies.

Along with Sheikh Gassan Manasra, a writer, scholar and director of the Islamic Cultural Center in Nazareth, Rabbi Kronish addressed interreligious dialogue in Israel and the West Bank, and Arab-Jewish coexistence in Israel, at the Multi-Faith Centre and at Beth Tzedec.

The CJN spoke to Rabbi Kronish about the ICCI's work and his vision for peace-building.

Where are you from originally and how did you end up living in Israel?
I'm from New York City and I grew up in Miami. After rabbinical school and after I got an education doctorate, I moved to Israel.

Describe the circumstances that led to you founding the ICCI in 1991.
Another interfaith organization in Israel had fallen on hard times and many people left it and came to me – I was working in a Jewish communal organization at that time – and four or five of us there said, "We need to found something new, but let's start a council of organizations instead of just one." So we founded a council for institutions and started with about 70 member organizations. We grew up alongside the peace process of the 1990s. We came onto the scene as an organization that did interreligious dialogue as a form of peace-building.

What are the ICCI's main activities?
We organize dialogue groups with religious leaders, young adults and educators; we do public education via lectures and symposia in North America, Europe and other places; we do social networking via Facebook and blogging; and we co-ordinate interreligious activism with the Tag Meir Forum to combat Jewish and Muslim hate crimes.

The online description of the lectures you and Sheikh Manasra gave in Toronto says you present an alternative vision of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process – one based not on peace treaties or other political mechanisms, but on interreligious dialogue and interaction. Do you believe that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict can be resolved through interfaith dialogue alone?
Not quite. I would say there are two parts to the conflict. One is political: we'll need a political solution that will be done by the people who do politics. But we'll also need a peace-building solution that's not a piece of paper but a set of guidelines and ways to live together as people, as communities with different religions. That's the part I'm working on.

I don't believe my work will replace the peace process of the politicians, but rather it will supplement it.

The role of interreligious dialogue in times of conflict, when the peace talks have broken down, is to keep the dream alive and hope alive. We continue now to meet Jews, Muslims and Christians inside Israel despite all the difficulties, with the hope that, when the politicians one day reach a solution, we'll be able to do our work in comprehensive ways. We've seen from conflicts in places like northern Ireland and South Africa that when a conflict is solved, people in civil society who'd previously played a quiet role become much more active in helping to cement the peace.

Rabbi Ron Kronish

In Israel, after a peace treaty is made, those of us who are religious leaders, educators, youth leaders, etc. will have to help people on both sides learn to live in peace. In the '90s, when the peace process in Israel was strong and agreements were being signed, many people turned to interreligious dialogue because they wanted to know, "With whom am I going to live in peace?" We can't have one part of the process without the other.

The ICCI has worked for the past several years to quash acts of domestic violence such as the so-called "Tag Mechir" or "price tag" violent acts done by extreme right-wing Jewish settlers. What does the organization's work around this look like?
We've been involved in the "Tag Meir" or "light tag" coalition of Jewish and other religious groups fighting against hate crimes and extremist violence. So, whenever Muslims, Christians or Jews in Israel are hurt by religious violence, we express empathy and are involved in educational programs to counter this.

Israel has a lot on its plate, to put it mildly. But one of the issues that has come to the fore in the past three or four years is the rise of Jewish religious extremism. Most of this has been vandalism, but recently there's also been the killing of innocent Palestinians.

We're pushing against this on three fronts: the law enforcement front – advocating to bring these criminals to trial; the educational front – we lobby the Knesset education committee to create education around this violence; and public sympathy demonstrations, to call attention to these acts. It's a problem that the Israeli prime minister hasn't acknowledged the Jewish extremist violence. There's been some progress in this area, but not enough.

Do you advocate for a two-state solution?
The ICCI doesn't get involved in politics in that way, so we have no explicit stance on a two-state solution.

I would say it's fairly implicit there should be a negotiated two-state solution and that both sides will have to make painful strides for peace, but the ICCI doesn't make statements about that per se. We say peace is our goal and that dialogue, plus education, is our method. I personally don't place all blame for the conflict on one side or the other. A two-state solution isn't perfect, but it's better than the alternatives, and if it does happen, then we still have a long road to go down to truly achieve peace after all these years of conflict.

Even if there is a peaceful resolution tomorrow, our work won't be done. There's the real long-term work to be done around Jews, Christians and Muslims learning to live together. That's a challenge that will take several decades. ■

PLANNING FOR RETIREMENT?

For those waiting for the last minute to do effective, year-end tax planning, this is the last minute!

What are you waiting for? Better late than not at all!

Those born in 1944 must convert their Registered Funds to a RRIF or LIF before the end of the year.
If you still have contribution room and do not have a younger spouse, now will be the last time to make further contributions for deductions this year!
You can even pre-pay contributions for future years if you will continue to have earned income!
The new government will be introducing new rules regarding Income Splitting and changes to income tax rates and tax brackets. There are strategies to use now that could save you taxes, but you must act now to create qualifying income before the end of this year!
Maximize your income while minimizing taxes for RRIFs and LIFs.
There are also very successful strategies for small business owners.

Remembering Louis Rasminsky

Backstory

ALLAN LEVINE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The photographs of Prime Minister Justin Trudeau's new cabinet that show men and women of diverse religions, ethnic groups and backgrounds is yet another example of how much Canada has changed during the past five decades.

Fifty-four years ago, John Diefenbaker's cabinet members were white Protestant and Catholic middle-aged men. The one exception was Ellen Fairclough, the first woman Canadian cabinet minister. There was also Michael Starr, the first Canadian cabinet minister of Ukrainian descent.

That's the way it had always been in Ottawa. Women and ethnic minorities, including Jews, were few and far between in positions of power in government or the bureaucracy. Though by the 1950s several provinces had passed progressive human rights legislation, eliminating blatant discrimination like anti-Semitic property covenants, the upper echelons of Canadian society generally remained closed to anyone but members of the country's Anglo establishment.

In 1961, however, Diefenbaker made one truly enlightening appointment. He selected Louis Rasminsky, a brilliant Jewish banking and finance expert, as the third governor of the Bank of Canada, a position he held until 1973.

The Diefenbaker government had been embroiled in a nasty public feud over monetary policy with Rasminsky's predecessor, James Coyne, who had resigned. Rasminsky was the deputy governor and Canada's key player on the International Monetary Fund. He was the obvious person to replace Coyne. Still, in an era when there were no Jewish executives at Canada's chartered banks, when restrictions on hiring Jews in various professions persisted, and when social clubs had gentile-only membership rules, Rasminsky's appointment was fairly remarkable.

Rasminsky, who died in 1998 at the age of 90, was born in Montreal. His father's family had its roots in Poland and his mother came from a prominent Jewish family in St. Catherines, Ont. As a young man, Lou, as he was called, was a committed Zionist and involved with Young Judaea. The Rasminskys moved to Toronto, and in 1925 Lou graduated from Harbord Collegiate. A stellar student, he was his class valedictorian. He continued his education at the University of Toronto. When he did not win a graduate scholarship to Cambridge, one of his professors convinced a wealthy member of the Toronto Jewish community to create a new scholarship. Owing to that financial support, Rasminsky was able to study at the London School of Economics, an opportunity that changed his life.

In 1930, when he was only 22 years old, he beat out 300 other candidates and was hired by the League of Nations as an economist. As he later told the story, upon receiving the appointment he cabled his girlfriend, Lyla Rotenberg, in Toronto: "Have accepted job League of Nations at 13,700 Swiss francs [per year]. Will you marry me?" She answered: "What is the exchange rate of the Swiss franc?" The couple soon married, though their son, Michael Rasminsky, has said that this oft-repeated anecdote is "apocryphal."

Rasminsky eventually left Geneva and joined the nascent Bank of Canada in 1939. While Rasminsky was a star at the bank, particularly after World War II when he played a key role in establishing a viable international monetary system, his ascension to the position of governor was repeatedly blocked because of anti-Semitism. As his biographer, Bruce Muirhead, has noted, in the early 1950s, MPs asked in the House of Commons "Why it was that a Polish Jew was considered fit to manage the country's foreign exchange?" And in official circles, it was known that the chartered banks did not want a Jew as head of the Bank of Canada. That prejudice held until Diefenbaker became prime minister.

Rasminsky insisted that the country's monetary policy was ultimately the responsibility of the federal government, a significant clarification of the relationship between the government and the bank. Rasminsky tried to adhere to the "Keynesian prescription of maintaining low interest rates to promote job growth." Near the end of his tenure in the volatile early 1970s, he was compelled to set interest rates higher.

Charming with a great sense of humour, Louis Rasminsky was, Muirhead has written, "a man of honesty, integrity, and purpose" and arguably the most "humanitarian" central banker Canada has ever had. ■

Prof is apparently not into queens, and a major archeological discovery

Repulsed by royalty

An Israeli math professor took his oath of Canadian citizenship in Toronto last week, then immediately recanted the part about swearing allegiance to the Queen, calling it "repulsive." He pledged his loyalty to Canada and its people instead. Dror Bar-Natan, 49, was one of three residents who were part of a failed constitutional challenge to the oath that was dismissed by the Ontario Court of Appeals in 2014. But the court said new citizens are free to publicly renounce the royalty portion of the oath if they disagree with it. The University of Toronto professor, who has been in Canada for 13 years, told the citizenship judge in advance of his plans. The judge thanked him for his honesty.

Biblical artifact found in dump site

A 2,700-year-old seal bearing the name of a Judean king was found in an ancient refuse dump at the foot of the Temple Mount's southern wall by archeologists from Hebrew University. The discovery, announced Dec. 2, is the first seal impression of an Israelite or Judean king ever found in a recognized archeological excavation. The 0.5 X 0.5 inch oval seal reads "Belonging to Hezekiah [son of] Ahaz king of Judah," and has an image of a two-winged sun, with wings turned downward, flanked by two ankh symbols. Hezekiah was the Judean king from 727 BCE to 698 BCE. The seal was found in excavations conducted from 2009 to 2013.

Woman allowed to remarry without get

A U.S. woman who was central to Orthodoxy's efforts to reform how it deals with recalcitrant husbands in divorce cases has remarried, after a rabbi annulled her first union because her former partner reportedly didn't disclose his severe mental health issues prior to their nuptials. Tamar Epstein remarried Sept. 24 in Memphis, Tenn., in a halachically recognized ceremony. She wed Aharon Friedman in 2006 and got a civil divorce in 2010, but he still hasn't given her a get. They have an eight-year-old daughter. The Philadelphia rabbi who "freed" Epstein said that had she known Friedman had paranoia and obsessive compulsive disorder, she wouldn't have married him, and thereby annulled the union. ■

Ordaining women as rabbis

Change, as Rabbi Lila Kagedan alluded to in her article, is difficult and slow ("Why Orthodox Judaism needs female rabbis," Nov. 26). The reasoning behind such a shift in a religious belief could possibly take centuries to accept. But why not now?

I am more than sure that Rabbi Avi Weiss, founder of Yeshivat Maharat, where these women received smichah, has the knowledge, credibility and sincerity to conduct this change.

These women are brilliant scholars who, just like their male counterparts, can perform the functions of a rabbi. Call them what you want, they are trained and learned in rabbinical discourse and deserve the smichah they receive. Not accepting these credible and most deservingly incredible achievements is the dilemma for the individual who doesn't accept them.

Even for myself, the challenge of accepting female rabbis will come with a bit of resistance. However, I am reminded of all the changes in my life that I resisted and in time became second nature.

The truth is these women are learned, committed to their heritage and dedicated to our communities.

Elizabeth Bright
Cote St. Luc, Que.

Those critical of the Rabbinical Council of America's rejection of female ordination are welcome to argue with it. However, their arguments should reflect the Jewish talent for analytical thinking, particularly when they come from a rabbi. Rabbi means teacher, and a teacher should, first and foremost, be teaching his or her students to think analytically.

Rabbi Lila Kagedan and letter writer Sofia Freudenstein both bemoaned how the RCA decision diminished their ability to participate in Jewish tradition. Surely, they must acknowledge they are seeking to change tradition.

They are welcome to argue why tradition should change, but they should not try to fool themselves or others by saying they are embracing tradition.

Canada at the UN

The UN General Assembly (UNGA) recently engaged in its annual Israel-bashing session, involving the adoption of one-sided, politically motivated and unconstructive resolutions that condemn only Israel while ignoring the actions of the Palestinians or Israel's other adversaries.

Canada's Jewish community has always viewed Canada's voting record on such resolutions as a litmus test of this country's support for Israel ("Trudeau government backs Israel at United Nations," Dec. 3).

So it was that Jewish support, reflected in votes and financial contributions, shifted from the Liberals to the Conservative Party in reaction to the Chrétien government's practice throughout the 1990s and early 2000s of abstaining on or supporting UNGA resolutions unfairly critical of Israel. By contrast, Stephen Harper's Conservative's record of consistently opposing all such resolutions was overwhelmingly perceived by Canadian Jews as an indication of that government's strong support for Israel.

It is, therefore, encouraging to note that the new Liberal government, led by Prime Minister Justin Trudeau, voted against the resolutions condemning Israel at the UN General Assembly earlier this month. This can be seen as an important indication of continuity from the previous Conservative government to the current Liberal one, both with respect to Canada's vote at the UNGA and this country's strong, non-partisan support for Israel.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Striving for light in a dark world

Putting Chanukah candles in our windows helps us share our values, which include helping others to see that the lives of all victims of terror have worth

RABBI N. DANIEL KOROBKIN
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI LISA GRUSHCOW
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Korobkin: Late last month, I travelled to Sharon, Mass., to pay a shivah call to the family of Ezra Schwartz, the 18-year old yeshiva student who was murdered by terrorists on his way to delivering snacks to IDF soldiers. His death hit hard for so many in our community who have sons and daughters studying in Israel. Ezra was all our sons and daughters.

His death was also marked by a moment of silence at a recent New England Patriots football game, since Ezra was a big fan.

In light of what happened in Paris, the world is starting to be more sympathetic to what Israelis regularly endure. I sometimes feel guilty about my schadenfreude, the satisfaction we sometimes get over others' misfortune. And yet it seems that unless the world is exposed to its own terror, it doesn't feel compassion for Israel's plight.

Rabbi Grushcow: I think that the terrible attacks in Paris reminded all of us that we live in an inherently unpredictable world and that every country can be touched by acts of terror. I lived in New York City before, during and after 9/11, and I remember experiencing a similar sense of vulnerability and fear, empathy and resolve.

What makes terror so terrifying is that it undermines daily life. No one should have to be afraid to go out to dinner, walk through their city, go to their house of worship or send their kids to school. Israelis have been living with this vulnerability for years. We have a lot to learn from their resilience. But I don't think we can do much about the world's double standard vis-a-vis Israel, except to keep bringing forward the human faces of those who live there.

What is more within our hands, it seems to me, is to support victims of terror wherever they are, to recognize that all of us are vulnerable and to live each day with courage and hope, to bring more light and drive out the dark. I think there's a holiday about that.

Rabbi Korobkin: Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik famously said that with the establishment of the State of Israel came the discovery to the world that Jewish blood is not hefker, or free (that, too, was part of the miracle of Chanukah). I think that he may have been overly optimistic, since nearly 70 years later, the world still views Jewish blood as hefker, or at least not as red as other victims of terror.

This makes me sad, not only because of the injustice and double standard, but because this makes it harder for our community to fully mourn without reservation when we read of tragedies anywhere else in the world. There will always be a part of me that thinks, "At least now they know what it feels like to be an Israeli."

So yes, we are very much a part of the rest of the world. But as long as the media turns its back on stabbings of Israelis, as long as the UN resolutions condemning Israel far outnumber those condemning any other country, it seems that the Jew will remain the perpetual outsider.

Rabbi Grushcow: Our ancestors, in their wisdom, taught that the chanukiyah must be placed in the window, where it can be seen by the outside world. This has at least two messages: first, confidence in showing who we are, and second, sharing our light with the world. In the face of darkness, our role is to add to the light.

Personally, I don't feel schadenfreude over others' misfortune. Rather, what seems most important to me, in the simplest terms, is to acknowledge that there is great darkness in the world and to do our best to spread light.

Of course, I want the world to understand that Jewish lives are precious, along with every human life. But I mourn for all the victims of terror without reservation. I fear for a world in which civilian life and civil society are endangered. And I pray for a world in which light prevails over darkness.

To strive for a world of light and peace will require a joint effort. Let our enemies try to differentiate between Jew and non-Jew, or to claim that some lives have less value than others. We have a different task. ■

Lawrence Sager of Toronto Police Services 32 Division celebrates the fourth annual lighting of the large menorah, by the station's front steps to mark the first night of Chanukah, with the help of Chabad Lubavitch. At left are Uptown Chabad Rabbi Moshe Steiner and 32 Division unit commander Supt. Selwyn Fernandes.

From Yoni's Desk

Eight questions for eight nights

The houses of Shamai and Hillel never agreed on much of anything, and Chanukah was no exception. Beit Shamai believed that the candles of the menorah should be lit in descending order – eight candles on the first night, seven on the second, and so on, until only a single flame remains on the eighth and final eve. Beit Hillel argued the opposite – that the lights should be illuminated in ascending order.

As is the case in virtually all disputes between the two schools of thought, Jewish law sides with Hillel, while acknowledging that the opinions of Shamai are not necessarily incorrect nor inferior. And as we celebrate Chanukah, it's important to remember Hillel and Shamai, and the core lesson of their famous disagreements: Judaism is built on a difficult questions and our ability to debate our central issues in a respectful manner.

With that in mind, here are eight Jewish issues worthy of debate this Chanukah.

1. The crisis in Jewish education is deepening, as costs spiral upward and families find it more and more difficult to afford tuition. Is there a solution that can save day schools? And what other forms might Jewish education take?

2. The Conservative and Reform movements are shrinking, while Orthodox Judaism is growing, but increasingly divided. What will it take for Conservative and Reform Judaism to reverse the trend? And is there any way to fix the rift in Orthodoxy?

3. The role of the rabbi is rapidly evolving. So is the Jewish web. As Jewish learning continues to expand online, how might the definition of "rabbi" change? What exactly is the role of the rabbi in an online age? And what role should the Internet play in Jewish learning?

4. As intermarriage rates continue to rise, what is the Jewish response? Is it better to welcome into the fold whomever we can? Or do we risk diluting Judaism to the point of no return?

5. At the heart of Diaspora Jewry is the need to balance support for Israel and the health of our own communities. Should we be focusing more on Israel? Or is the growth of Judaism in the Diaspora an equal imperative?

6. Black Jews, Jews with disabilities, Sephardi Jews, LGBTQ Jews – all have experienced difficulty when it comes to being welcomed into the larger Jewish community. What is being done to make marginalized Jews feel more at home? And how can these groups maintain their unique histories and ideals while also joining the larger Jewish community?

7. The Paris attacks have once again raised serious questions about the future of Europe's Jewish communities. Can they survive, or will many, or most, Jews ultimately leave for Israel and North America?

8. Jewish federations have long stood at the centre of our communities. In many cases, they form the bedrock of our Jewish lives and act as the central nervous system for Jewish organizations and institutions. But for a younger generation, the federation message often doesn't resonate. Can Jewish federations adapt? And how can young Jews contribute to a positive future for our federations?

Some food for thought while you enjoy your latkes.

ESSAY

A personal view of Israel's MDA

Dr. Jason Ohayon

The MDA Canada group with army medics.

"Are you coming with us?" were the initial words my pediatric colleague Dr. Shawna Granovsky asked me last May when inviting me to join the newly launched Magen David Adom (MDA) International Doctors Program.

A staunch supporter of Israel, Granovsky said her dream was to assist the MDA in a way that money could not: with her professional work as a physician, arm in arm with MDA paramedics and emergency medical technicians (EMT), helping Israelis.

Organized by MDA Canada and directed by Daniel Amzallag, a group of 19 doctors from the Greater Toronto Area, Ottawa, Hamilton and Calgary set out on the first mission of its kind, bringing North American doctors to learn about first responders in Israel. When the trip was launched, there was relative calm in Israel. Sadly, all of us who remained committed to the trip realized that by then, there was yet again another conflict terrorizing our Israeli brethren. Nonetheless, with our families' blessings, we set off to learn and help in any way possible.

Our backgrounds varied, including pediatrics, family practice, obstetrics/gynecology, anesthesia, psychiatry and emergency medicine. Nineteen physicians came together for one week all with a common goal: to learn how MDA works and how to assist MDA in helping Israelis. Although all seasoned in our respective specialties, we approached this new opportunity as medical students exposed to their first shift in the ER, with both excitement and trepidation.

To assist us in "easing" into Israeli medical culture, MDA hosted our team for the initial Shabbat. There we met Ilan Klein, a senior MDA EMT, who shared with us what life is like for a first responder to emergencies, including terror.

Forever on call, Ilan answered a "101" call (aka 911) en route to the hotel, while in his Shabbat clothes, as the first call to the scene of a stabbing at gates of the Old City. We could see how every page for help would result in Ilan suddenly stopping his discussion and, in a split second, deciding if the call was near enough for him to assist. As we would quickly learn, Ilan's response was ingrained in all MDA personnel.

After Shabbat, our team was given a tour of how the MDA accesses the Old City of Jerusalem, using the "mule," a modified golf cart, designed to access narrow passageways in each of the four quarters. We were given some precious moments of prayer at the Kotel, the Western Wall, in preparation for our week ahead.

Our team met our EMT instructors, Rephael, 28, Eliezer, 26, and Noa, 22, who instructed us from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. During the week, our team reviewed protocols in advanced life support, learned how to navigate in the "natan," or mobile ICU ambulances. Our tours included the MDA call-in headquarters, Hadassah hospital at Mount Scopus, the Knesset and a medical army base in Binyamin, where we were exposed to a mock MCI, mass casualty incident, in co-ordination with army medical personnel.

Throughout our training time, our team learned two most extraordinary facts: that the majority of the labour force in MDA are volunteers, and that the 650-million NIS (about US $167.5-million) budget is not funded by the government. MDA relies on worldwide donations to assist with 25 per cent of its budget.

Our training culminated with a 24-hour period where each of us was assigned to one of three ambulance stations to assist in a shift covering emergencies in Jerusalem. The ER calls covered adult and pediatric emergencies including assisting with a home childbirth. When calls came in for Arab neighbourhoods, police or army would provide security, often to homes where Arabs were quite gracious about our arrival.

In my case, the head EMT, a devout Palestinian Muslim worked side by side and trust in trust with a devout Jewish EMT who hailed from one of the settlements. We all witnessed unique bonds between Jews of all backgrounds and between Jew and Arab.

Painful as it was to hear of stabbing attacks that would pull away our instructors during the middle of the day, we learned that being part of MDA gave us strength to run, strength to help and strength to show our love to Israelis, a strength that we could not attain in Canada.

We physicians were in awe of the professionalism and pride of all of the MDA staffers we encountered, from the volunteers at the call centres to the blood bank and EMT paramedics, who lived their days being both Israeli and members of the Magen David Adom.

Having received our "License to Save" card as MDA's International Doctors On Call for Israel, I turned to Granovsky at Ben-Gurion Airport and asked, "When are we coming back?" ■

Finding the value in both Chanukah and Christmas

With intermarriage on the rise, interfaith families celebrate the best of both holidays

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

If nothing else, The O.C., the popular 2003-07 American television show that featured the overblown dramas of hyper-privileged Orange County teens and their self-obsessed parents, can be credited with making a household name of "Chrismukkah" – the handy portmanteau that character Seth Cohen used to describe his interfaith family's fusing of Christmas and Chanukah.

With intermarriage on the rise, many Jews in Canada and the United States are partnered or raising children with spouses of Christian backgrounds. Jewish Federations of Canada – UIA's 2011 National Household Survey found that the intermarriage rate in this country is 25 per cent, about half the rate in the United States.

And with Christmas being the centrepiece of the Christian calendar in the West – even for the increasing number of North Americans who celebrate Jesus' birthday only culturally – many intermarried Jews find themselves in a quandary: should they embrace "Chrismukkah," observe Christmas and Chanukah separately, or focus on creating an exclusively Jewish home by just celebrating the Festival of Lights.

While every family's situation is different, it seems that many interfaith couples are finding ways to mark both holidays, but with the emphasis on each one's cultural value.

This lines up with findings from the Pew Research Center's 2013 study A Portrait of Jewish Americans, which notes that younger generations of American Jews – 32 per cent, among Jewish millennials – often identify themselves as Jewish on the basis of ancestry, ethnicity or culture rather than religion. This matched the broader U.S. public's shift away from religious affiliation, which is particularly prevalent among those in the 18-to-29 age range.

As for "Chrismukkah," the Pew report found that about one-third of Jews surveyed said they'd had a Christmas tree in their home the year prior. Among those married to non-Jews, that number was 71 per cent.

Adam Brody played Seth Cohen in the show The O.C. and celebrated "Chrismukkah."

Tyler Irving, 33, isn't Jewish, but his wife, who just gave birth to their first child, is.

"So far, I've found it pretty easy to celebrate both sets of holidays," he said. "We've been thinking about holidays as chances to reflect on culture, spend time with family and build strong bonds and putting less emphasis on the religious aspects," he said.

Because Christmas is when they visit Irving's parents, who live in the country, he expects that his own kids will view Christmas as a time to "be with Grandma and Grandpa," while Chanukah will be "the chance to go to spend time with Bubbie and Zaide."

Arielle Piat-Sauvé, 24, grew up in Quebec with a Jewish mother and a Catholic father.

"We always celebrated both holidays," she said. "We went to my dad's family for Christmas, though we did have a tree and did gifts at our own home. On Chanukah, we'd light the candles and do something with my [maternal] grandma and cousins. When I was younger, I'd get a gift for each night, but that wore off."

If the two holidays coincided, her family would first light the Chanukah candles and then go to her grandparents' for Christmas dinner.

She stressed that neither holiday celebration focused on their religious components, but tradition and family time.

"Often it's easier for families to add than subtract," said Rabbi Jordan Helfman of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple, a Reform synagogue that has among its members quite a few interfaith couples.

Interfaith families with children enrolled in Holy Blossom's supplementary religious school are asked not to celebrate Christmas in their own homes, but going to a non-Jewish relative's place for Christmas is OK, Rabbi Helfman explained.

"My experience is it's not hard for children to make that distinction, especially when the parents are clear about, 'This is what we do in our house, and this is what Grandma does in her house.' Kids are smarter than we give them credit for," he said.

Rabbi Tina Grimberg of Congregation Darchei Noam, Toronto's Reconstructionist synagogue, said her congregation has a number of interfaith families, many of whom get involved in the shul's Chanukah festivities, or who light candles in their own homes.

"Do I go into people's homes and see Christmas trees? Not often at all. Do trees come up in [interfaith congregants'] homes on Dec. 24? Most likely not... though if people do celebrate both Christmas and Chanukah, they don't tell me," she said.

Just because a non-Jewish partner hasn't converted doesn't mean Christmas is central in their life, she emphasized.

And ultimately, when addressing interfaith families' practice of Judaism, there's a larger conversation at play.

Everyone experiences grief differently

Avrum Rosensweig

"They say time heals all wounds, but that presumes the source of the grief is finite." Cassandra Clare, Clockwork Prince

It is said, that when Sarah, the matriarch, heard that her husband, Abraham, was taking their son, Isaac, to be slaughtered – the Akedah – she herself perished out of grief. What would have caused her to do so? Why could she not have survived, despite the fact that her son was about to die?

Grief is a lonely matter. It is a condition from within that causes a person to feel great loneliness, to stare at his or her dreams, to go to a place without hope. "If my son, Isaac, is to die today," perhaps Sarah said, "then I cannot live anymore because he is the reason I breathe. His dreaming is my dream."

And is it not possible that Sarah added, "I cannot bear the pain I will feel because of my boy's demise, and while time might heal all, I would prefer the hands of my internal clock to slow and then stop, for life is not worthwhile without the love of his gaze"?

Why is it that Sarah did not outlast her grief, while others do so?

Could it be that when she heard of the Akedah, grief set in, in the worst way possible? She believed her son was gone, and her maternal love was now without a subject. For she loved Isaac with her entire being.

Abraham, her soulmate, was the executioner, and her relationship with him was beyond repair. How could she show affection to the man who consciously drew a knife from his scabbard to murder their progeny – a boy who had not arrived easily?

And worst of all, God was cruel. Her faith in God was jaded. How might she pray to the King of Kings, the Father of all creation, when part of His plan was to take back her son, Isaac, a child she never believed could be born from her aged womb?

> Sarah's sorrow was great. She grieved to death.

So Sarah's sorrow was great. She grieved to death. All she wanted was gone. Nothing she cherished remained. And she died. Her heart stopped. And she was buried in Hebron, a grieving soul. Nothing else.

I have seen grief countless times in my lifetime, as you have. The grieving daughter. The grieving son. The grieving father. The grieving mother. The grieving grandparents. The grieving friend. The grieving community. A grieving nation.

Its colour – grief, that is – is a sort of grey, on a monochromatic palette of feelings mixed with a fluid we call tears. He who grieves sits before you, at arm's length, yet his presence is adrift, miles beyond the stratosphere, unable to join those experiencing life with joy.

It is true that some, like Sarah, will not outlive their grief, for it is all-encompassing and blocks the way so that the sad one cannot move. And then there are others, who experience loss on a level that seems impossible to overcome – like the concentration camp survivor whose entire family was wiped out. Yet, they do.

Grief is grief. The griever is not to be judged or second-guessed. The level of pain one experiences through grief is one's own, not at all belonging to anyone else. Yet, there is one thing we can wonder about. Why did God make grieving so harsh?

"The darker the night, the brighter the stars, the deeper the grief, the closer is God!" Fyodor Dostoyevsky, Crime and Punishment. ■

A small-town boy comes to the big city

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz

I just moved to New York City from Cote St. Luc, a suburban village that's the closest thing to a shtetl anywhere in Canada. So everyone's been asking me the same question: what's life like in the big city?

It's a good question. When I grew up in Monsey, N.Y., it was a small town, a place where everyone looked out for each other. And like any small-town boy, I still crave that unique sense of camaraderie. Rod Dreher features this small town spirit in his memoir The Little Way of Ruthie Leming. Dreher left his small town in Louisiana as a teenager. After years of city life, he returns when his younger sister is diagnosed with stage 4 cancer. Dreher was so impressed by the communal support given to his sister that he decided to move back to Louisiana. There's simply no community like a small-town community.

Big cities are very different. Ferdinand Tonnies, in his classic work Community and Society, describes the city as dramatically different than small towns: it is built around advancing individual ambition rather than building communal cohesiveness, and as a consequence, is rather cold and impersonal. And to the minds of many, big cities should be avoided. Thomas Jefferson once remarked: "I view great cities as pestilential to the morals, the health and the liberties of man."

So what happens when a small-town boy like me moves to the big city?

Actually, this question is relevant to every Jew, wherever we live, because Jews are fundamentally small-town folk. The Book of Genesis offers an extended critique of big cities. The plans of the first city builders are frustrated by God, and there is marked contrast between the hospitable small-town ways of Abraham and the big-town coldness of Sodom and Egypt.

Yet despite the failures of cities and empires, the Torah does not demand that the Jews remain tent-dwelling nomads. In fact, it encourages us to build a cosmopolitan state with well-developed institutions.

> Jews are fundamentally small-town folk.

So what happens when small-town Jews build a big city? We bring the small town with us. Maimonides teaches that despite the biblical obligation to love one's neighbour, the rabbis added additional obligations to visit the sick, bury the dead, comfort the bereaved, and marry off brides. The point of these additional obligations is that we must do more than love our neighbour. We are obliged to extend beyond our immediate social circle and build community. It is not enough to treat those we know with kindness. We must create an embracing community that cares for all of the sick, each mourner and every bride. And the magic of the Jewish tradition is that even when we build large cosmopolitan societies, we ensure that within them beats the heart of a small-town community.

Israel is an excellent example of this unique small-town ethos. In 2014, Sean Carmeli, a lone soldier from Texas, fell in battle. There was virtually no one to attend the funeral. But after a worried friend posted a Facebook message about it, news spread like wildfire, and in the end, more than 20,000 people attended. This outpouring of kindness could only happen in Israel, where a large country still carries the warmth of a small town.

Now that I've arrived in New York City, I'm learning that in this bustling metropolis, there's a small town hiding underneath. In my first Shabbat at my new synagogue, we honoured the outgoing chair of its bikur cholim committee. This dedicated group visits patients at Sloan Kettering every Shabbat. Here in the middle of Manhattan is a team of volunteers visiting the sick, making this community, like every Jewish community, feel like one big small town.

So what's it like living in the big city? To tell you the truth, as a small-town boy, I feel right at home. ■

Why I feel like wailing at the Kotel

Rabbi Dow Marmur

The Palestinian argument that the reason for the current wave of terrorism in Israel is the result of Jewish provocations on the Temple Mount is spurious. But the preoccupation with the site of the ancient Temple in Jerusalem among Orthodox extremists at one end of the spectrum – they want to rebuild it – and ultra-nationalist zealots at the other – they want to place an Israeli flag on the site – should concern us all.

Both negate the truth articulated by the late Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, one of the sages of our time, that Judaism has no holy places, only holy events. We sanctify time by celebrating Sabbaths and Festivals, not space by venerating sacred sites.

Writing in the Jerusalem Post earlier this year, Amotz Asa-El observed that "the Temple inspired the uniquely Jewish delusion that loyalty to a shrine can replace a nation's loyalty to its land." This delusion tempts today's fanatics to break Israeli law that, by international agreement, explicitly forbids Jews to pray on the Temple Mount.

But even law-abiding citizens and visitors from abroad seem to be obsessed with the Temple. That's probably why they flock to what's left of one of its outer walls, the Kotel, the ancient symbol of pious devotion. Since the Israeli victory in the 1967 war, it has also become a powerful reminder of Jewish sovereignty. What was once for some the Wailing Wall has become for all the Western Wall.

I always think of Rabbi Heschel's dictum on the few occasions I visit there. Sometimes I also remember another sage, the staunchly Orthodox Yeshayahu Leibowitz. When the plaza was built at the site to accommodate visitors he named it provocatively the "Dis-Kotel." He considered it showbiz, not Judaism. For others it's politics.

That Orthodox Jews, who include prayers for the restoration of the Temple in their daily liturgy, and non-religious Israelis, who remember the spectacular capture of the Old City of Jerusalem in 1967, should venerate the site is understandable. But why Reform Jews should be equally committed to it is puzzling.

Some are active members of the Women of the Wall, the group that has had a lot of publicity over the years. It marks every Rosh Chodesh with a service in the women's enclosure of the Wall that usually attracts much publicity and occasionally leads to unseemly police intervention.

The politics of the group is laudable, as it seeks to break the monopoly of male-dominated Orthodoxy. I can see why Orthodox women, who understandably see themselves as second-class Jews in their traditional services, should want full equality, including reading from the Torah, not just listening when men chant it. Belonging to Women of the Wall is one of their ways of protest.

But why do Reform Jews flock to the site to pray at a segregated service? Reform worship has removed the prayers that ask God to restore the ancient Temple. And services that separate women and men are out of bounds in Reform congregations. At the Wall, however, political expediency seems to have replaced religious integrity.

As a compromise for those who care about gender equality, the Jewish Agency, which is focused on the Diaspora, where Reform and Conservative Jews dominate, has helped secure space nearby for egalitarian services. This may be acceptable to those who oppose separation between women and men, but it remains problematic for disciples of Rabbi Heschel and Leibowitz.

Now we hear that even this arrangement may not last. The ultra-nationalist organization Elad, which, over the years, has systematically encroached on Palestinian property in the area, has been given control over an archeological site nearby, which may make it impossible for the egalitarian services to continue. What the government gives with one hand its supporters seem to take away with the other.

Some may bewail the situation. As for me, I feel more like wailing when I watch Reform Jews compromise their religious principles for the sake of political gains. ■

A mixed-marriage Christmas

Michael Coren

Does nostalgia tint our vision and memory with warmth and joy? Perhaps. But try as I might, I cannot remember anything but happiness growing up in the 1960s in Britain with a Jewish dad and a non-Jewish mother when Christmas came around.

I was raised without any religion, but with a certain if limited Jewish cultural identity. I was always far more British than Jewish and, in a way, by implication more Anglican than Jewish. We had a mezuzah on the door and, come December, a Christmas tree in the front room. Mind you, it was only a medium-sized tree, and we brought it down from the attic every year, unfolded its cheap, tinsel branches and hung ornaments on it. No crosses, no Jesus, no crèche, no Virgin Mary. That would be have been inconceivable, even by immaculate standards.

I remember the Salvation Army coming to the door one year and singing carols. Suddenly they stopped, and we heard a man explaining to his uniformed choir that it might be rude to sing about Jesus outside a house where, as he had noticed from the mezuzah, a Jewish family lived. It was so delicately and sensitively put. Not political correctness, but Christian charity. My dad ran to the door, asked them to please continue singing, and then put as much money as he could in their collection tin.

My parents would no more have gone to church than to synagogue, at least at any time that didn't involve a wedding or a funeral. Yet dad never worked Yom Kippur. He was a London cab driver at a time when around one-third of all of the black cabs in the city were driven by Jewish men. If he'd been seen working by non-Jewish cabbies on the Day of Atonement, they would have been shocked and told their Jewish friends when they returned to work.

The only other time dad didn't work was Christmas Day, which was always to be spent with the family. So Phil Coren worked until 2 a.m. on Christmas Eve to try to make up for the money he lost by not working the following day. It wasn't because he was mean with money – far from it – but because he supported a family of four on his single income, and we were not wealthy by any means. Thank God for public education, the National Health Service and British social democracy.

> My parents would no more have gone to church than to synagogue, at least at any time that didn't involve a wedding or funeral.

What has always hurt me is that I didn't realize the reality of it all. I would wake up at seven in the morning on Christmas Day, see the sack of presents at the end of my bed and rush to my parents' bedroom screaming, "He's been, he's been!"

I could never understand why my dad seemed so tired, so lacking in interest. The poor man had had five hours sleep after a 16-hour working day so as to buy what "He" who had "been" had left me. I wish Dad was here now, so I could tell him that I was so, so grateful to him for it.

Christmas Day was Frosty the Snowman and Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer on television – no videos then – followed by a big lunch and then family visits in the evening. Mum's parents gave me more gifts, Dad's parents didn't – they were the children of east European immigrants and Christmas to them was still something alien. I should have been more understanding of all that, but, truth be told, I resented them for it.

I loved the carols, I loved the sense of goodwill to all, I loved the vague ideas I had of the Christmas story of magic made flesh. I loved the whole thing. But most of all, I loved my mixed marriage parents, who showed me the joy of Christmas. ■

Congregations prepare to welcome Syrian refugees

plungen@thecjn.ca

As a wave of Syrian refugees begins to enter Canada, two Jewish groups – one in the GTA and another in Ottawa – are waiting for word that their sponsored families will be arriving in Canada soon.

The two refugee families could arrive by the end of December. All the paperwork has been completed and all that remains is for the final travel arrangements to be concluded, said Lia Kisel, language and settlement director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Toronto (JIAS).

"We believe that because it was put together so fast, they may be coming very soon," she said.

JIAS is a sponsorship agreement holder (SAH), permitting it to facilitate immigration to Canada. It is operating in co-operation with 25 Jewish groups, many associated with Toronto-area synagogues, to sponsor refugee families. Each group is expected to raise at least $27,600 for a family of four, while many of the sponsoring groups are also collecting furniture, clothes and lodging, while volunteering services such as medical and dental care for the expected arrivals.

Kisel declined to reveal which groups are expected to be first in line to receive Syrian refugees, but the members of several Toronto-area synagogues have been working to prepare for the arrival of their sponsored families.

In Oakville, Shaarei-Beth El Congregation has raised $5,000 as its share of the sponsorship fee, in a joint effort with a local church and a Muslim group associated with the ISNA Mosque.

"We understand that our refugee family has been approved. Now we wait to hear the exact arrival date likely by the end of December. Then we go to the airport to pick them up," said Rabbi Stephen Wise.

"In the meantime, ACT, the partnership with the Muslim and Christian communities, together have several committees working hard – a housing committee finding an apartment, a food committee collecting halal goods, a clothing committee organizing clothing drives, a furniture committee, a health committee to help them with getting OHIP cards and doctor and dentists and possible mental health, and a transportation committee to help them with carpools and navigating the GO bus system. We are ready when they get here," he said.

As Chanukah approached, the congregation was planning to make this year's celebration even more meaningful.

"As part of our Chanukah celebration, we are doing the food drive as a way for our youth to give gifts instead of receiving gifts each day. The food drive culminates in a communal candlelighting on Friday night, Dec. 11, when the mayor, the town council, the regional chair and leaders of the interfaith community will join me on the bimah to light the lights of freedom."

Members of Congregation Darchei Noam were perhaps the first to seek out a Syrian family to sponsor. Tema Smith, manager of communications for the synagogue, said "we're not sure yet when our family is arriving."

Rabbi Stephen Wise

As they wait, synagogue members active in the project are now "collecting furniture, clothing from our members in as-good-as-new condition so they can be set up in comfort," she said.

Synagogue volunteers are also prepared to find an apartment for the family to live in. In addition to volunteers from the synagogue, other members of the Jewish community have pledged financial support and provided other materials to help settle the new arrivals.

Holy Blossom Temple is planning to sponsor two Syrian families. According to synagogue spokesperson Jacqueline Friedland, the family is currently in Turkey and is not expected to arrive until late spring.

"There are a large number of volunteers who have begun to collect clothing, books, household items, furniture. Others have stepped forward to volunteer as tutors, to provide a wide variety of health care services, to potentially assist with employment, and possibly housing," she said.

"The family we are sponsoring have some relatives already in Toronto. We will co-ordinate with them about how best to welcome the family and provide ongoing support as they adapt to life in Canada.

"We are eager to welcome new families to Canada and help make their transition as easy as possible, recognizing the difficult circumstances that they have faced over the recent past," she added.

Abby Robins at City Shul said the synagogue's membership has risen to the challenge of raising money and preparing the ground for a refugee family, once they arrive in Canada.

When that is, "I don't know," said Robins.

In the meantime, the members have volunteered material goods and are prepared to help the new arrivals set up with OHIP, find doctors, take them to appointments and help in other ways to acclimatize them to Canada. Services have already been volunteered from a pediatrician and a psychologist.

"Refugees hit home for Jews. We're doing what people didn't do for us," she said.

Alla Mazor, a settlement worker at Jewish Family Services in Ottawa, said the agency is facilitating two refugee family sponsorships by a number of Ottawa residents. As for when they might expect the family, "it could be soon, but we don't know how soon." ■

Vancouver Jews rally to help Syrian refugees

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT

Vancouver's Jewish community has rallied to the cause of the Syrian refugees. Fundraising efforts are well underway to bring refugee families to British Columbia in early 2016.

The most public face of the Jewish fundraising efforts has been Rabbi Dan Moskovitz of Temple Sholom, the city's largest synagogue with 720 member households. He was galvanized into action by the image of Alan Kurdi's drowned body on the beach, and delivered a powerful sermon during Yom Kippur.

"We would all save the child, because children are all innocent. But to love the stranger you have to take the parents too, you have to love the Syrians who were taught to fear and hate Israel, to fear and hate… Jews. In these [refugee] numbers the world is dealing with, too many innocents will die while we carefully screen for the next Bin Laden. I want to ask you to save a life, the life of a stranger – because we were once strangers in the land, because we are human beings and that is the only similarity that we really need."

Rabbi Dan Moskovitz

Within a few days of that sermon, the congregation had raised $40,000, enough to sponsor one Syrian refugee family's resettlement in British Columbia. It's now fundraising for another $40,000 to sponsor a second family and is collaborating with the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV), the Anglican Archdiocese and Mosaic, an immigrant service organization in Vancouver.

Rabbi Moskovitz's efforts attracted national press coverage that generated more donations and letters of support from around the world, many from the Muslim community. Support from his congregants for the refugee initiative has been "mostly unanimous," he said.

"A handful of congregants have expressed concern that we're importing people who might hate us, and I met with them. They want us to be intentional in how we do this, but everyone wanted to help."

Rabbi Moskovitz said the congregation had opted to be "agnostic" in terms of the religious identities of the families it has chosen to sponsor. Both are Kurdish families: one with two children ages five and three whose parents are a medical doctor and a lab technician, and the other a newly wedded couple, ages 18 and 20.

"We're completely responsible for them financially for the first year – for meeting them at the airport, arranging housing, food and clothing," he said. Mosaic will take care of language training, job training and cultural integration. Both sponsorships involve family reunification and both families already have family in Vancouver.

"There's a rabbinic imperative from our tradition to try to unify a family, so we felt a Jewish obligation to work towards that," he said.

As chair of the Canadian Council of Reform Rabbis, Moskovitz added that every sizable Reform congregation in Canada – approximately 20 – is sponsoring refugee families.

"We've also just created a partnership between Reform congregations in Canada and the U.S. It will give the 950 American Reform congregations an opportunity to co-sponsor refugee families with us and offer material support, care packages and organizational assistance."

Congregation Or Shalom, Vancouver's Reconstructionist synagogue, also created a Syrian refugee initiative just before Rosh Hashanah, with the goal of sponsoring three refugee families. To date it has raised $80,000 and has been holding events to raise an additional $40,000. "We trust that the government has a good screening process," said Natalie Grunberg, who is helping spearhead the initiative.

"We understand that these refugees are people just like us who need to find a safe place. As Jews, that really resonates with us, so we've not had too many concerns from members of our community and any concern people have is usually out of ignorance."

In October, the JFGV sent a $10,000 donation from its emergency fund to the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) to support the welfare needs of Syrian women and children refugees, and to provide psychological support to front-line staff. Federation has opted to work as an intermediary with the Anglican diocese, Mosaic and Jewish community partners including synagogues, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and Jewish Family Service Agency.

At Mosaic, Mustafa Ahmad, a Kurdish settlement worker who left Syria for Canada in 1990, is helping the Jewish community select the families for sponsorship.

> We understand that these refugees are people just like us who need to find a safe place.

"In screening potential families, I'm trying to make sure they're not anti-religion and specifically not anti-Semitic," he said. His process involves interviewing Vancouver-based relatives of those families to ensure they are aware that the sponsorship is by the Jewish community. "If they're from the Kurdish community, I'm from the same area and I know the values, traditions and customs over there," he added.

Congregation Schara Tzedeck in Vancouver has opted to aid the refugee crisis by raising money for the JDC to help refugees on the ground. "We're also raising money for the Rambam Hospital in Israel which provides medical treatment to victims of war, through Canadian Friends of Rambam Hospital," Rabbi Andrew Rosenblatt said.

At Richmond, B.C.'s Beth Israel Synagogue, Rabbi Howard Siegel said his board was still discussing how they would help the Syrian refugees, but said there was strong interest from many members in providing assistance.

"We want to see what's going to happen here before committing our resources, before determining where we can get the most bang for our buck. The elephant in the room here is what is going to be the role of the Muslim community in B.C.? How involved will they be in this refugee effort?"

According to Daud Ismail, president of the B.C. Muslim Association, the Muslim community, which numbers between 50,000 and 80,000, is actively gathering support. The BCMA has applied to be a Sponsorship Agreement Holder, documentation that will allow it to sponsor families. In the last four to six weeks the community has raised $50,000 and hopes to raise another $300,000 in December to sponsor up to five refugee families. It has also set aside warehouse space for storage of donated furniture and household items.

"There are up to 25 Muslim organizations working with us and they're collecting money independently, too," Ismail said. "We don't care if we sponsor Muslim or Christian refugees – we're going to help as many refugees as possible." ■

Paul Penna only Jewish day school to sponsor refugees

sshefa@thecjn.ca

When Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School parent Angus Grant reached out to his school community to raise funds to sponsor a Syrian family of refugees, he was overwhelmed by the response.

"It became very clear, very quickly that there was this very strong desire to do something about the situation and so the response was pretty overwhelming... Within about two weeks, or less than that, we raised about $34,000," Grant said.

He said that as an immigration refugee lawyer, he understood that the refugee crisis in the Middle East was one of "epic proportions and one that really is the biggest since the Second World War, and the responses to it were happening kind of slowly.

"It was something that began percolating in my mind last year and this year, as news of the situation became more and more grave, I approached our principal, Dan Goldberg, and he was more than receptive to the idea and really saw it as fitting in with the school's commitment to social justice, with its commitment to really putting tikkun olam into practice with the school."

With the support of the school's board of directors, he reached out to the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), which had been working with other Jewish organizations on a response to the Syrian refugee crisis.

Jodi Block, a community integration specialist with JIAS, said while there are a number of Jewish congregations in Toronto that have initiated the sponsorship of Syrian refugees, Paul Penna is the only Jewish day school in Toronto to do so.

Grant said the school community raised the funds, which were collected by JIAS. The agency is providing logistical support and handling the legal side of the process.

He said the amount you raise determines the size of the family you can sponsor.

"It's based on a formula that the government puts in place and how much support the people will need to provide for their basic needs in the first year after they arrive. That's what the money covers. For a family of four, it's about $27,000 and change, for a family of five, it is about $29,000 and change. So our goal was to sponsor a family of five and to have money over and above that to cover some of the costs that are not covered by the process."

Grant said that although the goal was to sponsor a family of five, JIAS identified a particular family it wanted to pair the school with. "I received an email from them saying... 'There was a family that had been a family of five but the father and principal provider to the family had been killed in a bomb that also destroyed their house.' They left and are in Turkey now. It's a mother and twins who are five and an older child who is seven... That is the family that we are in the process of helping."

He said one of the most "touching" aspects of the fundraising initiative was the fact students also took it upon themselves to get involved. "It's an SK to Grade 6 school, so these aren't big kids, but they really kind of absorbed the gravity of the situation, so through their student council, they did their own fundraising drive and a spare change drive, and in just over a week, they raised $1,000."

Grant said he didn't encounter members of the school community who opposed the initiative based on fear terrorists might come to Canada under the guise of being refugees. "Even after the whole Paris situation... I think there was a recognition that millions of regular, ordinary civilians are being displaced in the civil war and are... the much more immediate victims of terrorism."

He said the funds have been raised and the family has been identified, but he doesn't expect them to arrive in Toronto until spring. "The government really is doing everything they can to expedite the process. We assume once we get the paperwork in, that they will process it very quickly and then it depends on how quickly they can get exit visas from Turkey," he said.

Grant said the school's involvement provided a valuable lesson to parents and students about their role as global citizens and working to repair the world.

"Displacement, persecution, family separation – these are concepts that Jews intrinsically understand and so I think that's also part of the reason why the response to this situation has been so forthcoming." ■

They'll always have Paris: PMs' meeting called warm

plungen@thecjn.ca

The Canada-Israel relationship appears to have gotten off to a good start under the new Liberal government following a meeting last week between the prime ministers of the two countries.

Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met in Paris while attending the UN conference on climate change, and by all accounts, things went well. The public statements were positive, the meeting was described as warm, and in somewhat of a throwback to the days when Kremlinologists used any clue to determine the state of affairs in Moscow, Israeli Ambassador Rafael Barak noticed that Benjamin Netanyahu wore a red tie to the meeting, while Justin Trudeau wore a blue one.

Of course, that little factoid – suggesting very subtle diplomatic signals – was a small part of a broader analysis of the meeting that Barak provided The CJN, which was upbeat and positive.

The meeting, which lasted only about half an hour, was friendly, and it appeared there was good chemistry between the leaders. Barak pronounced himself pleased with its outcome. "This was a good meeting. People are happy," he said. "For us diplomats, it was a good signal for us to develop our relationship."

The two leaders discussed regional issues and continued commercial co-operation on a variety of fronts, and Netanyahu invited Trudeau to visit Israel, Barak said.

Trudeau later said it would be his "pleasure" to visit. "We have many issues to talk about, to discuss, but also many issues to collaborate on. And I look forward to continuing the strong friendship that Canada has shown towards Israel for decades and will continue in ongoing times," Trudeau added.

Even before Paris, it appeared the Trudeau government was intent on retaining close relations with Israel. "We are getting a lot of positive signals," Barak said.

The ambassador noted Trudeau's vocal opposition to the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement, as well as the intention to maintain "cyber co-operation" and various commercial endeavours. Canada's recent UN votes on issues concerning Israel were also seen in a positive light, Barak said.

Observers of the relationship could also point to other signals that ties will remain warm and supportive. They include the description of Israel by Trudeau and Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion as an "ally," not just a friend, as well as Trudeau's comments criticizing an EU decision to label products originating from the West Bank.

University of Toronto professor Nelson Wiseman isn't surprised that relations continue to remain good between the two countries. Canadian policy under the Harper government was consistent with that of the previous Liberal government, other than at a rhetorical level. Under the Tories, Canadian policies changed only at the edges, in terms of funding certain Palestinian groups, he said.

Looking ahead, "I don't think things will change much, except the Liberals will give more space to the Palestinians," which could translate into more contact with Palestinian leadership in the West Bank, he said.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is pleased with the way the Canada-Israel relationship has unfolded under Trudeau. "The [Paris] meeting was warm. Mr. Trudeau responded affirmatively to the invitation to come on an official visit to Israel," said CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel.

Trudeau acknowledged that the relationship between the two countries was deep and warm, which Fogel called, "an implicit reference to the previous government.

"We were very pleased with the tone and the substance of the meeting, and gratified with the signals the government is sending regarding the stability of the relationship and the desire to see it grow," Fogel added.

"I am delighted that Trudeau and Netanyahu met personally. It is always better to reinforce in person what has been said in the press about policy and platform. It's important for our Jewish community here in Canada to see, as well as all citizens of Israel," said Karen Mock, a spokesperson for JSpaceCanada.

"They can rely on Canada to support Israel, its right to exist and its right to safety and security. With that commitment, I look forward to Canada's more active and more effective role in a peace process, in promoting Canada-Israel relations through honest discussions of human and civil rights, and in more effective negotiations at UN than we have seen in the last several years," she added. ■

Canada votes against UN motion on glorifying Nazism

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Canada has voted against, and Israel for, a United Nations resolution against glorifying Nazism that is being perceived as part of a Russian campaign to smear its neighbours.

The resolution, which passed in the UN's Third Committee Nov. 19 and now heads to the General Assembly, is part of Russia's "rhetorical war against Ukraine and the Baltic Republics in which all non-Russian nationalism is discredited as being fascist and akin to the Nazi collaborators of the World War II era," according to Hillel Neuer, executive director of the Geneva-based group UN Watch.

Canada was one of just four countries to vote against the measure, which called on nations to fight the "glorification of Nazism and other practices that contribute to fuelling contemporary forms of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and related intolerance."

It also encourages states to take legislative and educational measures "to put an end to all forms of Holocaust denial" and welcomes the preservation of former Nazi death and labour camps.

As well, the resolution recognizes "with deep concern the alarming increase in instances of discrimination, intolerance and extremist violence motivated by anti-Semitism, Islamophobia and Christianophobia and prejudices against persons of other religions and beliefs."

It is common for "non-democracies to misuse the language of human rights to promote political agendas, and that's what Russia is overtly doing here," Neuer told The CJN via email.

Israel voted for the resolution, as it did a year ago, because the country "cannot vote anything but 'yes' to a resolution against Nazism, as it also includes a condemnation of anti-Semitism," said Eitan Weiss of Israel's embassy in Ottawa.

Voting no were Palau, the United States, Ukraine and Canada, which voted against it last year as well, as did the United States and Ukraine.

The resolution was brought forward by Russia and submitted by 41 countries, including China, Cuba, Sudan, Myanmar, Pakistan and 17 African nations, including Nigeria. It passed with 126 yes votes and 53 abstentions, which came from European Union countries and Japan.

It is "no surprise" that the co-sponsors of the Russian text are almost all non-democracies and that western countries mostly abstained, Neuer observed.

"These kinds of texts, which include both legitimate and distorted language, can present countries with the dilemma of looking bad no matter how they vote," he added.

> [Countries face] dilemma of looking bad no matter how they vote

The U.S. delegate agreed the resolution was politicized and expressed concern that Russia was using it to carry out a political attack against its neighbours.

Several times, the document references the controversial 2001 World Conference Against Racism, held in Durban, South Africa, which was widely criticized for its strident anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist language. It "reaffirms the relevant provisions of the Durban Declaration and of the outcome document of the Durban Review Conference."

The United States and Israel withdrew from the first Durban conference in 2001 citing its anti-Semitic tone.

Canada was one of nine countries to boycott the 2009 conference. At the time, Ottawa said the decision was made because of the "open and divisive expressions of intolerance and anti-Semitism" at the 2001 gathering.

In 2011, Canada said it would not participate in the "charade" of a 10th anniversary commemoration of the Durban "hate fest."

In a statement to The CJN, spokesperson Tania Assaly of Foreign Affairs, Trade and Development Canada said this country is "strongly opposed to the glorification of Nazism and all forms of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and intolerance. We are deeply concerned by the rise of neo-Nazism in many parts of the world, and are committed to eliminating racism and discrimination, in all their forms."

However, "the resolution put forward at the United Nations General Assembly on the glorification of Nazism regrettably includes references which are counterproductive to this goal and seek to limit freedom of expression, assembly and opinion. Canada did not, therefore, vote in favour of the resolution."

Canada was blunter a year ago, when it explained that it had not supported the same resolution because it referred to the "highly politicized and anti-Semitic outcomes" of the 2001 Durban conference.

Explaining his vote this year, the delegate from Ukraine said his country had been among those that had suffered the most during World War II, but that the text had nothing to do with fighting Nazism, neo-Nazism and other forms of intolerance. ■

Broadcaster's new Mideast coverage rules welcomed

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Michel Cormier

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is claiming a significant victory in its long-running dispute with Radio-Canada over its Middle East coverage.

The advocacy group hails new guidelines to journalists covering the Israeli-Palestinian conflict for the French-language broadcaster, issued by Montreal bureau chief Michel Cormier.

The guidelines are aimed at ensuring balance and objectivity.

"Our role is to report the facts and present the context in which they happen, regardless of the emotion that the subject can give rise to," the guidelines state.

Since 2007, CIJA has filed numerous complaints with Radio-Canada over what it views as reporting that is inaccurate or biased against Israel. The coverage of the deadly wave in terrorism by Palestinians over the past two months has prompted a series of objections from CIJA to the network's ombudsman, Pierre Tourangeau.

Cormier says that the conflict is "often controversial and always delicate," and cautions journalists that coverage is "scrutinized under a magnifying glass by certain interest groups for the least error of fact or interpretation."

Cormier notes the many complaints the ombudsman has received on this subject over the years, and though only a "tiny minority" have been upheld by the ombudsman, "nevertheless, we can and must take all appropriate measures to reduce the number."

Cormier is a veteran Radio-Canada and CBC journalist who served as foreign correspondent in Beijing, Moscow and Paris. He assumed his present post in 2012.

He acknowledges that determining the facts is especially difficult in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, because, even within the parties, there is disagreement on what they are. Therefore, he counsels that journalists take the time to "attribute each fact and its interpretation to the group that defends it."

They should also bear in mind the conflict's long history, with its periods of discord and relative calm, he said, and the current geopolitical reality.

"The more we remember the historic context of the events that we cover, the more we give our public points of reference to better understand the sense."

He counsels against "synthesizing" a single Palestinian and a single Israeli position in an attempt to make a complex situation more comprehensible, as a wide diversity exists among each people.

Digital media offer a way of providing more background to news stories, he suggests.

However, Cormier advises "the greatest discretion" in the use of social media. "It takes one comment to damage the credibility of our whole coverage."

The guidelines also address the selection and identification of in-studio guests. Cormier cites the case of Rachid Antonius, a Université du Québec à Montréal sociology professor and frequent commentator on the Middle East in the media – the subject of one of CIJA's more recent complaints.

Cormier says he does not share the opinion that Antonius is not qualified to speak on the subject, but the host or journalist should situate his and other guests' interest in the debate.

Harder to correct is the "tone" of coverage, which CIJA has cited, specifically an "aggressive tone" used in interviews by two hosts with the Israeli consul general on the Israeli military operation in Gaza in 2014, which resulted in hundreds of mainly civilian deaths.

"Even if the complaints against our two hosts were not upheld [by the ombudsman], it is important to show restraint in this type of situation. That does not mean showing indifference to the victims of a drama. But it is not up to we journalists, to get indignant about a situation, as terrible as it is…

"Our audience will decide the emotion that they feel toward a situation. We are not to suggest theirs by our own."

David Ouellette, CIJA Quebec's associate public affairs director, hailed the establishing of the guidelines as "huge" and, by implication, "really damning.

"Radio-Canada has systematically failed to uphold its own journalistic norms. It is clear in our minds they have not been doing their job thoroughly. They are acknowledging a systemic problem in reporting on Israel," he said.

In CIJA's opinion, Radio-Canada journalists have shown a "clear bias" against Israel. Among young reporters, Ouellette attributes much of that to "ignorance." More worrisome is the network's high-profile seasoned journalists who "wear their bias on their sleeves."

Interfaith families respect both traditions

"It's about how to live life in a Jewish context when you have deep roots in another reality. It's not about, 'I'm Jewish because I don't celebrate Christmas.' It's 'How many Jewish things do I do…do I do Shabbat, go to synagogue, have a seder, do mitzvot, say Shema in the morning?'" she said. "Some people will still have a tree, because it honours their grandma, while others feel they have enough of a rich Jewish life that they no longer need it," she said.

Rabbi Jillian Cameron is director of the Boston chapter of InterfaithFamily, a U.S. organization that supports interfaith couples exploring Jewish life. It provides families with educational materials and connections to inclusive organizations, programs and local clergy.

She stressed that while she doesn't see a single trend with regard to how families led by intermarried couples approach the holidays, at this time of year many of them are focused on figuring out how to be respectful of both Chanukah and Christmas, whether they celebrate the holidays in their own home or that of an extended family member.

While Christmas can be tough to give up for many who are raised with it, Rabbi Cameron said, the religious element is secondary to "the family connections, the music, the smells, the tree… there's a big pull to the sensory nature of Christmas."

She added that this speaks to the wider trend of younger people finding value in religion, but for things outside of the theological realm.

While families with one Jewish and one Christian parent observe the holidays at this time of year in all sorts of incarnations, it's clear that many, as in the general population, are most concerned about preserving tradition and a sense of family togetherness. ■

Journalist not faulted

In his most recent review of a CIJA complaint, issued Nov. 26, Tourangeau found no fault on the part of journalist François Brousseau in his analyses of the violence in Jerusalem on the program Midi Info on ICI Radio-Canada Première on Oct. 5 and 9.

Tourangeau concludes that Brousseau publicly acknowledged and corrected the inaccuracies.

In a Nov. 18 review, the ombudsman sided with CIJA in its complaint about the inaccuracy of a report on the ICI RDI program Téléjournal on Sept. 30, also about tensions in Jerusalem. Ouellette pointed out that it was "completely false" that Palestinians, unlike Jews, are not allowed to pray at the Temple Mount.

The ombudsman agreed that the error and the failure to correct it immediately contravene Radio-Canada's Normes et pratiques journalistiques. ■

Correction

The Nov. 26 article "Two years in, business accelerator seen as a world leader" mistakenly referred to the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC) as the Russian Jewish Community Centre. The CJN apologizes for the error.

There's always a light burning at SickKids, too.

It's a light of healing and hope for every family, which never goes out – 24/7/365. At this season of light in the darkness, we celebrate the contribution of the Jewish community to SickKids, and we wish all a Happy Chanukah.

Rabbis, bishops meet to improve Catholic-Jewish ties

sshefa@thecjn.ca

In an effort to improve the historically fraught relationship between the Jewish and Catholic communities, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops (CCCB) and the Canadian Rabbinic Caucus (CRC) convened late last month for the first national, bilateral dialogue between the two groups.

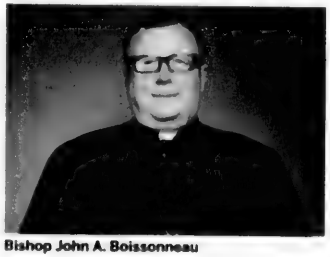
Launched as part of the 50th-anniversary celebration of Nostra Aetate, the declaration by the Second Vatican Council that rejected anti-Semitism and underscored the Jewish roots of Christianity, the first meeting in Ottawa was attended by some 30 bishops and 15 rabbis. It addressed the importance of changing Catholic perceptions of the Jewish community, Israel's significance to Jews, and working together to achieve common goals.

"For many people who do not come out of a historic awareness, they assume that Jews and Catholics have always sort of gotten along and there is no real awareness of the historic conflict and difficulty that we experienced," said Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, one of the representatives from the CRC, an affiliate of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). "We believe that there is still a lot of work to be done in bringing to a parish and congregational level the awareness of what had been the historic teaching of contempt, where that had led to, and how the Church has been engaged in a long process of tshuvah in turning away from that old teaching."

He said one key point of discussion is that "it is impossible to understand Jewish life in the 21st century without coming to grips with the two events of the 20th century that were so significant for us – both the Holocaust and the birth and continued existence of the State of Israel. For us, the State of Israel is not just a political state, it also has theological implications."

The Most Reverend John A. Boissonneau, Auxiliary Bishop of Toronto, representing the CCCB, the national body of Canadian bishops, said in a statement that "Nostra Aetate was one of the most precious gifts of the [Second Vatican] Council, as it reset the course for Catholic-Jewish relations. Nostra Aetate gave Catholics an authoritative teaching that confirmed the spiritual bond between Jews and Christians and emphatically denounced unambiguously that anti-Semitism was incompatible with the gospel of love and 'foreign to the mind of Christ.'"

In his address to the delegates at the celebration at an Ottawa cathedral, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl spoke about the significance of the dialogue and the effort to improve ties between the two communities.



Bishop John A. Boissonneau

"Our newly established bilateral dialogue, exploring Jewish-Catholic relations and what our faith traditions might offer Canada, is long overdue. While differences between our two faith communities still exist, we have moved from disputation to dialogue, persecution to partnership, confrontation to co-operation and conflict to conciliation," he said.

"Anti-Jewish theology focusing on the charges of deicide and perfidy pervaded western thought to such an extent that slaughtering Jews en masse could be imagined and take place. This denigration and demonization of Jews has been eliminated from Catholic teaching."

Speaking to The CJN, Bishop Boissonneau said he hopes this dialogue will help the communities understand each other better.

"We hope to continue the type of conversation in a bilateral way that has been happening all over Canada, but this is more on a national level, with participants from Vancouver, Toronto, right across the country, with French and English participants."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said although there had been dialogue between Jews and Christians nationally for many years, it ended in 2012 when CIJA cut ties with the United Church of Canada after it voted to boycott goods produced in Israeli settlements.

"But it was clear that some of the Christian denominations wanted to maintain a conversation [locally] on an ongoing basis, even if we weren't doing it, all of us together. We were very pleased when the Catholic community responded to our interest and showed a similar interest," he said.

"As Jews, as part of the pro-Israel community, we are concerned with how we maintain a relationship with the Catholic community in Israel... on a theological level without getting wrapped up in the political."

The next meeting is in May in Montreal. ■

Defending Israel a moral duty: pastor and Jewish leader

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Christians and Jews have a moral and biblical duty to defend Israel against those bent on its destruction, a Hispanic Christian and a U.S. Jewish leader told a Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center event in Toronto last week.

Keynote speakers Rev. Mario Bramnick, president of the Hispanic Israel Leadership Coalition (HILC) and Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, both emphasized the commonalities between the Hispanic and Jewish communities and the importance of uniting against common enemies.

The event, titled "Jewish-Christian Coalition for Israel," drew a mix of about 150 Jews and Christians to Beth Sholom Synagogue Nov. 30.

Rev. Bramnick, senior pastor of New Wine Ministries Church in Cooper City, Fla., explained that HILC, a subsidiary of the National Hispanic Christian Leadership Conference, was established earlier this year to engage Latino Christians in the pro-Israel movement and "build a firewall against anti-Semitism."

We are living in perilous times, Rev. Bramnick said, and we must understand that the increased threat to Israel's existence as a Jewish state is a moral, rather than a political, issue.

Rev. Bramnick said that Dietrich Bonhoeffer, the German Lutheran pastor who defended the Jews against the Nazis, showed that, "it's not enough for the church to help those crushed by the evil actions of government. At some point, the church must stand against the state that's perpetrating that evil."

Christians must join Jews in standing up to rampant anti-Semitism – which he said is indistinguishable from anti-Israel rhetoric – as well as attempts to delegitimize Israel through boycotts and UN resolutions that target it, but not countries like Iran or Syria.

"The Land of Israel with Jerusalem as its undivided capital was given by God [to the Jews] through an internal covenant," he said, and in the face of what he called "modern day Hamans" arising around the world, "in the past few years, we're beginning to see for the first time Christians and Jews uniting a new message of solidarity... to declare 'Never again,' that we won't remain silent in the midst of the vitriolic anti-Semitism."

Malcolm Hoenlein

He cited what he said was the hypocrisy of the United States opening an embassy in Cuba, but not in Jerusalem.

He emphasized the elements that he said are shared by Jews and Hispanics, such as family values, a strong work ethic and a sense of faith, and called the evangelical Christian-Jewish alliance "one of the most important alliances of our day."

He also listed some of HILC's activities, including symposia in which pastors and rabbis give presentations about the Bible and plans to launch a Christian-Jewish theological institute.

In his speech, Hoenlein noted that one-third of Hispanics in the United States are evangelical Christians and that many Latin Americans have Sephardi ancestry.

He described Jews and Hispanics as "natural allies" in a world that with borders changing, regions "in flames" and anti-Semitism and oppression of minorities rampant in the Middle East, "looks more like the 19th century than what the 20th century was supposed to look like."

He said Jews stand with groups such as the Yazidis and Kurds, because "we know that a world indifferent to them will be indifferent to us," and he spoke of distortions in the media that give Israel a bad name.

He praised former prime minister Stephen Harper for his loyalty to Israel and credited Prime Minister Justin Trudeau for "voting right in the United Nations last week almost a dozen times."

"This is an age when people will be judged," he declared, pointing to the recent opening of archives that show the Allied forces in World War II knew how many Jews were killed each day.

"They knew, but they didn't want to know. Today we know everything... The greatest dangers are apathy and indifference." ■

Russian-Israeli co-operation isn't new, local observers say

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The recent closeness between Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Russian President Vladimir Putin, shown in meetings in Moscow and Paris, is nothing new, says a Russian-Jewish community leader in Toronto.

"I don't think it's sudden," Igor Korenzvit, chair of the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Ontario's board of governors, told The CJN.

Growing up, Putin "had very special feelings about Jews that he expressed many times before," said Korenzvit, who also sits on The CJN's board of directors. "So I'm not surprised by the way he's acting toward Netanyahu and Israel."

The two leaders have met twice recently. In September, Netanyahu visited Moscow to discuss security concerns along Israel's northern border and how to avoid accidental clashes between Israel and Russian forces supporting President Bashar Assad's regime in Syria.

Netanyahu also expressed concern to Putin that Russian weapons will end up in the hands of Hezbollah, fighting in Syria on Assad's side. Putin reportedly sought to reassure Netanyahu that his fears of Syrian and Iranian aggression in the Golan were unfounded, saying the Syrian army "has no time for a second front" and artillery attacks against Israel "are being carried out by unofficial systems."

At the recent Paris climate summit, Netanyahu and Putin spoke on the sidelines for 45 minutes about Syria. Both boasted of Russian-Israeli military co-operation and promised to expand it.

High on the agenda was Moscow's anger at Turkey's shooting down of a Russian warplane that Turkey said had crossed into its airspace. Israel said it would be more careful if Russian aircraft ever entered its territory.

Some observers also said Israel's closer ties with Russia were, in part, retaliation against the European Union for its decision to label products made in Jewish settlements.

Body language and the words Putin used in the meetings suggested a "friendly" relationship with Netanyahu, Korenzvit said, "much better than [with U.S. President Barack] Obama."

"Even before the trip to Moscow, I was aware of a number of facts [showing] Putin was friendly toward Israel and definitely gets along with Netanyahu. I didn't find anything new at all."

Rather than admiration, Putin feels "respect" for Netanyahu, Korenzvit said. And now, "the world gave them more opportunity to express their relationship."

Aurel Braun, professor of international relations and political science at the University of Toronto, doesn't think relations are as warm as they appear.

"Netanyahu has tried to make the best of a bad situation. Israel has no choice but to try and have good relations with Russia, because the options Israel has are rather limited. Russia has inserted itself in a major way into the Middle East conflict, and it has put Israel in a position where it is facing a kind of fait accompli in the absence of effective western action in Syria," Braun told The CJN.

Israel has been ineffective in preventing Russia from supporting Iran economically and militarily, Braun said.

But Russia does want to co-ordinate with Israel to avoid a Turkish-style accident over Syria, he added.

Braun agreed with observers who noted that Netanyahu shares with Putin a disdain for what both see as weak U.S. leadership. Their meetings are "another way for Putin to rub Obama's nose in it and say, 'You have very bad relations with Israel, I can deal with Netanyahu and he has some alternatives to you.' It's to show up and weaken the U.S. In that sense, Netanyahu is a useful element [for Putin]."

Some of the warmth between the two is genuine, Braun added. "Unlike Soviet leaders, Putin is not an anti-Semite and is not anti-Israel. On a personal level, Putin has good relations with Jews."

But Russia's involvement in the Middle East is bad for Israel, he said. "Putin is helping Assad stay in power. Assad's closest ally is Iran, which is supported by Hezbollah. How is this possibly in Israel's interest?"

Russian-Israeli ties are "more like a business relationship," says Zhana Levin, co-editor of the Russian-Jewish biweekly newspaper Nasha Canada.

It's a balancing act, she said. Putin needs Israel as he makes enemies in the Arab world, while "having Putin as an enemy of Israel would be too much."

But, she stressed, "I don't think it's a friendship… no leader of a normal country, would make friends with Mr. Putin. But this is business." ■

JF&CS reaches out to Orthodox community

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

A gathering to learn about JF&CS

In an effort to reach out to the haredi and Orthodox communities, Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS) participated in a Shabbaton event that aimed to inform the community about the services available to them and encourage them to get involved.

In November, members of three Toronto congregations – Clanton Park Synagogue, Rabbi Yaakov Kerzner's Mizrachi Bayit and the Or Chaim minyan – took part in a Shabbaton to learn about the work of JF&CS by welcoming staff, volunteers and recipients of its services.

Rabbi Leo Davids, a retired York University sociology professor, who spoke to The CJN on behalf of the other organizers of the program – University of Waterloo professor emeritus Paul Socken, Eli Magder and Josh Levi – said he's been involved with the social service agency since he joined the JF&CS board in the 1970s.

"But I felt that a lot of our guys [members of the Orthodox community] didn't know what JF&CS was, what it stood for, what it did, who needed it – and I felt it was important that we get volunteers with kippahs on, who would be doing things within the larger Jewish community, rather than only within the Bathurst Street bird's nest," Rabbi Davids said.

He said there are many Orthodox Jews who don't even know what JF&CS is "unless they suddenly fall into big trouble and someone sends them there to receive service."

Rabbi Davids added that when it comes to JF&CS volunteers, the Orthodox community is not well represented.

"The Reform Jew doesn't go to shul every day… so his Jewish hours are available for community and committee work. The Orthodox householder may put more time into Jewish stuff, but it is used up in the synagogue and study activities, and he doesn't find time for the other stuff. I felt that we had to bridge that gap."

One of the guest speakers was Rabbi Ronald Weiss, the director of chaplaincy services at JF&CS.

Rabbi Weiss said in an interview after the event that the Shabbaton program focused on three JF&CS services: chaplaincy, abuse against women and foster care. He said foster parents were brought in to share their experiences.

"The whole program was meant to educate and heighten awareness. A related goal was that if people were to get inspired enough to get involved as volunteers, then the agency and volunteers would benefit from that involvement."

Rabbi Weiss said there have been misconceptions and misunderstandings about what the agency does in the community.

"With respect to the haredi community, because JF&CS is the only Jewish child welfare agency mandated by the government in North America, JF&CS is legally responsible to go into homes, and if a child is deemed to be in danger, the law says the agency must remove that child in the interest of the safety and the welfare of the child," he explained.

"The haredi community is not always on board with assessments or decisions. There has been some stress and strain between the haredi community and the agency over the years over this issue… The haredi community will sometimes feel that allowances need to be made in order to keep families together."

He said one of the things he emphasized was that the number of Jewish children in foster care has dropped dramatically.

"Last year, the number was in the 70s – Jewish kids who had suffered significant trauma living at home and needed to be removed from parents' homes and placed into care. As of the event on Nov. 14, there were 37 children in care," he said.

"That is a reflection of the fact that we, as an agency, are doing a better job, working with families to keep the families intact."

He said the haredi community tends to prefer to deal with social issues internally, and consult their rabbis, rather than social service professionals.

"What was also emphasized was that the agency works together with the rabbanim as much as possible… we work co-operatively and collegially with everybody."

He said having more Orthodox representation at JF&CS is a "win-win situation in terms of congregational education, heightening the awareness of what the agency is and what the agency does and does not do, and stimulating interest among the congregations to have their people become more involved. I've already gotten several calls from people who are interested in learning more about the programs and some who have already committed to volunteering." ■

Unity At Last?

Dr. Michael Laitman
Professor of Ontology

From Harvard academic, David Ropeik's "Terrorism – Why It Frightens, and Unites Us," through French intellectual, Dominique Sopo's "Faced With Hatred, We Must Respond With Unity," and even to the Grand Mufti of Egypt, Shawki Ibrahim Abdel-Karim Allam, who wrote, "If We Want To Eradicate Terrorism, We Must Stand Together," the horrific November 13 terror attack in Paris that left some 130 people dead and hundreds more wounded has prompted people of all faiths and views to urge unity as a cure for terrorism.

I wholeheartedly agree that – unity is a cure for terrorism. What I am less content with is that terrorism is the reason for unity. As long as fear is our motivation to unite, in the absence thereof we will also avoid unity. This is not a recipe for a healthy society. It is precisely the mindset that has led to the emergence of radicalism and fundamentalism around the world.

Disunity in our communities produces social and financial insecurity. Disunity in our families creates mistrust between parents and children, and forms barriers between spouses. Disunity at school causes fierce and often ruthless competition among peers. When disunity pervades and dominates every aspect of our lives, it causes social isolation and depression.

These, in turn, may lead to seeking extreme solutions such as drug abuse, suicide, and political or religious radicalism. Unless we reverse the narcissistic vector destroying our society, we are bound to perpetuate and enhance the radicalization of our youths and the degeneration of our societies.

If we think that sending in more troops and drones to fight ISIS will stop, or even slow them down, we are misleading ourselves. If anything, it will earn them more support because they will be able to portray themselves not only as fearful and determined (a quality with great appeal in the morally bankrupt Western society), but also as the underdog winning with spirit rather than arms.

We should pay close attention to the words of Nicolas Hénin, who was held captive by ISIS for nearly a year. "I know them: bombing they expect. What they fear is unity."

If we take a moment to step back from all this chaos and look at the bigger picture, we will see that through a process of ebb and flow, humanity is ceaselessly enhancing its connectedness. Today we have gone beyond the point of no return; separation is no longer an option. No nation can maintain a viable society or a sustainable economy if it is isolated (see what is happening in North Korea, which is not even completely isolated). Protectionism and isolation can only lead to war, most likely a world war. The problem is that so will continued intermingling of nations without proper handling of the process.

And while humanity is being pushed toward unity from every possible direction, we are doing everything we can to avoid it. When reality goes one way, and humanity goes the other, humanity is bound to lose. Unity is not an antidote to terrorism; it is the makeup of reality.

We typically define unity and harmony in our bodies by a single word: "health." And while our global society is just as interdependent as the organs in our bodies, we refuse to act as healthy bodies should, and choose instead to grab as much as we can, wherever we can, and preferably at the expense of someone else. To put it differently, rather than acting like healthy cells, we act more like Cancer. Is it any wonder our human society is sick?

The sooner we begin to redirect our minds into seeing the world as complementing elements rather than as competing fragments, the sooner we will heal our world. Nature is showing us where we need to go; it is up to us to assume this direction, abandon the notion of survival of the fittest, and recognize that we are all in one boat, and either we all sail together and reach the shore safely, or we drill bullet holes in the hull and drown.

We are not at war yet, but we have suffered several painful wake-up calls recently. Let us realize that unity is in our favor. It allows us to thrive and prosper not at each other's expense, but rather contribute our unique skills and talents to the betterment of our own lives and the lives of everyone around us.

Successful sports teams and successful companies always talk about the key role that unity and mutual support play in their achievements. We can also learn from history how disengagement among factions of nations has caused their demise. And we can all learn from nature how everything thrives only when it maintains a healthy give-and-take relationship with its environment. Whichever way we choose, we must indoctrinate ourselves with the notion that a united society is a thriving society. We have come to a point where this is the key to our survival.

Young Israelis fight stereotypes with one-on-one dialogue

SHLOMO KAPUSTIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A group of Israeli 20-somethings completed their outreach tour of university campuses with a stop in Toronto last week.

"We're at a very critical time to fight the BDS [boycott, divestment and sanctions] movement, and the community needs to stand together," said Meryle Kates, executive director of StandWithUs Canada, which organized the 10-day trip.

Known as WordSwap, the program bills itself as a "dialogue for open minds" and bets that a cross-section of young Israelis can connect with Canadian students in ways that pro-Israel activists cannot.

"It's an important message that Israel is diverse, not monolithic, like Canada," said Sara Lefton, vice president (GTA) at the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs. "As Canadians, we appreciate diversity, and it's important to appreciate the diversity in Israel."

CIJA partnered with StandWithUs for the final event, geared to adults, on Nov. 30 at the Rosehill Venue Lounge. More than 100 people rotated among four stations to hear the life stories of the six-person crew.

"We're always looking for ways to provide advocacy tools for members of the community," said Lefton. "This evening allows them to learn their story and hear about diversity."

WordSwappers in this year's edition, the program's third, interacted with about 5,000 students in total and visited eight campuses: Wilfrid Laurier University, the University of Waterloo, McGill University, Concordia University, Carleton University, Ryerson University, York University, and the University of Toronto.

The program uses a soft sell by eschewing Israeli flags for Chinese fortune cookies containing factoids about the country. Informal conversation, not pro-Israel placards, carries the day.

"It works, it works," said Hen Mazzig, who is also education director for StandWithUs Israel. "You can see how students change their hearts, change their minds... I have never experienced such a positive effect as actively reaching students one on one, and my deepest hope as an Israeli is that we can do this mission again."

He recalled a conversation with a Palestinian woman at York University.

"She said, 'You need to understand that Palestinians are freedom fighters.' And I said, 'But civilians are being attacked – women and children are being killed. When I was 12, I was about to enter an ice cream shop and I was almost killed by a terrorist.' She didn't know anything about our side of the narrative, which I understand, but it was the first time she heard that. I'm already in touch with her by email."

Another time, he said, a professor at Wilfrid Laurier shared her negative opinions on Israel, formed by time spent with Palestinians. "She was volunteering in Palestinian refugee camps," Mazzig said, "but she didn't know there were Jewish refugees, too, and that we demand justice, too. She said she would do more research on that."

Mazzig, an Iraqi-Tunisian Israeli who served as an openly gay commander in the Israel Defence Forces, was joined by Victory Hallel Ramontsho, the daughter of a half-Jewish Ukrainian mother and Botswanian father (she underwent Orthodox conversion a few years ago); Nayef Haib, a Bedouin Muslim whose father was killed by Hezbollah while serving in the IDF; Ofek Stern, a secular Tel Avivian; Ron Lahav, who hails from an Orthodox Yemenite family; and Shadi Halaby, a Druze from northern Israel. Emily Rose, who moved to Israel from Winnipeg in 2006, joined the trip near its end, when Lahav returned to Israel for her law-school exams.

Just by attending, the two Arab members of the group dented the beliefs of some students, who thought Israel had no Arab citizens.

"We heard from a lot of people that they are tokens," Mazzig said, "but the fact that the two of them are here out of a delegation of six people means something. And we didn't have to run after them to come – they came to us." ■

Exhibit captures Scottish Jewish life in black and white

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT, HALIFAX

Kosher Haggis. A bridegroom wearing a kilt at his wedding. Jewish and Muslim students learning Torah together. A menorah in a sheep farmer's front window.

All are typical of Jewish life in Scotland and just a few of the subjects of a photographic display presented by the Atlantic Jewish Council that opened Dec. 2 in Halifax.

Scots Jews: Identity, Belonging and the Future is the title of a show by documentary photographer Judah Passow, who spent a year capturing, in 80 black-and-white images, Scotland's Jewish community, from small villages to major cities.

Passow, raised in Philadelphia and New York and a 1971 graduate of Boston University, is based in London, where he photographs for American and European magazines and newspapers. For this showing, he culled 80 images from almost 13,000 frames.

British author Michael Mail, who grew up in Glasgow, met Passow during one of the latter's exhibitions and asked him to pursue the Scottish Jewish connection.

The exhibit debuted at the Scottish Parliament in Edinburgh in February 2014 and has since travelled throughout Scotland and to the United States, where it just concluded showings in New York and Boston before coming to Halifax, its first Canadian stop. Earlier this year, it was also shown at the Vilna Gaon Jewish State Museum in Lithuania.

Linda Kislowicz, president and CEO of Jewish Federations of Canada – UIA, who was in Halifax for the Canadian debut, was accompanied to the podium by a traditional bagpiper.

"Michael Mail contacted me two years ago about the exhibit, wanting a Canadian tour," she said. "There is a unique and special interest to have it here first in Nova Scotia [Latin for New Scotland], so we made arrangements. It will go to Toronto in the spring [to the Miles Nadal JCC]. We hope to show it in other centres, too, but nothing has been confirmed yet."

Passow's pictures show Jewish life from north to south in Scotland, where there has been Jewish life since at least the 17th century, according to Mail's research. Jews became the largest non-Christian minority as the population grew to about 16,000 at its highest point. It now numbers about 5,800.

"They [Jews] made significant contributions," Mail has written, "as scientists, doctors, judges, members of Parliament, artists, writers, farmers, foresters, kilt makers and even whiskey distillers."

The Halifax Jewish community and others attending the opening saw photos of a woman in the Shetlands poring over a Jewish cookbook for a special recipe; a man demonstrating blowing the shofar at an Aberdeen shul, the northernmost synagogue in the British Isles; university students in St. Andrews celebrating at an annual fundraising event, the Matzoh Ball; a kilted groom being hoisted high above the crowd by his groomsmen; Mark's Deli in Glasgow where, twice a month, a delivery of kosher food is distributed through an Orthodox synagogue; a menorah in a sheep farmer's house in Lochgilphead; a seder in Glasgow; women preparing kosher haggis for Robbie Burns Night at a Reform shul in Glasgow; and a man examining a suit at Jewish-owned Slater's in Glasgow, recorded by the Guinness Book of Records as the largest menswear store in the world.

The exhibit will be at the Nova Scotia Archives in Halifax until Dec. 20. It will be stored until early spring and then forwarded to Toronto. ■

SEPARATING? BE CAREFUL WITH THE HOME

Family Matters

by John Syrtash
B. A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP Family Lawyer & Mediator for 33 years

Question: We both live in the same home and tensions are rising. I am male, aged 43. We have two small children and I would prefer to move out. What happens if I do?

Answer: This is one of the most difficult questions to answer because much depends on the facts for each case. Generally, in the absence of violence or the serious threat of violence, I advise clients to stay put and not move, but rather to get therapy or someone to speak with on how to control the tension in the home. Pending a resolution, negotiate all separation issues into the form of a binding domestic contract or court order. The reasons are multiple. First, if you leave the home and your spouse stays with the children in the absence of a written agreement, then she could be deemed to be the de facto custodial parent after a short period of time. This means that if push comes to shove and the parties went to court to sort out their differences a judge would likely view you leaving as an acknowledgement that the parent left behind with the kids is the one who should be making the most important decisions for them. These decisions could apply to health, education and religion. So if you choose to move out you could be abandoning that responsibility to your spouse forever. The moment you leave without the children, without a court order or signed agreement to the contrary, you will be deemed to have already granted her status as primary decision maker. A future judge could well interpret your absence from the home as giving Mom factual custody until the matter came before the Court for a decision on legal custody. Moreover, the court process could take several months. Thereafter, no matter how good a parent you claim to have been, no matter how many allegations you may have against her parenting skills, and no matter how badly the children may want to live with you, the very act of the status quo being with Mom for all those months and by you having entrusted them with her provide a very hard challenge to overcome in any custody dispute.

Secondly, with respect to your interest in the matrimonial home, if its registered solely in your wife's name, you may lose any interest in the increase of its value after the date of separation. Much depends on whether or not you registered it in her name solely in order to avoid prospective creditors and the extent to which you contributed to the mortgage, property taxes and upkeep. Some spouses lose the benefit in the increase in its value after separation although a recent Ontario Court of Appeal decision has made such situations less likely. Still, if you are a self-employed spouse with a business and are about to purchase a home you may wish to think twice about placing title solely in your spouse's name.

Synagogue is at centre of Jewish life in Peterborough

This is the second in a series of articles about Jewish life in small towns across Canada.

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Cantor Leon Litvack on the bimah

According to the Canadian census of 1881, there were two Jews then living in Peterborough, a town about 125 kilometres northeast of Toronto, known as the gateway to the Kawarthas district. Today the city has a population of about 78,000 people, of which, according to recent census tallies, some 300 are Jewish.

Despite the Jewish community's relatively small size, it still boasts a landmark synagogue, Beth Israel, designed by noted architect Eric Zeidler and erected half a century ago in 1964.

"Our synagogue is a beautiful structure, built for a community much larger than ours," said Larry Gillman, the former Torontonian who has served as Beth Israel's president for the last dozen years.

"We've worked very hard to keep the synagogue going and to keep it vital to the community."

With a membership of about 35 families, Beth Israel holds regular Friday night services, followed once or twice a month by communal Shabbat dinners in people's homes. The approximately 100 people who attend High Holiday services each year do not come close to filling the roughly 300-seat sanctuary.

"The synagogue is the central point of Jewish life in Peterborough," Gillman said, adding that "we're getting more young children now."

However, there's no denying that, like most small-town Jewish communities across North America, numbers have been in slow decline since 1945.

Formerly Orthodox, the congregation became egalitarian roughly a decade ago, just one of several adjustments the congregation has made to remain viable in the modern age. (The synagogue still maintains a strictly kosher kitchen but allows "kosher-style" vegetarian food to be served in the building.)

Beth Israel made headlines around the world last month when it offered to share its prayer space with a local mosque that was seriously damaged by arson following the Paris terror attacks. But that was certainly not the first sharing arrangement the congregation has made.

About ten years ago, Beth Israel signed an arrangement with the Unitarian Fellowship, a local non-denominational religious group that uses the building on Sundays and some weeknights.

"They're not Christian, not Jewish, not Buddhist, and they respect all religions," Gillman said. "They outgrew their building and were looking for a space. We agreed to partner with them and share space with them in our synagogue. The money that we get in rent helps us make up the deficits that we run, because we don't have enough money to operate just based on our membership dues."

Through a similar sharing arrangement, the congregation rents its space occasionally to select groups for meetings – "mostly not-for-profit groups, the Kiwanis music competition, and for elections" – and gains additional rental income by leasing use of its large parking lot to a nearby medical clinic.

"We're trying to do innovative things to keep our heads above water," Gillman said.

Beth Israel has also made a remarkable and mutually profitable arrangement with a Belfast-based cantor, Leon Litvack, who crosses the Atlantic each year to lead services in the sanctuary for the High Holidays.

A former Torontonian, Litvack discovered in recent years that his birth parents were from Peterborough and that he still has cousins there. A professor of Victorian literature at Queen's University in Belfast, he has been leading the services at Beth Israel and serving as a pastoral and halachic adviser to the congregation since 2011.

"We needed a rabbi, and Leon, with his unbelievable voice, made himself available to us," Gillman said.

"We have a community that has really fought hard to keep a Jewish presence here in Peterborough, and it means a lot of evolution," he said. "I gave an address at Yom Kippur about how we've been through a lot of change and there's going to be more change to come. We're going to continue to evolve into the future." ■

Palatucci name remains after Yad Vashem decision

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

The name of Giovanni Palatucci, a wartime Italian police official whose reputation has swung between hero and villain and back again, will remain – at least for the present time – on an English Montreal School Board (EMSB) building in Côte St. Luc.

The EMSB is taking its cue from Yad Vashem, the Holocaust authority in Jerusalem, which advised the public school board that it is not revoking Palatucci's inclusion with the Righteous Among the Nations.

The allegations began against Palatucci more than two years ago when a group of scholars associated with the Center for Jewish Studies in New York concluded that for six years Palatucci was really a Nazi collaborator.

In June 2013, the Centro Primo Levi at the Center for Jewish Studies sent a letter to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington citing evidence that the widely revered Palatucci identified Jews for deportation to Auschwitz. It said a dozen researchers had reviewed nearly 700 documents and found no proof that he helped Jews. A number of historians and activists in Italy also gathered what they regarded as damning material which they sent to Yad Vashem.

In response at the time, the museum withdrew the long-standing information it disseminated about Palatucci.

The EMSB, however, decided not to take any action until it received advice from Yad Vashem. It referred the matter to the then chair of Yad Vashem's Commission for the Designation of the Righteous, Jacob Turkel, a retired judge of Israel's Supreme Court.

In 2006, the EMSB named the former Wagar High School building after Palatucci who was credited with saving as many as 5,000 Jews, mainly while based in Fiume, Croatia.

The Giovanni Palatucci Facility houses John Grant High School for students with special needs, Marymount Adult Education Centre and the EMSB's book processing department.

Irena Steinfeldt, director of the Righteous Among the Nations department, informed the EMSB: "We have not received any documentation that justifies resubmitting the file to the commission. I haven't heard from the Primo Levi institute, who initiated the story in the New York Times, nor have I received a report from the historians' commission that was established in Italy.

Giovanni Palatucci's nephew Father John Palatucci of New York attended the building's dedication ceremony in 2006.

"As far as we are concerned, Giovanni Palatucci is on the list of the Righteous."

He was so recognized in 1990. Palatucci was arrested by the Gestapo in September 1944 and died in the Dachau concentration camp in February 1945.

The proposal to honour Palatucci was made by EMSB commissioner Syd Wise, a former Wagar principal, who died in November. The initiative was part of a larger program he introduced to foster exchange between students in Jewish schools and those in the EMSB, especially where there are significant Italian communities.

"What we did was in good faith, and we based our decision on the facts as they existed 60 years after the war," he said at the time the controversy surfaced.

EMSB chair Angela Mancini stated that it was Wise's request that Palatucci name not be removed from the building until Yad Vashem came to a decision.

"Now that we have heard from Yad Vashem, I will bring their findings to our council for further discussion. But for now that name will remain attached to the building. The fact that Yad Vashem spent over two years on this file shows that they took the allegations seriously."

The EMSB is not alone in memorializing Palatucci. There are public spaces named for him in Italy, New York and Israel. The Anti-Defamation League posthumously bestowed upon him its Courage to Care Award in 2005. Pope John Paul II declared him a martyr. ■

We won't stop until we have equal rights at the Kotel

Norma Baumel Joseph

What if a democratic state appointed a man who, on his own authority, restricted one group of citizens from exercising their civil rights at the public heritage site he manages. What would you do?

Rabbi Shmuel Rabinowitz is the official manager of the Kotel, the Western Wall. This, however, does not mean that he is the rabbi of the Western Wall. The Kotel is not a synagogue, certainly not a haredi synagogue, and he is not the mara d'atra, the halachic decisor.

Since 1988, when some of us first prayed with a Torah at the Kotel, there has been a long series of successful legal battles (notably in the Supreme Court of Israel in 2003 and district court in 2013) to ensure that women are legally entitled to pray with a Torah (and tallit, etc.) at the Kotel.

Rabbi Rabinowitz responded by issuing two directives: no one may bring a Torah scroll into the Kotel plaza, and no one may give any of the site's more than 100 scrolls to any woman in the women's section. These are his decisions alone.

This is despite the fact that the Shulchan Aruch is very clear that women can touch, hold and read from a Torah scroll. There is no halachic violation here. But there have been civil rights violations on the part of the state's representative.

In response, four independent Israeli women – Shulamit Magnus, Cheryl Birkner Mack, Hannah Kehat and Andrea Wiese – with the help of Susan Weiss, director of the Centre for Women's Justice, are suing in the Israeli Supreme Court to void Rabbi Rabinowitz's decisions. Furthermore, they asked the court to void his decision banning anyone from bringing their own Torah scroll into the Kotel plaza. They are also seeking damages for this discrimination.

Women praying at the Western Wall in May 2013.

The women claim that they were "silenced, herded into an ever shrinking, distanced space, told to be onlookers while men practise Judaism." They further claim that "being denied for so long the sacred wrappings of Jewish prayer, they have been demonized and attacked physically for the same acts which, when performed by Jews who are men, are called mitzvah."

The women pray with a group known as Tefillat Nashim ba'Kotel/Original Women of the Wall, who have been praying at the Kotel with Torah and tallit and tfillin. They come from all walks of life and all religious denominations. They are Orthodox, traditional, Reform, egalitarian, scholars, activists, writers, teachers and lawyers. All are committed to that original model of diversity, inclusion, independence and autonomy and sanctified prayer. They follow in the footsteps of Rivka Haut, an Orthodox Talmud scholar from Brooklyn, N.Y., who originated and inaugurated this vision, and Bonna Devora Haberman, who carried the work of this struggle for years. Both of these pioneers remained true to this purpose to their dying days.

Shulamit Magnus, founder of a women's prayer group at the Kotel and one of the plaintiffs in these lawsuits, posted the following explanation online:

"We filed this action to press the State of Israel to enforce historic court rulings that already recognize Jewish women's full rights to religious expression at the Kotel, equal to those exercised by men there since 1967… The rabbinic administrator of the Kotel has used a 'gotcha' tactic to prevent women from being able to read Torah at the Kotel… Our suit seeks to void his 'Torah directive' on the grounds that this administrator… has exceeded his authority in issuing it and that it violates Israeli law guaranteeing equal access to and use of public space and property.

"We plaintiffs are all longtime activists in this issue, committed to its purposes for years, some of us, as stated, from the beginning… we remain committed to joining with Jewish women of diverse religious backgrounds, in solidarity as Jewish women, in prayer, in Jewish sacred space, at the national holy site of the Jewish People: to us, all these points are inviolable and non-negotiable. We refuse any alternate site, or the absorption of our cause in any other. That is why we filed these suits, and will pursue them to victory, which victory, yes, will have major implications for civil rights in Israel generally."

Twenty-seven years ago, a friend named Rivka leaned over and asked me what I thought about going go to the Kotel for Thursday morning prayers. I laughed. We were women after all, feminists and Orthodox. I laughed, yet we went.

We went with over 70 women from all sorts of backgrounds. And that describes us still today. The lawsuits represent our undiminished, continuous and courageous dedication to that experience and vision. We have not been dissuaded by other options or compromises. We have not lost hope. We know the legal rights and responsibilities of women in prayer. We know the spiritual enthusiasm that comes when praying in a holy place with the blessed Torah. We will not be diminished, removed or silenced. We will not lose our standing as Jews, obligated in prayer, part of the holy covenantal community. We struggle for the democratic soul of Israel and for the heart of justice in Judaism. ■

Longtime CJA director named Winnipeg federation CEO

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

Elaine Goldstine admits to being overwhelmed by the positive responses she has received since being appointed the new CEO of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg Nov. 26.

"I have received so many emails and phone calls," Goldstine said. "It's nice to know that so many people have such confidence in me. I am a doer. I am confident that I can do this."

The longtime director of the Combined Jewish Appeal campaign here was appointed to the position on an interim basis last spring after her predecessor, Adam Bronstone, resigned after less than nine months in the position. The Torontonian became CEO in September 2014, succeeding Bob Freedman, who had led the Jewish community for 28 years.

The initial plan was to have Goldstine serve as interim CEO through the current CJA campaign period, with a search committee to be established early in the new year to find a permanent replacement for Bronstone.

"I assume that the board saw that things were going well under my leadership, liked what I was doing and decided to offer me the position," Goldstine said.

Goldstine, a lifelong Winnipegger, grew up in a family that emphasized community service. "My parents [the late Ben and Sadie Raber] supported many Jewish causes."

She began volunteering with federation more than 20 years ago, after her two sons reached school age. "I started as a volunteer with the CJA's Women's Philanthropy Division," Goldstine recalled. "After a short time, Nada Rubin, the campaign chair, offered me a job with the campaign. Eventually, I was hired to become the campaign division chair."

At the same time that Goldstine was beginning her career with federation, she was also involved with National Council of Jewish Women, Winnipeg section, eventually serving as the local chapter's president.

Goldstine's rise in the federation ranks has been an organic evolution. She assumed the reins of the CJA campaign 10 years ago after the death of her predecessor, Gerry Koffman, at a relatively young age. "I began filling for Gerry when he got sick," she said. "After his passing, I was offered the job full time."

Throughout her tenure at CJA, she and her team were able to increase the level of donations year after year up until 2014-15, when the campaign fell short for the first time in about 15 years. "We are back on track this year," she said. "We have had a good response from the community."

Goldstine spoke of the need for good communications between the federation and its beneficiary agencies. "Our focus has to be on helping our partner agencies to succeed," she said.

She added that she's modelling her leadership on that of Freedman. "His door was always open," she said. "Staff members felt comfortable talking to him. He was a mentor to many."

Over the next couple of months, the federation executive will be reflecting on where the community is and where it wants to go, Goldstine said.

"We are working toward continued growth for our community," she said. "I am blown away by the large number of people who are calling our offices from different places who are considering moving to Winnipeg. Our city has become a destination. I am proud of our community."

Goldstine is also looking forward to working with the federation's new president. Lawyer Adam Levene was confirmed for a two-year term on Dec. 1 at the federation's annual AGM.

"We are on the same wavelength," Goldstine said of Levene. "We share a vision of wanting to move the federation to the next level."

Levene has been a federation board member for the past 10 years and first vice-president for the last two.

"The federation does very important work," he said. "It is because of the federation that we have the thriving community that we do." ■

Kitchener clothing store to close after 89 years

plungen@thecjn.ca

If you venture deep into the back rooms of Budds, a landmark clothing store in the heart of Kitchener, Ont., you'll find some of the elements that made it unique.

There's a pneumatic tube system that looks like it came out of the pages of Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea, which was used to send money and receipts between sales stations in the store and the back room where the cash was kept. There's a printing press that would have been familiar to Johannes Gutenberg, which was used to fashion notices advertising sales and other specials; there's a folder with yellowing tear sheets with copies of Budds ads that ran in local newspapers – 50 years ago. And of course there's the clutter that you get when you've been in business in the same location for 89 years.

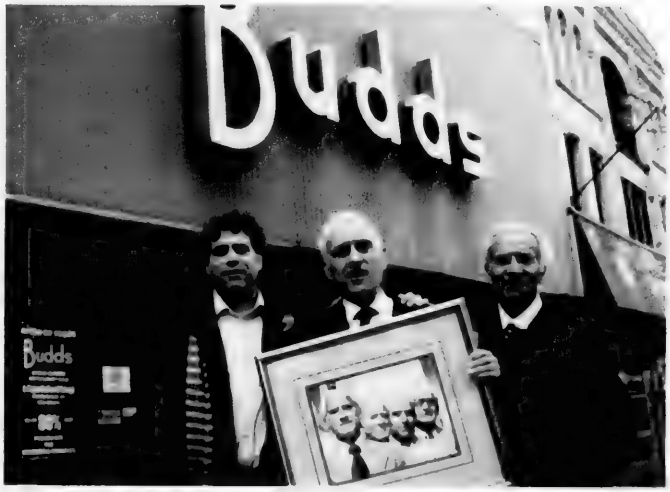
But beyond the artifacts that customers recall with fondness and have piqued the interest of the local museum, Budds will be especially remembered for the hands-on, personalized customer service that allowed it to stay in business and outlast the likes of Eaton's and other popular department stores.

All that will be gone by the end of January, when the Budd family will close the family business that has been a shopping and cultural icon in the heart of Kitchener since 1926.

It's time to retire, agree brothers Howie and Stan, now in their 70s and the second generation of the family to operate the store. Howie's son, Jeff, 45, who started in the business sweeping floors and making suit boxes before he graduated to sign maker, said the business is too large for just one person to run properly.

In addition to the Kitchener store, which is located on King Street West in the heart of downtown, the Budds operate smaller outlets in Guelph and Simcoe.

The Kitchener store alone covers 28,000 square feet, while Guelph and Simcoe have 15,000 square feet each.



Howie Budd, centre, is flanked by his son, Jeff, left, and brother, Stan outside the store that has been an iconic presence in Kitchener for decades. Howie is holding a picture of the four brothers, who started the business in 1926, from left, Nat, Jack, Mort and Lou. PAUL LUNGEN PHOTO

Despite the imposing scale of the stores, the Budds were able to offer a unique brand of service that is all too absent in today's impersonal big box stores.

They knew many of their customers personally, and many are the second and third generation of families who began shopping there years ago.

The Budds spend much of their time on the floor, meeting and greeting customers and tending to their needs. Offering middle to high-end merchandise at reasonable prices, they make it a point of going the extra mile to bring in items that other stores can't be bothered to stock. If a woman wants a 44 triple D bra, they'll special order it, even if it's only one unit, Howie said.

They've special ordered slacks with a 60-inch waist for one customer, Jeff recalled.

"We're flexible. We can move quickly. There's no red tape," explained Stan.

"The big stores are getting bigger, but the Budds are getting better," he added, still speaking in the present tense. "We're hands on."

That personalized service, attention to detail and heimish environment made Budds the go-to store for generations of Kitchener residents.

Avrum Rosensweig, president and CEO of Ve'ahavta, remembers running throughout the store as a kid.

"Budds Stores was a place my sisters and I would go to with excitement," he said.

The pneumatic tubes were particularly entertaining. "As a kid, this was very amazing to watch, almost like I was at a circus," he said.

Beyond that, Budds played an important role in the life of both the local Jewish community and the broader one.

"Budds was a staple store in downtown Kitchener and important to the Jewish community... When my father was alive, he would frequently ask the Budds for clothing for newcomers to the Kitchener Jewish community. Over the last 20 years, I have asked the family for clothing for the homeless. They never said no to my father, and they never say no to me," Rosensweig said.

Stan and Howie are the second generation in the family to operate the store. Jeff is the third, but they repeatedly give credit to the first generation of Budds, who founded it.

Their story goes all the way back to 1926. At the time, the Budd family was living in Saint John, N.B., and one of the brothers, Lou, was a travelling salesman whose territory was southwestern Ontario.

While in Kitchener he learned that businessman Jack Davis, one of the founders of the 107-year-old Beth Jacob Congregation, was looking to sell a business on King Street. The asking price was $10,000, but between them, brothers Lou, Jack, Mort and Nat could scrounge together only $500. Undeterred, they visited the CIBC branch at King and Queen streets. Though they had little in the way of collateral, the manager was impressed with their work ethic and, based on nothing more than a gut feeling, he approved the loan on the spot, Stan and Howie recounted.

The brothers repaid the loan in two years, instead of the expected three, and never looked back.

In 1931 they opened a second store in downtown Guelph, and in 1933, they moved the Kitchener store down the street to its current location. They opened a third store in Simcoe in 1937.

Even in the midst of the Great Depression, the Budd stores thrived. The same formula for success – hands-on ownership, meeting customers on the floor – has stood the test of time, Stan and Howie say.

The two brothers, sons of Nat, got involved in the business in the 1960s after learning the ropes in other retail stores.

"We learned how not to run a business," Howie said of the experience.

In 1966, they expanded the premises to its current Leviathan proportions.

Jeff, who taught hockey skills in Metulla, Israel, for a time, joined the others in 1997, making for three generations of Budds in the clothing business.

But there won't be a fourth. None of his cousins are interested in maintaining the family enterprise, and Jeff believes "It's not a one-man show."

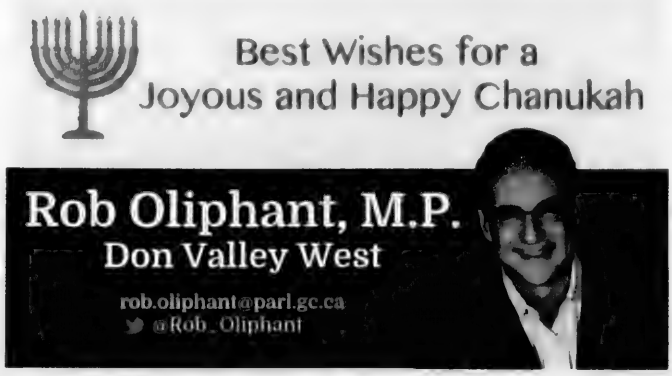
Remarkably, Howie and Stan have been working side by side, six days a week, for 50 years and still get along.

"A lot of family businesses tear the families apart," said Jeff. "This one brought us closer together."

"We never had a serious argument to the point where it broke up our families," Stan said, and Howie agreed.

As for the store itself, a lot of people are putting in dibs for memorabilia. The local museum will be looking at some of the more interesting pieces, such as the pneumatic tube network.

It still works, but instead of sending cash and receipts from sales stations to the office, it now delivers candy to kids. Eyes wide with the wonder, those children will no doubt make for one more generation of Kitchener residents who will take with them fond memories of Budds – a store that will be gone, but not forgotten. ■



Two young Canadians help N.J. shulgoers find meaning

sshefa@thecjn.ca

At a time when research studies are concluding that the observance of Judaism is not as relevant to American Jews as it has been in generations past, two 30-something Canadians are working to inspire a Reform synagogue in Edison, N.J., to find meaning in their Jewishness.

Rabbi David Vaisberg, the Montreal-born and Mississauga-raised spiritual leader of Temple Emanu-el Congregation, said one of the things that attracted him to this 223-family synagogue, which he's been leading for the past four years, is its inclusive, welcoming philosophy.

Rabbi Vaisberg said that under the leadership of Rabbi Al Lansberg for nearly 40 years, the congregation was "a very social-justice-oriented community. The temple is really well known for its diversity – a lot of interfaith, a lot of interracial members, Jews from all sorts of diverse backgrounds."

Cantor Aviva Marer, 33, who grew up in Ottawa, fits perfectly into the Temple Emanu-el family and serves as an example of how diverse the Jewish community is.

Marer is a member of the Bene Israel Jews from India, who can be trace their roots back to the early 15th century. In fact, her grandfather helped build the first synagogue in New Delhi, which still stands to this day.

Marer, who was ordained by the Debbie Friedman School of Sacred Music at Hebrew Union College in 2013, explained that her path toward a career as a cantor in an American Reform shul was a long one.

"After growing up in the Conservative movement, I spent three years in more of a modern Orthodox way of life, and I remember on Kol Nidre driving to shul and parking blocks away so that no one would see, and even though it was pouring rain, not opening an umbrella, because that would be igniting something," she recalled.

"And I think that moment for me made it pretty clear that this kind of Judaism no longer worked for me. It was definitely informed by gender as well. There is something to be said about sitting behind a mechitzah versus leading services from the bimah. That was how I came to explore the Reform movement."

For 31-year-old Rabbi Vaisberg, although he knew from the age of 14 that he wanted to obtain his ordination from the Hebrew Union College, he called himself "an accidental Reform Jew."

"I was from Montreal. My father came from Uzbekistan in the 1970s, and we lived on the west side and we were cultural Jews. I went to a preschool at an Orthodox synagogue, and we showed up occasionally for Chanukah and Purim parties, but Montreal was a Jewish enough place, like New York or Toronto, where you could do whatever you wanted and you could still feel Jewish," he said.

"When the economy tanked... my father had to look elsewhere for work and he found work in Hamilton. We had some family in Toronto so we moved to Mississauga, and there, if you don't go to synagogue, you don't feel Jewish at all," Rabbi Vaisberg said, adding that Mississauga's Solel Congregation and its retired spiritual leader, Rabbi Larry Englander, influenced his decision to pursue a rabbinical career.

In terms of a vision for their synagogue, which both Marer and Rabbi Vaisberg agree is a congregation that has always been ahead of its time, they hope it will continue to be a warm, welcoming place for Jews of all kinds, and they're always working together to define what their mission is going forward.

"I really think what is unique is our sense of camaraderie. It would no doubt be there regardless of whether one of us was American, but the fact that we're both Canadian and are informed by the same experiences has really contributed to this beautiful kind of co-clergy relationship," Marer said.

"We don't work in terms of the traditional clergy hierarchy. It's quite lovely. I think this is actually something to be said about when we came out of school and the generation we're in, Dave and I really see our roles as co-clergy in the sense that they intentionally bleed into one another. It's not uncommon for Dave to pick up the guitar and sing something, just as it's not uncommon for me to deliver a dvar Torah or teach a class."

And the idea of feeling a connection to being Jewish is something Rabbi Vaisberg tries to encourage his congregation to do.

"What we bring, which is much more the case in Canada, is a sense of obligation to your culture, the sense of doing something for the value of being part of klal Yisrael. It is a value that we often push here, not to the point of doing rituals blindly, but pushing in the sense of relations with the synagogues around us, relationships with other Jews around us and participating," he said.

"I believe in engaging and grappling with our old tradition with a full heart, because when you do that, regardless of what you choose to do, when you engage in it in all the behaviours of your life, it adds layers of meaning, and it means you'll approach the world in a better way." ■

Coffee table book celebrates Beth Tzedec's 60th anniversary

sshefa@thecjn.ca

David Ben-Gurion speaks to 4,000 schoolchildren at the shul in March 1967.

It was February 1967 when former Beth Tzedec Congregation spiritual leader Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg sat with Israel's first prime minister David Ben-Gurion on his kibbutz in the Negev, pressuring him to visit the Toronto Jewish community.

Ben-Gurion made that promise on the condition that he could speak, in Hebrew, to the community's school-aged children.

This is just one of the many highlights of Beth Tzedec's rich history that has been documented in The History Of Beth Tzedec Congregation, a coffee-table book published earlier this year, full of archival photos that date back to the 19th century, written by author, CJN contributor, journalist and genealogist Bill Gladstone.

In March 1967, just three months before the Six Day War, "some 4,000 schoolchildren occupied every seat in the [Beth Tzedec] sanctuary and the adjoining banquet hall. Speaking in both Hebrew and English, Ben-Gurion brought many of them to their feet, cheering and applauding wildly," the book states.

"'There can be no Israel without the children of Israel,' he told them. 'Learn Hebrew, visit Israel, go there to live, and help to make the Negev fertile.'"

Beth Tzedec's modern congregation, celebrating its 60th anniversary this year, has a history that dates back to the 1880s.

Two of the first and oldest Jewish congregations in Toronto, Goel Tzedec and Beth Hamidrash Hagadol, amalgamated in 1955, creating Beth Tzedec, which boasts the largest Canadian congregation with about 7,000 members.

"This tells the history, not only of the 60 years since Beth Tzedec's merger, but also of the 130 plus years since the founding of the congregations, and it really gives a good tapestry of the Jewish community in Toronto," Gladstone said.

In addition to interviewing people whose involvement with the congregation goes back more than a century, he also consulted archives that include old documents, photographs, artifacts, record books hand written in Yiddish, and minute books of board meetings from the earlier part of the synagogue's first century.

He said documenting this chapter of Canadian Jewish history is important and worthwhile.

"I think, in general, we are so consumed by the recent era, which we live through and know about more intimately, that we forget the glorious past of many of our Jewish institutions. Toronto has a long and fascinating history of the community so what I found fascinating were the early histories of both the congregations and the personalities that helped them survive difficult times...Of course, the modern era, and getting to know the rabbis, from the current rabbi, Baruch Frydman-Kohl, back to the accomplished and yet controversial Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg [who resigned from his post in 1976 due to bitter disputes with the shul's members of the board] – there are many fascinating stories that are a part of the history."

He credited Dorion Liebgott, the curator of the Beth Tzedec Rueben and Helene Dennis Museum, for championing this book and helping to co-ordinate the efforts of the editor, the designer and himself.

Liebgott joked the process of having the book produced has a history of its own, that dates back to 2009.

She said the first step was to get the archives updated by the Ontario Jewish Archives to make it easier for whoever was commissioned to write the book to do the research.

From there, a book committee was formed to help organize and edit the material Gladstone had produced.

Liebgott said Gella Rothstein, another member of the committee, with whom she worked very closely to organize the book and get it published, deserves recognition for her hard work.

But it was the late Bob Cohen, former shul president and the committee chairman who pushed Liebgott to see the project through to the end.

"He was such an enthusiastic and caring person who just wanted this thing to be done. He died very shortly before it was published and it was just the saddest thing for everybody," she said.

"Even a week or two before he died, I was invited to his home and I told him, 'Bob, don't you worry, we're going to dedicate this book to you because of all the energy and care you put into it.'"

She said one of the reasons the book took so long to produce was because the members of the board wanted to include an epilogue about what the future would hold for Beth Tzedec.

"But they were making plans for the renovations, and bringing in new staff to work with young people... so they weren't ready." She said the book was shelved for a number of years, but "every six months, Bob would call me and say 'What's happening with the book? What's happening with the book?'"

She said the committee was able to convince the board to tie the release of the book in with the 60th anniversary celebrations.

She said that as for the desire to put together an epilogue that looks to the future of the congregation, the last chapter tackles that subject.

"I think you see it come through based on what we've done in the last four or five years. I think you see that in the last chapter."

Anyone interested in obtaining a copy of the book should contact Beth Tzedec. ■

Outremont considers restrictions on houses of worship

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Chassidic community members charge that they will be "ghettoized" if Outremont goes ahead with a plan to ban new houses of worship on two of the borough's main commercial arteries.

Opponents speaking at a tense Dec. 1 public consultation on proposed zoning bylaw amendments affecting areas around Laurier and Bernard avenues said the borough is "targeting" Chassidim and acquiescing to certain residents who are prejudiced against them.

Borough Mayor Marie Cinq-Mars denied that the rezoning is aimed at restricting Chassidim, saying it applies to all religious institutions. She also took exception to complaints that she had failed to contain "hatred" expressed by supporters of the ban during the more than three-hour meeting attended by close to 300 people.

Nearly 50 people registered to speak.

Four of the five councillors voted in favour of the amendments on first reading last month, with Mindy Pollak, who is chassidic, the sole dissenter. The propoal was scheduled to go to second reading on Dec. 7.

Residents will then be able to sign a register, and if there are the required number of signatures, a referendum may be held.

The borough says the goal is to "revitalize" commercial activity. Cinq-Mars pointed out that several other boroughs have adopted similar restrictions on religious institutions in their commercial districts.

Opponents say the borough has not provided evidence that curtailing synagogues would improve business on those streets, and that no impartial study has been done. They accused it of rushing through the changes without having consulted those most affected beforehand.

Existing houses of worship in the four zones affected can remain. Thirteen other zones will continue to be open to new religious institutions, and council intends to add another one in the northwest end of the borough, near the train tracks.

Chassidim argue that they need more synagogues for their growing numbers, and in districts near where they live, including the affected zones. Close to 20 per cent of Outremont's population is Jewish, according to 2011 data.

Some of the other 13 zones are really single sites, they say, where religious buildings are already located. The proposed additional zone is not near their neighbourhood and is objectionable for other reasons.

"Cornering these establishments into a tiny space against the railway tracks is geographically problematic," Max Lieberman said before the meeting. "For both practical and social reasons, the chassidic community and other religious groups as well will find ourselves in a sort of ghetto where traffic, congestion and street safety could be a logistical nightmare."

A non-chassidic opponent, Sharon Freedman, who does not live in Outremont, suggested being near a railway yard would invoke memories of Holocaust deportations.

Chassid Hirsch Hershber said it's usually "houses of ill repute" that are relegated to the outskirts of town.

Several times Cinq-Mars had to call for order, and both public security staff and police were close by. There was audible discontent from the audience after chassidic intervenors spoke in English. Cinq-Mars told participants to speak in French "if they can," but allowed English to continue to be used otherwise.

A strained moment came when Jean Larin, a 31-year resident, said the issue is the conflict between two fundamentally different visions of what Outremont is to become.

The majority, he claimed, are secular and looking to the future, while the Chassidim are stuck in the past and have values and customs that are not in line with the majority. Worse, he claimed that they "systematically" flout bylaws and "want to create a religious enclave," suggestions that provoked applause.

Ginette Chartré said about 20 synagogues, plus six "illegal" ones, are enough, and handed in a pro-amendment petition she said had 226 signatures.

The rhetoric was also inflated at times on the other side. Anti-Jewish laws leading to the Holocaust were recalled, as well as the recent Paris terrorism.

"I don't know how you can sleep at night," said Abraham Eckstein to Cinq-Mars.

Mayer Feig, a frequent spokesperson for the chassidic community, charged that the council was avoiding the "underlying issue" in this debate. He later explained that he was referring to "the 10 or so people who come to every council meeting with an agenda" against the Chassidim. "They don't like us, they want us to disappear," he said.

Other Chassidim offered reasoned arguments, including Ben Wachsmer, who suggested the presence of more houses of worship would increase business. He owns a store on Park Avenue, in neighbouring Plateau Mont-Royal, and said his trade has increased and new stores have opened since the two synagogues came on what had been a depressed block.

A non-Jewish opponent, Elizabeth Ball, said she doesn't see why people can't "pray and shop on the same street," while another, Diane Shea, accused the council of creating unnecessary division and lacking sensitivity to the Chassidim.

The borough continues to accept written comments on the matter.

Pollak said before the meeting that she has been calling on the borough to research the issue and consider more than one approach to its zoning policies. ■

Beth Torah Congregation
קה"ל בית תורה

A traditional Family Shul in existence for 50 years. Our approach to Judaism and Jewish education merges the traditional with the modern.

We are in search of a full-time Cantor to be an integral part of sustaining and growing our family Shul and the Congregation's Jewish identity.

At Beth Torah, the Cantor is a full time member of the Clergy and is directly responsible to the Rabbi. The Cantor works closely with other members of the professional and administrative staff and the lay leadership of the Congregation.

As an essential part of our Clergy, the ideal candidate will be warm, outgoing, and an effective communicator; an enthusiastic teacher of both children and adults, possessing a love of music; and a team player who brings creativity, innovation and a deep understanding of, and respect for traditional Judaism as it merges with the modern.

The role of Cantor includes responsibilities as Clergy, music and liturgy, educational and programmatic initiatives, Synagogue leadership, event and community responsibilities.

Retiring Ontario judge looks back, ponders future

SHLOMO KAPUSTIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Ontario Superior Court Justice Sandra Chapnik is giving a tour of her chambers in downtown Toronto. A binder of achievements beckons from the sofa. An old letter from pre-mayoralty John Tory – one of 206 – congratulates her on ascending to the bench.

From a shelf across the room, the first Prime Minister Trudeau looks down, sharing face time with Chapnik. And there's 1980s Sylvester Stallone, about 30 pounds short of his current fighting weight.

"I had a hip replacement last year, and I was home six to eight weeks," Chapnik says, "and I started to look through my files. They were all a mess – brochures, pictures, newspaper articles. And I kept thinking, who was that? Who said that? Did I say that? It's like an era."

Next month the era will end, as Chapnik bows to the court's mandatory retirement age of 75. Her birthday, Jan. 13, will also be her last day on the bench, though she has three months to vacate chambers and six months to render her final decision – a "significant" one, she says.

"It's bittersweet," she says. "I've been here 24 years – that's a long time – and before that, I pretty much always worked. It's part of your persona, part of your thinking. And this place, you think differently, you write differently, you discuss things with people differently. You're in a different scene."

Sandra Chapnik

Decisions on her next act are still being considered.

"I'll take some time to contemplate how I want to spend the good years that I might realistically have left and decide what's best. People say you should do this inquiry or try to get on these tribunals or boards, but I've been there, done that. So I have to figure out what's right for me: to relax and have fun in the sun or …"

Chapnik's legal career almost crashed before launch. When she married Jerry Chapnik in 1962, he was still years away from eventual success as an ear, nose and throat specialist. Teacher's college provided the most direct route to family income.

She loved teaching, she says, but law was a dream she postponed for practical reasons. "When I was a teacher, I would go to a bar mitzvah or a party, and I would find a lawyer… I would ask, 'What did you do today? I don't need any names, but tell me what you did today and what you did last week.'"

At 33, Chapnik enrolled at Osgoode Hall Law School. Her four children ranged in age from nine to three, and while her husband cheered her decision – "my husband has always supported me in every way," she says – her father was less accepting.

"He was worried that I would neglect the kids. I said, 'I might neglect you, but they're a priority.'"

Law school proved as interesting as she had expected, but life sometimes got in the way, especially before exams.

"I can't tell you it was easy," she says, "because it wasn't. I had to really learn to be present wherever I was, and that's a lesson to learn, to put one thing aside, and when they say to wear different hats to really do that. It wasn't perfect, but if one of the kids was ill, I would stay home and get the notes from a friend."

In some ways, her life experience allowed her to focus more than other students did. "There were pinball machines at Osgoode, and between classes, they'd go to pinball and I'd go and make dinner. I would read the kids a story and put them to bed – and then start reading Lord Denning [on the law]."

After she was called to the bar, her private practice covered civil litigation and family and entertainment law. Stints as a rent review commissioner, a fact finder and mediator for the Education Relations Commission and a vice-chair of the then-Workers' Compensation Appeals Tribunal diversified her experience.

And then the prime minister called with a judgeship.

"I was very active in the bar," she says, in partial explanation, citing two from a long list of roles. "I was on the executives of the Canadian Bar Association, and was a bencher of the Law Society [of Upper Canada]."

Some older benchers had first floated the idea of becoming a judge with Chapnik one day in the Law Society lounge.

"And that got me thinking," she recalls. "And then when you're thinking about it, you can't think of anything else – yeah, that's a good idea. It wasn't something I always aspired to, like some people."

She also benefited from societal change, she says. "I must admit, I think that Kim Campbell at the time wanted to appoint more female judges, and I happened to be there, and I met her in my capacity as chair of various committees."

The number of women on the bench has since jumped from 10 per cent to 35 per cent, but "it's not enough," she says.

Chapnik has rendered judgments in more than 500 cases since she started with a Friday afternoon injunction.

Outside the courtroom, Chapnik has had many leadership roles in the Jewish community at Holy Blossom Temple, Baycrest, ORT Toronto and World ORT, with which she currently serves. She also has provided informal assistance to StandWithUs Canada.

Chapnik has four married children and 10 grandchildren. The oldest, at 21, is taking the LSAT law admission test this month. ■

99-year-old raises funds for less-fortunate seniors

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

When 99-year-old Min Katz learned that there are many senior citizens who are not fortunate enough to live as comfortably as she does in her retirement home, she decided she wanted to do something to help.

"I was at Sunnybrook Hospital and picked up a little brochure… There was an article about health, and there was an elderly man sitting at his kitchen table. He had very little money and he was debating whether he should spend the money on food for his sick wife or for her medication," Katz told The CJN from her apartment at Revera's Forest Hill Place retirement home.

"I thought, this shouldn't be."

She said when she spoke to a doctor at a geriatric clinic about the brochure, she was told about a non-profit organization called SPRINT, that works to support seniors and their caregivers to help them live independently and comfortably for as long as possible.

Katz got in touch with Stacey Landau, SPRINT's executive director, to ask her how she could help.

"My thinking was this: I'm in the comfortable Forest Hill Place on Castlefield [Avenue], and we have our comforts and we are very fortunate. And it would be wonderful to share with people who don't have what we have," she said.

She said after considering a number of ideas, they settled on raising funds through a jewelry sale – something Katz has previous experience with.

In past years, Katz collected unused costume jewelry from friends and family and held jewelry sales to raise money for an organization founded by her brother and sister-in-law called Lisa Brown Charity Foundation, named after her late niece, which raised money to educate children at a young age about mental health and suicide prevention.

Through an initiative called "We Care – Aging Together," Katz started collecting unused costume jewelry early last summer, and with the help of Revera staff, family and friends, held a fundraising sale late last month at the home.

Although Katz has been holding jewelry sales at Revera since 2011, this is the first year that the proceeds from the sale will benefit SPRINT.

Revera has generously agreed to match all funds raised by the sale.

Arei Bierstock, Katz's daughter, praised her mother for taking the initiative to give back to those in need.

"My mother, I think, is extraordinary for doing this. She is just an extraordinary woman overall. She has great compassion for other people, she's thoughtful and very, very smart," Bierstock said.

"One of the exciting characteristics of the sale is that no expenses are taken out and it's win-win for everyone. For the people who are donating, they are getting rid of the things that are cluttering their drawers and they don't want anymore, and they also know that the funds from the sale of the jewelry are going to assist other people. For the people who are buying, they are getting something at a great price and are giving to charity when they do that."

Min Katz

Katz said she hopes the jewelry sale will continue year after year, and that the idea will spread to other Revera retirement homes throughout the country.

"This is also a way of helping residents get involved. One of the things that has been really important in elderly people's lives is a sense of purpose and giving back. That has been such a motivator for mom. I'm really proud of her," Bierstock said. ■

Kerry, Clinton speak out against single-state solution

RON KAMPEAS
JTA WASHINGTON, D.C.

Both U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry and Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton spoke out against a single-state solution over the weekend.

"How does Israel possibly maintain its character as a Jewish democratic state?" Kerry said Dec. 5 at the Saban Forum in Washington, D.C.

Would Palestinians "be relegated to a permanent underclass? Would they be segregated?" he asked.

Kerry's forceful questioning of Israeli policy as well Israeli Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon's outright derision of U.S. Middle East policy the previous evening underscored the divisions that continue to dog the governments of U.S. President Barack Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Kerry told the forum, which is sponsored by the Israeli-American entertainment mogul Haim Saban and convened by the Brookings Institution to bring together U.S. and Israeli leaders, that he believed Netanyahu was committed to a two-state outcome, but it was clear that "many" ministers in his Cabinet were not.

Should Israel abandon plans for two states, Kerry said, the Palestinian Authority (PA) would likely collapse, and Israel would have to assume many of the functions it now carries out, including policing the Palestinians. More comprehensively, Israel would have to consider how it governs an entity with a Jewish minority.

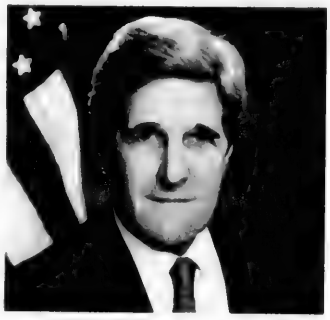
"The level of mistrust" between Israelis and Palestinians "has never been more profound," Kerry said.

Clinton spoke the next day and stressed that "it is time to stop pretending that solving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict will solve all of the region's problems," she emphasized her commitment to working toward a peace agreement. "I remain convinced... that peace is possible. So I refuse to give up on the goal of two states for two peoples.

"Only a two-state solution can provide Palestinians independence, sovereignty and dignity and provide Israelis the secure and recognized borders of a democratic Jewish state," she said.

"Inaction is not an option and a one-state solution is no solution, it is a prescription for endless conflict," she said, echoing Kerry's comments a day earlier.

"Everyone has to do their part to create the conditions for progress by taking positive actions that can rebuild trust and by avoiding damaging actions including with respect to settlements," she said. "At the same time, we should oppose any unilateral action at the United Nations."



U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry

Presidential candidate Hillary Clinton

Clinton criticized Israeli leaders who have suggested that PA President Mahmoud Abbas is not a viable partner for a peace deal.

"It is unfortunate [Abbas] has been marginalized when there is in effect no better alternative... especially when the alternative could be the black flag of [Islamic State] ISIS," she admonished.

Netanyahu, in a last-minute addition, delivered a 10-minute video address rebutting their warning. He said the core issue hindering Israeli-Palestinian peace was the Palestinian refusal to recognize Israel as a Jewish state.

"The Palestinians have not yet been willing to cross that conceptual bridge, the emotional bridge of giving up the dream of not a state next to Israel, but of a state instead of Israel," Netanyahu said.

He also called out Abbas for denying the legitimacy of Israel as a Jewish state, describing his comments as emblematic of Palestinian denialism that has undermined attempts to negotiate a peace agreement.

The unfiltered bickering showed that last month's friendly Netanyahu-Obama summit did not entirely patch up tensions and hurt feelings stoked by Kerry's failed attempt in 2014 to broker an Israeli-Palestinian peace deal and by this year's Iran nuclear deal, which was backed by Obama and opposed by Netanyahu.

Kerry, at Saban, asked how Israelis imagined the international community would react to a scenario in which Palestinians were permanently denied rights. He studiously avoided the term "apartheid"; his previous use of the term to describe the likely outcome of a collapse of the peace process drew sharp criticism from Jewish-American groups.

Kerry said Israel and the Palestinians were sowing despair – Israel through continued settlement expansion and the demolition of Palestinian homes, and the Palestinians through countenancing incitement and their failure to condemn attacks on Israelis.

"Abu Mazen needs to change the rhetoric," Kerry said, referring to Abbas. Kerry singled out as "incendiary" Abbas' charges recently that Israel planned to alter the status quo at the Temple Mount-Haram al Sharif, a Jerusalem site holy to Jews and Muslims.

Clinton promised that if elected, her first task would be to reach out to the Israeli prime minister and invite him to the White House in an effort to strengthen U.S.-Israel ties.

U.S. and Israeli leaders, the Democratic front-runner said, "must remind our peoples how much they have in common and keep our relationship always above partisan politics."

Calling Israel an "ally and true friend... now and forever," Clinton vowed to "take the already strong relationship to the next level.

"It is in our national interest to have an Israel that remains a bastion of stability and a core ally in a region in chaos," she said.

Much of the recent spate of deadly violence in the West Bank and Israel has been stoked by tensions surrounding the Temple Mount.

Kerry chided leaders on both sides for sniping at one another.

"If all you're doing is hurling invective at each other on a daily basis," there is little prospect for peace, he said.

Kerry said Israel was effectively allowing Israeli expansion into Area C, the largest part of the West Bank where Israel maintains control and which the Palestinians say they need for a viable state.

"Settlements are absolutely no excuse for violence," he said. "But continued settlement growth raises questions" about Israel's intentions.

Kerry said that in Area C, Israel had granted only a single permit for Palestinian building over the previous year, while enshrining as legal many illegal Israeli settlement outposts in the area.

"You get that?" he said, appearing to challenge the Israelis present.

Israel's Defence Minister Ya'alon said the previous evening that Israel preferred a "slowly, slowly" approach to the Palestinians, preferring to focus on Israel's security needs and unspecified progress on the political and economic tracks for the Palestinians.

Kerry also sharply pushed back against Ya'alon's claims that the United States had failed to show leadership in confronting the Islamic State terrorist group making gains in Iraq and Syria.

"We have led a coalition of 65 countries to fight, degrade and defeat Daesh," Kerry said, using the Arabic acronym for ISIS. "We are not naive."

The "naive" comment appeared to be a direct rebuke to Ya'alon, who was present, and who in the past has used the term – not to mention "messianic" – to describe Kerry.

Ya'alon had said that Russia was showing more resolve in the fight than the United States.

"Unfortunately, in the current situation, Russia is playing a more significant role than the United States," eliciting some gasps at the stately Willard Hotel in downtown Washington.

Ya'alon in his talk said Israel preferred a fractured Syria as an outcome, with separate enclaves for the Shiites, the Druze, the anti-Islamic State Sunnis and the Kurds.

"This is the only good option that might come out of this chaotic situation," he said.

Kerry and Ya'alon agreed on one thing: they each said that whatever the political differences between the United States and Israel, the defence relationship remained "superb." ■

ANALYSIS

Is the PA heading for disintegration?

AVI ISSACHAROFF
JERUSALEM

United States Secretary of State John Kerry's scenario outlining a potential collapse of the Palestinian Authority (PA), laid out Dec. 5 at the Saban Forum in Washington, D.C., sounds more than realistic.

For a change, the U.S. administration, an expert at making fatal mistakes in the Middle East, seems to read the state of Palestinian affairs correctly, though the secretary errs in using the word "collapse."

Instead, it should be substituted with the term "disintegration," which in some ways has already begun.

The shooting attack on Dec. 3, in which Preventive Security Services member Mazen Aribe opened fire on Israel Defence Forces soldiers near the Hizme checkpoint, marks a crossroads.

Aribe was killed by fire from soldiers at the scene. The Palestinian Authority, instead of condemning or at least not supporting the action, sent head Palestine Liberation Organization negotiator Saeb Erekat and the mayor of Jericho to visit the home of the attacker's family.

The implicit message was that the PA and PLO support such actions. Has the PA come to a point where it has decided not to oppose homegrown attacks?

For the time being, the Palestinian security services are maintaining relatively high discipline and continuing the exceptional security co-ordination with Israel. Officials in the office of the Co-ordinator of Government Activities in the Territories (COGAT) speak almost daily with their Palestinian counterparts, and a number of high-level security meetings are being held even in these difficult days.

Still, it is clear to all involved that there is a big question mark concerning how long this security co-ordination, and the Palestinian forces maintaining discipline, can be maintained.

What, exactly, will a PA disintegration look like? At the start, probably the way things happened last Thursday. Maybe an isolated incident, with a Palestinian police officer or two who decide to attack Israeli targets and cause many Israeli casualties.

From there, an Israeli response will follow. Or maybe an Israeli retaliatory shooting will bring a high number of Palestinian casualties.

And then will come a grassroots demand by members of the security services to act against soldiers and settlers.

And as happened at the beginning of the Second Intifadah in 2000, we will see more and more Palestinian soldiers and police joining the demonstrations and attacks against Israelis.

The path from here to an Israeli decision to impose sanctions on the PA, ending security co-ordination, would be short. And then would come a halt on the transfer of tax monies to the PA – used to pay salaries – a demand that is already being heard on the Israeli right.

Another few days would pass, and more Palestinian police who are not getting paid would decide to carry out attacks. Meanwhile, government clerks would not come to work, and of course, above all of these steps hovers the possibility that PA President Mahmoud Abbas would announce, at any point, that he is "returning the keys" to Israel and dissolving the PA: If there must be occupation, then let's have a full occupation.

Another, shorter scenario may materialize if the PLO decides to renege on its recognition of the State of Israel. This could be met with Israeli sanctions such as the halting of tax transfers, and here, too, the path to a complete collapse may be short.

And then what? A considerable amount of chaos, a heavy presence of Hamas and other terror groups as in the first intifadah. And, in all likelihood, Israel will have to recapture the Palestinian cities and reinstate military rule.

The security and economic burden on Israel will be heavy. And, of course, in the longer term there will be a departure from the vision of two states, or – as they will call it on the right – a sobering up. Welcome to the binational state.

If this is the shape of things to come, Kerry may have his own boss's administration to blame.

Kerry invested significantly in attempts to solve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. But he was stymied by a White House that showed amateurism and maybe even ignorance in dealing with the region's problems.

In the Palestinian context, this started with U.S. President Barack Obama's almost-obsessive focus on pushing a building freeze in the settlements.

When he decided to back off on this issue, he discovered that it was already too late, and Abbas refused to enter talks without a construction moratorium.

On the Palestinian question, Kerry acted reasonably, logically and full of motivation, at least until recent months. But problems in our neck of the woods are nothing compared to mistakes in Syria, Iraq and, of course, Iran.

For whatever reason, Washington still insists on seeing the Iran nuclear deal as a glorious achievement for the United States, even though it is far from being so.

The White House and the American administration do not have anything to be proud of regarding the Middle East, including the Iran deal.

The nuclear reckoning may be delayed, but the Iranian monster is stronger than ever and will harmfully influence the region.

This administration, which prides itself on Obama's "Cairo Speech" and on the fact that it abandoned former Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak and advanced democratic ideals, will leave Washington with the Middle East in ruins.

The worst is most likely still ahead of us. ■

Parisians light menorah despite security concerns

JTA
PARIS

Some 6,000 people gathered in Paris under heavy security for the public lighting of a Chanukah menorah at the base of the Eiffel Tower, despite security concerns in the wake of last month's terrorist attacks.

French Chief Rabbi Haim Korsia lit the first candle of a 30-foot menorah on Dec. 6, the first night of Chanukah in the Eiffel tower ceremony attended by French Jewish leaders and government representative and sponsored by Chabad-Lubavitch.

"This year, Chanukah delivers a particularly relevant message," Rabbi Chaim Schneur Nisenbaum of the Complexe Scolaire Beth Haya Moushka school system in Paris said. "In Paris, we very recently faced terrible attacks ... intended to put an end to freedom of mind and opinions. In the historical times of Hanukkah, the invaders of the land of Israel, the Greeks, had the same intention. But the Jews did not submit."

The Eiffel Tower event is one of more than 30 public menorah-lighting celebrations scheduled to take place across the city and in nearly 100 towns nearby. The public gatherings, which had to be approved in advance, are being held under heavy security, according to Chabad.org.

Rumours circulated before Chanukah that public menorah lightings would be canceled in light of the state of emergency in Paris initiated after the Nov. 13 co-ordinated attacks that left at least 130 dead.

Two of the menorah lighting venues of previous years, Republic Square and Bastille Square, both located near the Bataclan theater – the site of one of last month's attacks – were not approved, Rabbi Nisenbaum told Chabad.org.

Public Chanukah celebrations in the French city of Marseille will be held indoors this year at the request of public security officials, according to Chabad.org. Marseille has been the location of several violent attacks against Jews in recent months and has a history of attacks on Jews. ■

Complaint filed against prof over rebuff of Israeli girl

RENEE GHERT-ZAND
JERUSALEM

An anti-Semitism watchdog organization in the United Kingdom has filed a complaint with the police against Marsha Levine, the British-American former Cambridge University professor who rebuffed a request for information from an Israeli schoolgirl, citing Israel's treatment of the Palestinians.

The Campaign Against Anti-Semitism filed the complaint with the Cambridgeshire Constabulary following the recent media storm that erupted when the mother of 13-year-old Shachar Rabinovitch posted a message on Facebook detailing Levine's response to an email from her daughter.

Shachar, a horse enthusiast, had contacted Levine, an expert on the domestication and history of the animal, asking for information about breeding patterns and the use of horses by humans in ancient times.

According to Shachar's mother, Levine responded to her daughter by saying, "I'll answer your questions when there is peace and justice for Palestinians in Palestine."

When interviewed by The Jewish Chronicle on the matter, Levine defended her response to the Israeli girl. She identified herself as a member of the pro-BDS Jews for Justice for Palestinians and characterized Israelis as "monsters."

"Benjamin Netanyahu wants ethnic cleansing. The Jews have become the Nazis," she said.

"I don't see any obligation to further her ego or make her feel better about herself," Levine said of the girl who had merely sent her the inquiry about horses.

Jonathan Sacerdoti, director of communications for Campaign Against Anti-Semitism, refused to comment further on the complaint lodged with the police.

"At this time we can't say anything that might prejudice the investigation that the police have undertaken," Sacerdoti told The Times of Israel on Dec. 4.

Campaign Against Anti-Semitism is a year-old charity organization founded to research and monitor anti-Semitism in the UK. It also engages in raising awareness and strengthening education about anti-Semitism. The organization, which is independent of other UK Jewish community organizations, says it relies entirely on a large network of expert volunteers in a variety of fields, all of whom work pro-bono.

According to Sacerdoti, the organization seeks legal counsel when it suspects that the law may have been broken, and it takes action if advised to do so.

> Cambridge University professor

"We are pushing for a zero tolerance policy under British law with regard to anti-Semitism," he said.

Unlike Levine, who has refused to help Rabinovitch, several other experts on horses have offered to provide her with the information she seeks.

Prof. James Russell, a member of the Department of Near Eastern Languages and Civilizations at Harvard University, contacted the Times of Israel saying, "I have done some research in this subject, have published a bit on ancient horsemanship, and would be delighted and honored to be of service to the student."

Russell said he found Levine's "politicization of school children" to be "beyond belief."

"Prof. Levine's conduct is unprofessional and beneath human contempt. It makes one ashamed to be a member of the same academic profession. But it does reflect very accurately the character of the BDS movement and of those who support it," he said.

Russell said he has regretfully seen politics come into play and professors shame students in university classrooms.

"This, however, is a first. This really crossed a line," he said of Levine's response to the child.

Russell, who has been a visiting professor at the Hebrew University and regularly returns to Jerusalem, plans on bringing a book for Shachar when he makes a trip to Israel later this month.

"It's titled, The Horse, The Wheel, and Language. It's very big and very scholarly and it's in English. I don't know whether Shachar will be able to absorb it all right now, but if I bring it and give it to her she can live with it and read it as she grows up. In the meantime I'd be happy to answer her questions as best I can," he said. ■

Left-wing MK recalled for his 'honesty and integrity'

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

Family and friends of former MK Yossi Sarid attend his funeral in Givat Hashlosha cemetery near Petah Tikva on Dec. 6. FLASH90 PHOTO

Politicians, public intellectuals and hundreds of Israelis from all walks of life gathered Dec.6 at the Kibbutz Givat Hashlosha cemetery on the outskirts of Tel Aviv for the funeral of former Meretz party chairman Yossi Sarid, who died Dec. 4 from heart-related causes at the age of 75.

"My father was always concerned about something or other, and the weight of the world was always on his shoulders," Sarid's son Yishai said at the funeral. "Dad told me that a man should live not only for himself, but also for others."

Known for his articulate, sardonic style and colourful turns of phrase, Sarid was a member of nine Knessets from 1974 to 2006, serving as a lawmaker for the (Labor) Alignment, Ratz and Meretz parties.

An icon of the Israeli left, Sarid held two portfolios – education and environment – and led Meretz from 1996 to 2003, serving as head of the opposition for the latter two years of his party leadership.

After retiring in 2006, he began a weekly column in the liberal newspaper Ha'aretz.

Yishai Sarid recalled the hostile attitudes his father encountered while serving in office, but added that the politician was never deterred and continued to strive to achieve a better future for the State of Israel.

"I remember the graffiti [against Sarid] and the threats on the phone, [but] I also remember the short time that Father served as a minister in the Israeli government," Yishai Sarid said. "He tried within his power to do what was right and what was good."

Author Amos Oz, one of Israel's most prominent writers and a close friend of Sarid, paid tribute to the left-wing public official at the funeral as well.

"We part today, on the first night of Chanukah candlelighting, with a person who emitted such light," Oz said. "We part with a brave and wise man, stubborn and wide-eyed. He was one of the first who noticed that occupation and annexation lead to disaster, that religious coercion threatens our very link with the heritage of the people of Israel. [Sarid's] attachment to the heritage of Israel was deep and emotional."

Meretz Leader Zehava Galon also paid tribute to her former colleague after he was laid to rest.

"Yossi Sarid devoted his life to the struggle against a reality in which Israel becomes more violent and less democratic, a messianic state, withdrawn and paranoid, led by a government that shuts them down, passes racist legislation, and deepens the discrimination against Israel's Arab citizens," Galon said.

"Yossi, in his words and deeds, fought for the best image of the State of Israel, an educating [country], secular, democratic, peaceful, equality seeking and loving."

Earlier, ideological opponents and political allies alike mourned the death of Sarid.

"Yossi Sarid was a unique voice in Israeli politics, an opinionated, sharp man," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said of the left-wing public official on Saturday.

"Although we differed on many issues, I appreciated his loyalty to his path, his broad education and the meticulous Hebrew expressed in his speech and writings. He will be remembered also for being a prominent parliamentarian, a longtime member of the foreign affairs and defence committee, and an education minister who sought to advance the education system in Israel."

President Reuven Rivlin, who served as an MK with the right-wing Likud party during Sarid's tenure as head of Meretz, called the deceased parliamentarian a "tough political opponent, challenging and loyal to his views." Sarid, Rivlin added, was "one of the greatest politicians of the State of Israel."

Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon of the Likud mourned Sarid's death as well, noting his unabated concern for the well-being of the state and its citizens.

"Despite the political debate I had with Yossi Sarid, I always appreciated his honesty and his integrity, his intelligence and sharpness of wit, and the fact that he followed the path he believed, according to his conscience and values, without having to deviate from, or adapt to, any passing fad," Ya'alon said. "Sarid was an Israeli patriot whose concerns for the future of the country and its security were at the top of his mind, as a Knesset member, a minister of education, as a public leader, and as a sharp writer."

Meretz Knesset faction chair Ilan Gilon said Dec. 4 that Sarid will "always be remembered as the man who made an indelible mark on education in Israel. After his political career, he became a journalist and man of letters of razor-sharp tongue and pure voice, loyal to the values of humanism, human rights and peace. His image will forever be etched in our hearts."

MK Tamar Zandberg, a fellow Meretz member, said Sarid's death was "a personal and political loss for the left and the whole country. "We are talking about a leader, a sharp and honest person, a courageous man from whom I learned a lot over the years. We cried over his departure from politics and now we mourn over his passing. May his memory be blessed."

Meretz MK Issawi Frej said, "Sarid was a father to me, and served as no less than a political and ideological compass. Yossi is one of the people thanks to whom I continue to believe in the possibility of making the State of Israel a better and more just place."

Zionist Union MK Tzipi Livni called Sarid's passing "the death of a fighter for the core of this country.

"You could disagree with him, but you could not avoid listening to his razor-sharp words. Even at his most cynical, his words always came from the least cynical and most painful place possible. May his memory be a blessing," she said.

Zionist Union head and Opposition Leader Isaac Herzog called Sarid "an important leader of the Israeli peace camp. His sharp, clear voice always stood out stubbornly for a brave, uncompromising truth he believed with all his heart. As minister of education, he left a deep mark on the education system and the country as a whole. His beliefs, writings and life work will remain a formidable heritage that will be with us all for years to come."

Merav Michaeli, another Zionist Union MK, also paid tribute to Sarid, calling him a role model. "I have been a fan of Yossi Sarid since June 1982. I was in 10th grade that year when the [First] Lebanon War broke out. The only one to oppose it clearly and loudly was Yossi Sarid. All the others took more or less time to understand this was a futile war, and I remember how impressed I was with his courage to come out against it.

"He was a model for many of us and now a great loss for all of us, even those who opposed him. His is a voice Israel needs now more than ever, and it is our responsibility to continue sounding it. How sad it is to part with him so prematurely," she added.

Yossi Sarid is survived by his wife, Dorit, and their three children. ■

ZAKA honours the living around the world

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, JERUSALEM

Yehuda Meshi-Zahav has travelled far from his Neturei Karta origins. Growing up haredi in a family fervently opposed to Zionism, Meshi-Zahav, chairman of ZAKA Search and Rescue, has turned his life over to serving Israel and the Jewish people.

He'll be in Toronto this weekend with an important message for Jews all over the world. "ZAKA is not our organization. We are only the soldiers in the field doing this work, but the organization belongs to the Jewish people around the world."

Best known for its work in what ZAKA International director David Rose calls "forensic chesed shel emet," ranging from terrorism to car accidents and suicides, ZAKA volunteers show up far beyond the scenes most people associate with the organization's distinctive fluorescent green vests.

In 2010, ZAKA – an acronym for "identifying the victims of disaster" – travelled to Haiti to retrieve the body of 36-year-old Montreal businessman Shmuel Alexander Bitton, who had just checked into his hotel when a deadly earthquake struck. Though the Israeli Defence Forces (IDF) said searching was too risky, and local authorities wanted to bulldoze the building, ZAKA combed through the hotel until Bitton's remains were found.

In 2006, ZAKA volunteers were also on scene to search for two Toronto men who went missing while fishing on Lake Nipissing, Ont.

"What other organization will go from one end of the earth to the other to bring back the body of a Jewish boy?" asks Meshi-Zahav. In the week he spoke with The CJN, ZAKA was active in the Philippines and Mali, as well as countless incidents within Israel itself.

Canadian Ambassador Vivian Bercovici has encouraged Meshi-Zahav to travel to Canada, to set up local units if possible. He will speak at Kehillat Shaarei Torah in Toronto on Shabbat Chanukah as well as at Aish HaTorah's Thornhill Community Shul.

Sharing ZAKA's message is a mission Meshi-Zahav accepted the day he witnessed a terrorist bus explosion in 1989. An 11th-generation Jerusalemite with ties to the extremist Eda Haredit, his family had demonstrated against the State of Israel. All that changed in an instant.

"I had to put aside all my differences," he says. "I started to interact more and more with Israelis, with Zionists, with the government." Though his family and community denounced him, he insists, "This is the way I live. This is what I believe in."

On Yom Ha'atzmaut in 2003, Meshi-Zahav was given the honour of lighting a torch in the main government ceremony on Mount Herzl.

"People talk about divisiveness in Israeli society. They need to come to ZAKA to see just the opposite, how we can get along with one another. Regardless of what you are, what sex, what you believe in; Jewish, not Jewish; religious, not religious."

The organization already has teams all over the world, including in England, New York and France. In terrorist incidents at the Hyper Cacher market in Paris last year, and a few years earlier in Toulouse, local ZAKA units were ready to respond. "It's something that people don't think is going to happen," says Rose. "But ZAKA is always ready for what tomorrow brings."

ZAKA's motto is, "Saving those who can be saved; honouring those who cannot."

In Israel, ZAKA volunteers, many of whom also work with Magen David Adom, contributed 1.5 million hours in 2014. Although most are Orthodox or haredi, they come from all walks of life and serve every victim, regardless of background, race, ethnicity or religion, including the terrorists themselves.

"The work of ZAKA is absurd," says ZAKA's northern chief officer, Chezky Farkas. "We take care of the victims and also the person who killed them."

However, in October, at Meshi-Zahav's initiative, ZAKA started using black body bags for terrorists' remains.

"ZAKA is a holy organization," says Meshi-Zahav. "We have to deal with (terrorists), but at the same time, we're not going to honour them the same way." Terrorists' bodies are also transported separately.

He and his team have travelled to Thailand, Nepal, Mumbai and beyond. "There isn't a shaliach of Chabad who doesn't know Yehuda Meshi-Zahav," says Rose. "There is not an Israeli ambassador or consul around the world that Yehuda cannot call up at 2 o' clock in the morning." With his distinctive white beard and payot, he is often recognized on the streets of Israel with waves and shouts of gratitude. "He's a celebrity in Israel today."

In the Mali terrorist incident on Nov. 20, in which an Israeli teacher was killed, ZAKA acted as an unofficial government emissary, since Mali does not maintain diplomatic ties with Israel. ZAKA is recognized by the United Nations for its humanitarian work, and consistently ranks second after the IDF among the country's best-loved NGOs.

ZAKA's holy imperative comes from the Torah, which teaches that a hanged murderer should not be left overnight. "Each person is created in the image of God." Even the High Priest on his way to perform the Yom Kippur service in the Holiest of Holies – if he encountered an unattended body – had to drop everything to bury the body.

Despite the halachic urgency of his task, Meshi-Zahav says ZAKA is more about honouring the living than the dead. "The psychological effect on a family," he says, "for them to have that closure, that's the most important thing we can do today.

"ZAKA is the only organization in the world that hopes we'll be out of a job," says Meshi-Zahav. "But we have to be ready, we must be available in real time, and we must have the tools that we need in order to continue doing what we need to do." ■

California terrorist was 'obsessed' with Israel, his father says

ROSSELLA TERCATIN
ROME

Syed Farook, father of San Bernardino terrorist Syed Rizwan Farook, has described his son as negatively "obsessed" with Israel.

In an interview with Italian daily La Stampa, Farook said that he once tried to console his son by promising him that Israel would not exist in another two years because "China, Russia and America will bring the Jews back to Ukraine."

In last Sunday's La Stampa report, Farook said, "My son said that he shared [Islamic State leader Abu Bakr] Baghdadi's ideology and supported the creation of the Islamic State. He was also obsessed with Israel."

"I told him he had to stay calm and be patient because in two years Israel will not exist any more. Geopolitics is changing: Russia, China and America don't want Jews there any more. They are going to bring the Jews back to Ukraine. What is the point of fighting? We have already done it and we lost. Israel is not to be fought with weapons, but with politics. But he did not listen to me, he was obsessed," Farook explained to U.S. correspondent Paolo Mastrolilli.

Farook's son is suspected of carrying out a mass shooting that killed 14 people in San Bernardino, Calif. The father was interviewed in Corona, Calif., where he lives with his older son, Syed Raheel Farook, a U.S. Navy veteran.

Farook senior was born in Pakistan and arrived in the United States in 1973. The family has been described by many as very integrated in American society, almost the embodiment of the American dream.

Farook told La Stampa how, once in the United States, he got a degree in engineering and started to work hard to guarantee his children "an education and the opportunity to succeed in life."

Other reports told a more nuanced story: Farook split from his wife Rafia, also Pakistan-born, who filed for divorce in 2006 and, according to the New York Times, said her husband was violent and an alcoholic and beat her and the children.

In the La Stampa interview, Farook denied the accusations, saying that "Rizwan's mother is very religious, as he was, and they united against me. Once we had a dispute over the historical figure of Jesus. My son called me a godless person and he decided that my marriage with my wife had to end," he recalled. "They destroyed the family."

Farook declared himself in complete despair and disbelief over what his son allegedly did. His daughters, Rizwan's sisters, told the New York Times that they had seen no warning signs. ■

I'll Never Smile Again a true story of lost love

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

I'll Never Smile Again, a song penned by a Jewish songwriter from Toronto, launched Frank Sinatra's career and held the No. 1 spot on Billboard for 12 weeks in 1940.

Since then, I'll Never Smile Again, written by Ruth Lowe, has been recorded by dozens of artists, including Count Basie, Fats Waller, George Shearing, Billie Holiday, Michael Buble and, most recently, by Toronto singer Molly Johnson.

The sad story behind the song was a factor in the success of the standard penned by his then 25-year-old mother in 1939, Tom Sandler said. Lowe, a talented pianist, joined an all-girl touring band in 1935. While in Chicago, she went on a blind date with Harold Cohen, a song plugger. They married in 1938, but a year later, Cohen died during routine surgery at the age of 29.

Devastated, Lowe returned to Toronto. One night she sat down to play piano and transformed her mood into the melody for I'll Never Smile Again, Sandler said. Meanwhile, Lowe's family was in financial straits. To help support them, Lowe got a job playing piano at CBC, where she met the bandleader Percy Faith, who recorded I'll Never Smile Again.

When Tommy Dorsey came to town with his band, along with his new vocalist, Sinatra, Lowe pitched the song to Dorsey, who was likely impressed that a young woman had an orchestrated arrangement of her song on record, Sandler said. "He had tried a couple of other songs with Sinatra before they did I'll Never Smile Again and they didn't go anywhere, and they were looking for a song that would launch his career. When he heard I'll Never Smile Again, he knew that it was 'the' song."

Another factor in the song's success was its timing, he said. "The war had just broken out and women were losing their husbands. It was a song that everyone could relate to." Sinatra, who would have turned 100 on Dec. 10, liked I'll Never Smile Again so much that he asked Lowe to write another song for him. She then co-wrote Put Your Dreams Away, which became Sinatra's signature closing song in the 1940s. It was played after his funeral in 1998. Once Lowe got over the tragedy of losing her young husband, she had a lot of fun, Sandler said. In 1945, shortly after another blind date, Lowe married the late Nathan Sandler, the first Jewish member of the Toronto Stock Exchange. They had two sons, Tom, who was named after Tommy Dorsey, and Stephen.

"She was crazy about my dad and they had a great relationship," Tom said. Lowe didn't stop writing songs, though. One of them, an upbeat gospel tune she wrote with Sandler, called Take Me To The River, was recorded by The Travellers in the 1960s.

Sandler remembers a parade of well-known local musicians, including Rob McConnell, Peter Appleyard and Oscar Peterson, visiting his family's Forest Hill home. Lowe also kept in touch with some of her songwriter pals, among them, Sammy Cahn and Johnny Marks (the Jewish American songwriter who penned Rudolph, The Red-Nosed Reindeer), and she frequently visited music publishers in the Brill Building in New York.

Sandler said his mother, who died in 1981, was a musician's musician and has been credited with being one of the architects of the American ballad.

Seven years ago, Sandler, a photographer, was hired to take pictures at a charity event where he met the musical giant Quincy Jones. Jones told Sandler he'd first heard I'll Never Smile Again when he was 10 years old. "Not only do I only remember the song, I remember the story behind the song. It was one of the songs that inspired my career," Jones told Sandler.

I'll Never Smile Again has been inducted into the Grammy Hall of Fame and into the Canadian Songwriters Hall of Fame, along with Put Your Dreams Away. To see an excellent documentary about Lowe, visit YouTube and search for Ruth Lowe. ■

A dialogue between siblings

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Conversations For Two
by Jacqueline Markowitz

The Jam Press

Conversations for Two, is a multi-layered exploration of suicide and grief, and yet despite the grim subject matter, this book is a surprisingly easy read.

The narrator of this debut novel by Jacqueline Markowitz is a middle-aged mother named Jackie, who is trying to make sense of her older brother John's suicide. She revisits the trauma she experienced as a teenager struggling with the shock of John's death and mines his writings to gain insight into who he was and why he ended his life.

By integrating his poetry and writings into the narrative, Markowitz has set up a remarkable dialogue between the siblings, hence the book's title. By probing her late brother's writings, the narrator brings him to life.

In a recent interview, Markowitz called the book a work of "fiction with elements of true life experiences."

She did indeed have an older brother named John, who had been an accomplished poet and a prolific writer. He did, in fact, commit suicide at age 24 and she had to grapple with his death when she was 17.

Markowitz also disclosed another important fact: her brother's actual writings were lost to the family, but 25 years after his death she was able to retrieve his works through a chance encounter, which she details in the book.

This serendipitous event inspired Markowitz to write Conversations for Two, she said. "I feel that this book wanted to be written. It was bashert."

One of the most fascinating aspects of this novel is the unique interplay between the fictional narrative and John's actual writings. "His poetry and my prose intermingle," Markowitz said.

The font changes as the writing shifts back and forth between the siblings. "I talk to him a lot in the book. Through his writing I got a sense of knowing him in a more intimate way."

Much of the narrative takes place in and around Toronto of the early 1970s. Jackie's adolescent memories of John surface, but they are filtered through the lens of her adult self.

She recalls happy times with John – a Beatles concert, rock festivals, visits to the commune where he lived and hanging out with his hippie friends.

Markowitz aptly captures the mood of those times – the legendary music, the psychedelic colours, the flowing skirts, peasant shirts, bandanas, drugs, and iconic Toronto landmarks like Grossman's Tavern on Spadina Avenue, the experimental Rochdale College and Yorkville, then a hippie hangout

Her description of Yorkville exemplifies her rich prose writing. "Music exhaled through doors ajar and trinkets and talismans bejewelled the boutiques. They gathered, flower children stirring in an intoxicating brew of peace and love."

John's life – much of which Markowitz imagined from his writings – was defined by the counter-cultural movement and his poetry reflects the ethos of that era: "suns & smiles, a collection of poems written with the purpose of writing a poem perhaps to further the never ending cause of peace and love."

In contrast to this world, Markowitz has also rooted the story in the mundane details of the narrator's upbringing. Hers was an ordinary middle-class home, that typified many Jewish households in Toronto.

Markowitz makes reference to the sponge cake Jackie's mother made from a recipe from Second Helpings Please!, the kosher cookbook so ubiquitous in Jewish homes across Canada.

She describes her mother's china cabinet with its quintessential display of prized English bone china cups and saucers that were so common in mid-20th century homes before the onslaught of made-in China tchatchkes from the dollar stores of the 21st century.

Conversations for Two is an impressive undertaking. It succeeds in immersing the reader into the dialogue between the protagonist and her late brother, offering insight into the pain and grief triggered by a sudden and untimely death.

The book can be purchased online through thejampress.com and in Toronto at Type (427 Spadina Rd. or 883 Queen St. W.) An e-book edition is available through Amazon. ■

Parfumerie's playwright relies on an old friend

DOROTHY LICHTBLAU
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Parfumerie starring Gregory Prest and Michelle Monteith is adapted by Adam Pettle and Brenda Robins.

Ask playwright and television screenwriter/producer, Adam Pettle why he and actor/writer Brenda Robins decide to create another adaptation of Miklos Laszlos' 1937 romantic play Parfumerie and his response is matter-of-fact.

Robins, a friend and colleague, who is a classic movie buff, realized that this oft-retold tale about two shop clerks who bicker throughout the day but at night unwittingly write anonymous love letters to one another, still moved audiences.

Interested in bringing the show to Toronto, she approached Soulpepper's artistic director Albert Schultz about creating an adaptation of Parfumerie for his company. Schultz was interested but since Robins was a novice writer, he advised her to team up with an experienced professional.

Robins tapped Pettle on the shoulder. Not only was he glad to work with his friend and to see her through the project but he thought that this old world romance could be a success. "It's an aspirational, feel good story with great holiday potential", he explains.

Though he began his career as a playwright, writing Therac 25, Zaidie's Shoes, Sunday Father, and Rattle the Bones among others, over he past eight years Pettle has been producing and writing for television. Currently he is the show runner and executive producer for Raising Hope, a CTV drama series. Much of his current work involves bringing together and shaping the final scripts for the series' shows. He took a similar role when working with Robins.

Since Robins initiated the project and brought in the budget for the story she led the writing. Pettle says, "Brenda would send me drafts of the work and I would make suggestions or edits. Brenda is a wonderful actor, who brought a beginner's mind to scriptwriting. She was more loose and free in her approach, while I was more aware of structure, so was able to dramaturge and help shape her play."

Pettle describes their adaptation as a marriage of a certain kind of European sensibility, along the lines of Chekhov or Molière, with romantic comedy. He calls the result, "a warm and witty play with some darker moments."

Laszlo's original work is a romance but also an homage to the people and places of his hometown, Budapest, before World War II. Though laced with humour, the script does not shy from alluding to citizens' fears of what looms ahead.

"Our adaptation," explains Pettle, "successfully brought together a love story that at times reveals characters' concerns and longing. Sometimes the play switches mood on the turn of a dime. This is something I'm drawn to; bringing comedy and tragedy to play side by side."

Pettle observes that Toronto audiences seem to enjoy the family feeling of the play and the romance at its centre. He feels, too, that audiences take pleasure in watching the folks on stage enjoying the festive season, just as they currently are. Specifically, he thinks it is the expression of family spirit as embodied by the clan of the perfume shop owner, Hammerschmidt, that touches audiences. He adds that unlike many romantic comedies, Laszlo's play has, "fine three-dimensional characterizations that give the story more depth."

Pettle's prediction that the play would be a success was correct but neither he nor Robins imagined that it would become a perennial favourite. The show sold out during the last few seasons.

He attributes this positive reception to the talents of the theatre artists who brought the world of Parfumerie to life under the leadership of director Morris Panych. "Ken MacDonald, the set designer has created a gorgeous perfume shop with lush details, there are musicians on stage that perform original pieces by composer Mike Roth, there's a sense of entering another era."

Asked what aspect of the play talks to him most, Pettle takes a moment to reflect then says, "The story speaks to me because it is about believing in and finding true love." He then adds, "As a writer, I find that because the lovers come to know one another and are attracted to one another through the written word the story really speaks to me." ■

Parfumerie runs at the Bluma Appel Theatre on various dates starting Dec. 11. www.soulpepper.ca

A plea for interreligious tolerance from Rabbi Sacks

MARTIN LOCKSHIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, chief rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of the Commonwealth until 2013, has brought his formidable skill and learning to the vexing issue of why inter-group violence takes place and how we can stop it. His most recent book, Not in God's Name: Confronting Religious Violence, draws on philosophy, literature, psychology, history and, of course, Jewish texts to provide his "theory of everything" on the subject.

Rabbi Sacks explains that being in a group makes our lives more secure because of in-group altruists – people who are willing to help us even when they get no direct benefit. But the cost is our human tendency to look down on outsiders, which can even lead to "altruistic evil" – destroying the "other" in the belief that such violence benefits our own group. Whatever the costs and benefits of group membership, Rabbi Sacks believes that attempts over history to replace it with universalism or individualism have always failed.

Religion has indeed motivated groups to act violently against others, but so have nationality, ethnicity and ideology. Rabbi Sacks' major targets are anti-Semitism and Islamist jihadism, which arise out of ideology and/or religion, and which dehumanize the out-group. He encourages people to stop seeing the "other" as dangerous and to practise "role reversal – putting yourself in the place of those you despise, or pity, or simply do not understand."

Rabbi Sacks argues for a Jewish approach to group identity and "the other." Judaism combines belief in a universal God – thus parting ways with the ancient polytheists who saw gods as confined to national territories – with belief that not everyone has to be Jewish – thus parting ways with traditional Christians and Muslims, who see their religions as ultimately for all humankind. He believes Jews are thus more able to feel positively toward non-Jews, since we see all humanity as governed by the same God, but we do not feel the need to convert gentiles to Judaism.

Much of the book is a careful reading of the biblical stories about brothers who did not get along, particularly Isaac and Ishmael, and Jacob and Esau. These characters are often seen as symbolizing the three Abrahamic religions. Rabbi Sacks argues that Genesis teaches that it is difficult for brothers to get along, but it can be done. The fact that one brother of each pair is ultimately chosen to carry on the tradition does not imply a rejection of the other. The moving descriptions of the pain of Ishmael (God hears his cry in Genesis 21:17) and of Esau (whose anguish is described sympathetically in Genesis 27:33-34) teach us to recognize their humanity. In Exodus, two brothers and a sister (Moses, Aaron and Miriam) are able to work in harmony, as the Bible desires.

I found Rabbis Sacks' ideology moving and attractive, but I had problems with some of his methodology. He encourages Jews, when thinking about the characters in Genesis, to study the stories without the later layers of rabbinic interpretation. "In the biblical text itself, Abraham breaks no idol, challenges no polytheist, seeks no disciples." Esau in the biblical text may be tempestuous, but he is not violent, and we easily identify with his pain. Later Jewish tradition taught that Abraham despised polytheism and Esau was murderous. "Esau hates Jacob," the classical rabbis teach (e.g., Rashi's comment to Genesis 33:4), meaning that the descendants of Esau will always hate the Jews. Rabbi Sacks prefers to focus on the biblical narrative itself which, he asserts, is more tolerant.

Not in God's Name: Confronting Religious Violence
by Rabbi Jonathan Sacks

Schocken

> I found Rabbi Sacks' ideology moving and attractive, but I had problems with some of his methodology.

When Rabbi Sacks comes to biblical law, he does the opposite. He acknowledges that biblical laws about destroying the Amalekites or Canaanites appear to be murderously intolerant. But he argues that rabbinic tradition toned them down and essentially read them out of existence. The Canaanites, the rabbis teach, no longer exist. Amalek, Rabbi Sacks says, is now just a metaphor. Rabbi Sacks is correct that many rabbis think this way. But as Robert Eisen has showed in his The Peace and Violence of Judaism: From the Bible to Modern Zionism (reviewed in these pages in 2012), it is possible to find both peaceful and violent teachings in all periods of Jewish writing, including in the Bible and classical rabbinic literature.

Rabbi Sacks' cherry-picking of liberal approaches is understandable, even laudable. But he fails to mention that some contemporary rabbis, not just rabbis on the extreme fringe, still promote the less liberal teachings of our tradition.

To give some current examples, the website of Rabbi Shlomo Amar, chief Sephardi rabbi of Israel from 2003 until 2013, promotes the negative understanding of the biblical Esau, including its wider implications. Rabbi Amar quotes the "Esau hates Jacob" proverb, explaining that: "Even in places where anti-Semitism is unknown and it seems that people like Jews, realize that this is simply a lie." Rabbi Amar does not view historical or contemporary Esau as worthy of the compassion that Rabbi Sacks encourages.

Similarly, the chief rabbi of Afula is currently promoting a minor wording change in the Chanukah song, Maoz Tzur, praying that God drive Ishmael (Arabs? Muslims?) into perdition. Unlike Rabbi Sacks, some rabbis still teach that Amalek is real.

Sadly, intolerance exists not just among anti-Semites and Islamist jihadists. With the respect that Rabbi Sacks commands, it's disappointing that he didn't devote some of his book to confronting the intolerance of some of our contemporary religious teachers.

Rabbi Sacks fights nobly and eloquently for a tolerant Judaism and a tolerant world. Let us hope that both Jews and gentiles listen to his timely message. ■

The curse of pop-culture Chanukah

Michael Fraiman

We need to talk about Chanukah movies.

Forget the quiet on-screen marginalization of us every Christmas season – the predictability of never seeing our culture properly represented during the holidays, because, well, there just aren't enough Jews to fill theatres across America.

And forget, even, the overwhelming fetishization of Jewish people in Christmas specials – the moment when funny-sounding Yiddishisms puncture otherwise wholesome family moments with the politically correct realization that not everyone celebrates Christmas, and we must all politely smile when other cultures raise this fact.

No, the question I'd like answered is a much simpler one: Why isn't there at least one decent movie about this holiday?

There are only two true Chanukah movies – The Hebrew Hammer (which was hilarious when I was 15 and cringe-worthy on a recent viewing) and Adam Sandler's Eight Crazy Nights (summarized by Rotten Tomatoes as a "nauseating concoction" with a 12 per cent rating).

Of course, there are a handful of Chanukah mentions in TV specials and made-for-TV movies; some are decent, though most are redundant. The most trite gag involves the obviously-not-Jewish lead pretending to be Jewish for the sake of some potential romantic interest's stuffy Jewish parents. Frasier Crane played this role excellently in the Emmy-winning episode of Frasier "Merry Christmas, Mrs. Moskowitz," while lesser attempts, like the Hallmark Channel's Hitched for the Holidays, starring rising Canadian talent Emily Hampshire, expand the same joke Frasier pulled off in 22 minutes in a belabouring 87.

Inevitably, any Jew who feels like cozying up next to the chanukiyah lights with jelly doughnuts and latkes and some feel-good on-screen amusement ends up watching the 66th episode of Rugrats. Either that or a Christmas special. Because, hey, when you want dumb holiday entertainment, you understand that you're the minority, and Hollywood not accurately representing your religion is probably not the biggest problem facing Jewish people today.

But that's part of the problem: our on-screen holiday-era marginalization has become status quo. Jews have had no trouble with on-screen historical or dramatic representation in general – movies and shows generally don't shy away from featuring Jewish characters, and we'll always have Fiddler – but, for some reason, holiday specials have eluded us.

> Why isn't there at least one decent movie about this holiday?

I don't believe this is because Christmas is too "sacred" a Christian thing – the holiday's slow devolution into generic well-wishes of "Happy Holidays" signifies a willingness by companies and producers to include all religions in one broad stroke.

That's a nice thought, but it sort of misses the point. Jews don't want to erase Christmas specials or the word "Merry" from coffee cups. It would be much nicer to see a bit of our own culture represented in the world without it being a punchline in an episode of Frasier.

What I'm asking for is a Love Actually for Jews, or even The Holiday. Nothing whimsical – just a public reminder that pleasant winter movies can be set against a Jewish backdrop. Or, conversely, as journalist Evan Scott Schwartz has written, the story of the Maccabees has all the right bones for a 300-meets-Exodus biblical Hollywood epic.

Instead, the direction in which we seem to be heading is toward constant bland inclusivity; Seth Rogen's latest picture, The Night Before, is a perfect example of an "everyone welcome" holiday movie that takes pains to address Judaism and Christianity in more or less equal measure.

Except I don't want to cozy up in my sofa next to chanukiyah lights with jelly doughnuts and latkes and watch Rogen vomit in the middle of a church. Nor do I (always) want to watch that brilliant Rugrats episode for the 38th time, nor do I want to pretend that Eight Crazy Nights is worth watching even once.

No, it would be much more comforting if I could turn on the TV and see something I recognized – a Jew neither fetishized, marginalized nor made into a stereotypical punchline, but rather depicted as a human being celebrating a silly holiday in December. ■

Toronto-born jazz singer sings a duet with her musical hero

JODIE SHUPAC
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Brigitte Zarie's newest album contains a duet with Enrico Macias.

Brigitte Zarie's mother died in 2012, but the Toronto-born jazz singer of Jewish Moroccan heritage said it might as well have been yesterday.

The acute pain of losing her mom, herself a singer, inspired a number of the songs featured on Zarie's upcoming third album, including the title track, Marie, sung in French, after which the record is named.

Though her mother often asked Zarie to write a song for her, she said, "I never wrote a song about her when she was alive, I think because she was there, and I was happy. But when she left me, my heart was broken, and it's started speaking to me in melodies," said Zarie, for whom raw emotion, or impulse, has always underpinned her music.

Marie, which is set to be released this winter, is distinct from Zarie's two previous records partly in that it's a duets album. Of the 13 original tracks, six feature her singing one of her songs with another artist, though Zarie said she's been sworn to secrecy about the latter.

The only name she was willing to leak was Enrico Macias, the Jewish, French Pied-noir singer who accompanies her on Marie and who Zarie described as "the Tony Bennett of Europe."

His music resonates deeply with the Moroccan Jewish community in Canada, Zarie said, as, "he's from Algeria; his music is the music we grew up with."

Zarie's own parents were Moroccan Jews who met in the music scene in Casablanca – her father a self-taught composer, pianist and horn player who was also a strong inspiration to Zarie and her mother a singer – and Zarie's music is inflected with Moroccan sensibility, with what she called "that unique guitar sound," making it "not so Frank Sinatra, but a little hipper."

Having Macias record with her in her studio in New York, where Zarie has been based for about 20 years, was surreal, as the singer was a staple in her house growing up.

"For the girls I grew up with, he was our Michael Bublé. We all had his CDs and went to his concerts," she said.

Marie, which Zarie recorded over the course of a year or so, is, she said, less "schmaltzy" than her first two albums.

"It's more intimate, less tongue in cheek. The first two were more jazz; this one is more a crossover with a Michael Bublé sound."

Zarie's upbringing makes her an atypical jazz singer: She was raised in a religious home in Toronto and attended the Orthodox school Eitz Chaim.

While Zarie said she may not "look the part," her religious background has had a significant influence on her life and she continues to "do my Shabbat and light my candles," as well as avoiding playing gigs on Friday nights.

Zarie, whose Canadian fan base is strong, hopes to tour here and in Europe in the near future, but noted that, as a singer-songwriter, her main focus is "being in the studio and making sure the songs are written. Once the songs are down, then everything else is cake."

Zarie stressed that all of her music is a tribute to her mother, who, from day one, had an inclination that Zarie would be a success. ■

An author's trip 'from diagnosis to survivorship'

CAROLYN BLACKMAN
cblackman@thecjn.ca

In 2013, Aviva Rubin's greatest fear and her greatest dream both came true.

She was diagnosed with marginal zone lymphoma, and was then asked to write about her experiences in the Globe and Mail. "I've always worried about cancer; I've always wanted to write for the Globe."

Now, Rubin, 56, a local freelance writer and blogger who has two sons, has recently completed Lost and Found in Lymphomaland, a memoir about her "trip from diagnosis to survivorship."

With a teaching degree and a master's degree, Rubin worked in various areas of the Ontario government for more than two decades, including her last stint as a senior health policy analyst at the Ministry of Health.

"I was weirdly over-informed when I got my cancer diagnosis," she said.

She completed her book about a year after she finished active treatment, although she still receives maintenance chemotherapy, "which is supposed to help stave off the next occurrence. This kind of lymphoma can't be cured, it can only be treated, so it will be back. No one knows when. Aside from a truckload of fear and anxiety, which now follows me everywhere, I'm feeling pretty well."

Reaction to her book, Rubin said, has been wonderful and affirming. "It seems I can make people laugh and cry at the same time. A little levity is a good thing when you're dealing with something as heavy as cancer."

She didn't put a lot of thought to writing about cancer, she said. "I just started blogging right away about everything that was happening. I couldn't help it. It was what I needed to do. All the gory, hard, weird, funny, painful, annoying, boring details. I wanted them out there. A friend suggested I turn it into a book.

"I'm told I capture things that are universal in the experience of cancer – of illness, and of shocking bad things that come along out of nowhere, wreak havoc, and change the course of life forever."

She said that she is often asked if writing about her experience has been cathartic. "Not really. Nothing about cancer changes because you write about it. I feel hugely grateful for the ability to put the hell of this experience out there, and have people tell me I've captured what they're going through. It's hard for folks to understand what it feels like. I hope my writing shines a light on that."

As a patient in Ontario, she said, "I've got all sorts of thoughts and comments about improving the health-care system – about administrative mess-ups, errors, misinformation, lack of information between one area and another, waiting and waiting and waiting.

"But overall, I've been impressed and hugely grateful for the medical and emotional treatment I've received throughout this ordeal. We are extremely lucky in this country, in this province, in this city. The Odette Cancer Centre at Sunnybrook [Health Sciences Centre] is full of smart, competent, caring and empathetic health-care providers.

"Cancer, however, is a waiting game. It's pretty relentless. When it's not scary waiting, it's boring and tedious waiting. Once you know what you're dealing with, diagnosis and treatment-wise, it does get somewhat easier. I tried not to start the worry mill spinning until 24 hours before any results appointment. Sometimes that worked. I surrounded myself with people who had deep pockets of support and patience for me."

Now that active treatment is done, she said, "things feel somewhat normal – a new normal. I'm back to active hands-on-ish parenting [to her 16- and 12-year-old boys], I'm running occasionally, travelling, having conversations that are not about cancer, enjoying myself, making dinner parties and relaxing, although that's something I've never been good at."

Lymphoma is always in the corner, Rubin said. "Sometimes I can shove it in the basement of my mind and not look at it, kick it back down the steps when it sneaks up. Me and lymphoma, we're in it for life. Finding a way to coexist and respect each other's space is now my greatest challenge." ■

Comic book hero is an Orthodox Jewish girl

MENACHEM TZVI PERLOW
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When you hear the word "comic books," Spider-Man, Batman and the whole pantheon of superheroes immediately come to mind.

Jews and comic books go hand in hand. Marvel's superheroes were co-created by Stan Lee (Stanley Martin Lieber), and the popular graphic novel Maus, written and drawn by Art Spiegelman, was about his father's life during the Holocaust.

But a comic book centred on Judaism is very rare. When it does, it's normally window dressing like X-Men's Kitty Pryde lighting a yahrtzeit candle or Fantastic Four's The Thing saying the Shema, brought up once and rarely mentioned again. And usually their relationship with their religion is as a casual observer, which is kind of becoming cliché.

And that's one of the things that makes Hereville so compelling. Written and drawn by Barry Deutsch, Hereville is about Mirka, an Orthodox Jewish girl who dreams of fighting trolls and monsters instead of haggling with her annoying stepmother. One day, she comes across a pig – an animal forbidden inside the fictional Jewish land of Hereville – that follows her wherever she goes. When she finally confronts and traps the pig, she incurs the wrath of the pig's owner, an evil witch.

> Mirka is an Orthodox Jewish girl who dreams of fighting trolls.

The comic book Hereville is written by Barry Deutsch.

But when Mirka rescues both of them, from a group of bullies, the witch rewards Mirka and tells her about a troll who guards a magical sword. But to defeat it, she will need help from her stepmother.

Mirka is a righteous character who shows that you can be religious and still manage to keep your uniqueness. She's a regular, normal girl who reads, saves her brother from bullies, and is sometimes puzzled about the restrictions of Orthodox living (when they show her preparing for Shabbat, they even include a scene where she rips toilet paper into neat little piles.)

So far in the series (there are three books published), we never learn what happened to Mirka's real parents although there is a touching moment where she remembers her mother. Hopefully, the later volumes will reveal what happened. ■

CHANUKAH FOOD

Refresh your Chanukah dessert table

JNS.ORG

It is a truth universally acknowledged that we can never get tired of sufganiyot. But there's no harm in adding some culinary variety to this year's Festival of Lights. Pastry chef Paula Shoyer offer an alternative recipe that is great for Chanukah and will satisfy any sweet tooth.

VANILLA DOUGHNUT HOLES

Doughnuts and potato latkes are the most traditional Chanukah foods. Like latkes, doughnuts are best eaten the day they are made, but even on the second day you can get good results by reheating them. To make doughnuts look festive, roll them in coloured sugar.

- ❑ 1/4 oz. dry yeast
- ❑ 1/4 cup warm water
- ❑ 1/2 cup plus 1 tsp. sugar, divided
- ❑ 1/2 cup soy milk
- ❑ 2 tbsp. margarine, at room temperature for at least 15 minutes
- ❑ 1 large egg
- ❑ 2 tsp. pure vanilla extract
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. salt
- ❑ 2¼–2½ cups all-purpose flour, plus extra for dusting
- ❑ 1/2 cup plain or coloured sugar for dusting doughnuts
- ❑ Canola oil for frying

In a large bowl, place the yeast, warm water, and one teaspoon of the sugar and stir. Let the mixture sit for 10 minutes, or until thick.

Add the remaining sugar, soy milk, margarine, egg, vanilla, salt, and 1½ cups flour and mix – either with a wooden spoon or with a dough hook in a stand mixer – on low speed. Add 1/2 cup more flour and mix in. Add 1/4 cup flour and mix in. If the dough remains sticky, add more flour, a tbsp. at a time, until the dough becomes smooth.

Cover the bowl with a clean dish towel and let the dough rise for one hour in a warm place. I use a warming drawer on a low setting (about 200), or you can turn your oven on to its lowest setting, place the bowl in the oven, and then turn off the oven.

After one hour, punch down the dough by folding it over a few times and reshaping it into a ball. Re-cover the dough and let it rise for 10 minutes.

Dust a cookie sheet with flour. Sprinkle some flour on the counter or on parchment paper and use a rolling pin to roll the dough out until it's about 1/2-in. thick. Using a small round cookie cutter about 1 to 1½ in. in diameter, cut out small circles very close to each other, and place them on the cookie sheet. Reroll any scraps. Cover the doughnuts with the towel. Place the cookie sheet back in the oven (warm but turned off) or warming drawer. Let the doughnuts rise for 30 minutes.

Heat 1½ in. of oil in a medium saucepan for a few minutes and use a candy thermometer to see when the oil stays between 365 and 375; adjust the flame to keep the oil in that temperature range. Cover a cookie sheet with foil. Place a wire rack on top of the cookie sheet and set it near the stovetop.

When the oil is ready, add the doughnut holes to the oil one at a time, top-side down, putting an edge in first and then sliding in the rest of the doughnut; if you drop the doughnuts into the pan an inch or higher from the oil it can splatter and burn your fingers. You can fry up to eight doughnut holes at a time. Cook for 45-60 seconds. Use tongs or chopsticks to turn the doughnut holes over and cook them another 45-60 seconds, or until golden. Lift with a slotted spoon and place on the wire rack to cool. Repeat with the remaining doughnuts.

Place the sugar in a shallow bowl and roll the doughnut holes in the sugar to coat. Store covered at room temperature for up to one day and reheat to serve. Servings: 50 ■

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Israeli food for local palate

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When one thinks of Israeli food, traditional dishes like hummus, tehina, tabbouleh, and falafel often come to mind.

But the cuisine actually encompasses a wide range of dishes that reflect the many ethnic groups who have settled there over the years, according to restaurateur Michael Solomonov, lead author of Zahav, a World of Israeli Cooking.

Zahav represents "a more complete idea of the breadth of Israeli cuisine," Solomonov said in an interview with his business partner and co-author, Steven Cook. Toronto was a stop on their book tour in October.

The two men co-own eight restaurants in Philadelphia. The kosher cookbook is named after Zahav, the partners' first restaurant to specialize in Israeli food.

Solomonov, 38, is an American Israeli with deep roots in both countries. Interspersed with recipes are biographical details of his life and that of his other family members. He was born in Israel to an American mother and Bulgarian father.

When he was a toddler his family moved to Pittsburgh, where his younger brother, David, was born. Twelve years later they all returned to Israel. Solomonov said he was not able to integrate into Israeli society, explaining that he never spoke Hebrew well enough. He went back to the United States and ended up at chef school.

In 2003, on vacation from a sous-chef position, Solomonov went to Israel. He toured the country for three weeks with his brother, who was on leave from the army. Months later David was killed while on patrol near Lebanon.

Solomonov explained that delving into Israeli cuisine helped him feel connected to his late brother. "My interest in Israeli food is a way of keeping my brother's memory alive."

In 2008, he and Cook opened Zahav. The restaurant adheres to the basic laws of kashrut, because that distinguishes Israeli cuisine from that of other Middle Eastern countries, Solomonov said. "Kosher rules help define the boundaries of Israeli cuisine."

He said going back to his Israeli roots has become his culinary mission: "I had to translate this food for the American palate."

Zahav embraces a wide swath of culinary traditions. Along with traditional hummus and tabbouleh, you can find recipes for such Yemenite dishes as lachuch, a spongy, pancake-like bread; schug, a condiment of green chiles; hawaij, a spice blend of turmeric, pepper and cumin; and hilbeh, a fenugreek-based thickener.

The book also includes recipes for Persian food like ghondi, dumplings made of chickpea flour and ground chicken, which Solomonov calls the "Persian cousins of the matzah ball." There's also a recipe for kubbe, an Iraqi-style semolina dumpling filled with ground meat and pine nuts, and Balkan-style borekas, a dish Solomonov's Bulgarian grandmother often made for the family.

When asked if he identified more as an American or an Israeli, Solomonov said: When I'm in Israel, I feel American and in the U.S. I feel the Israeli ties culturally."

Green beans and mushrooms with tehina, lentils, and garlic chips

This is our riff on the classic green bean casserole, with tehina standing in for the cream of mushroom soup.

- ❑ kosher salt
- ❑ ¼ tsp. ground cinnamon
- ❑ ¼ cup beluga lentils
- ❑ 2 shallots, one chopped, one thinly sliced
- ❑ ¼ cup tehina
- ❑ ¼ cup cider vinegar
- ❑ pinch black pepper
- ❑ pinch ground fenugreek
- ❑ ¼ cup olive oil
- ❑ 4 cups green beans, trimmed and cut into 1-in. pieces
- ❑ 1½ cups quartered button mushrooms
- ❑ ¼ cup canola oil
- ❑ 4 garlic cloves, thinly sliced
- ❑ 2 teaspoons lemon juice
- ❑ 2 tbsp. chopped fresh dill

Bring 2 cups water to a boil in a medium saucepan. Add a pinch of salt, the cinnamon, and lentils. Partially cover and lower the heat to medium. Simmer until the lentils are tender but not mushy, 17 to 20 minutes. Drain and set aside to cool.

Combine the chopped shallot with the tehina, vinegar, black pepper, fenugreek, and a pinch of salt in a food processor and puree. Be careful not to let the tehina overheat – add ice water, 1 tbsp. at a time, if the mixture seizes up. Season with more salt if you like. Set the tehina sauce aside.

Heat the olive oil in a large skillet over medium heat. Add the green beans and a pinch of salt and cook, stirring, until the beans start to soften, about 3 minutes. Add the sliced shallot and the mushrooms to the skillet and continue cooking until the green beans are tender and lightly browned, about 10 minutes more. Transfer to a bowl with a slotted spoon, discarding any excess oil. Set aside and keep warm.

In a small saucepan over high heat, combine the canola oil, garlic, and reserved lentils. Cook, stirring constantly, until the garlic begins to brown and the lentils start to swell, about 7 minutes. When the garlic and lentils are golden brown, drain them onto a plate lined with paper towels and season well with salt.

To assemble, mix the tehina sauce with the green beans and mushrooms and spoon the mixture onto a serving platter. Drizzle with the lemon juice and top with the crispy garlic and lentils, and then the dill. Serves 4 ■

Zareinu fashion show

Children from Zareinu had their moment on the runway at Zareinu's 12th annual fashion show hosted by Canadian fashion icon Jeanne Beker. YouTube sensation and former Zareinu student, Madison Tevlin, touched the hearts of over 800 guests thanking Zareinu for giving her the gift of speech that enabled her voice to be "heard by millions of people." Guests were inspired by both the children and the professional models showcasing high-end Canadian and international designers, with Ines Di Santo providing the grand finale. The close to $500,000 raised will benefit the children of Zareinu Educational Centre, a school and treatment centre for children with physical and developmental challenges. ■ – The Socialite

SENIOR SIDE OF LIFE

Where's the beef?

Dr. Michael Gordon

I was sitting in a Toronto coffee shop next to a table with five older women. One of them said to the group, "I am cutting bacon out of my diet – but I do love it once in a while."

"Why are you doing that," one woman asked?

"I just read that bacon and salami and hamburgers can cause cancer – didn't you see the paper yesterday? It's almost as bad as smoking cigarettes – who would have known? I hope it isn't too late because I have bacon at least once a week on the weekends when we go out for breakfast."

It amazes me how, when something is reported in the media, the response ranges from hyperbolic concern by some reporters and the public, to complete lack of concern by others. It can be very hard to decipher the real implications of the many reports that focus on public health threats from the world around us. I have watched as eggs, coffee, various fats and oils, alcohol, different types of exercise and where we live and what we breathe became the focus of notices to the public to either "beware," "take heed," "change practice," or just "stop."

Some public health warnings are immediate, and often due to the finding that some food item poses an immediate threat to consumers. A recent example is the warning and resultant steps taken by the restaurant chain Chipotle, after reports showed that more than 40 people had fallen ill with E. coli food poisoning after eating at Chipotle Mexican Grill restaurants in six different states.

This type of warning is reminiscent of those from public health agencies during barbecue season reminding consumers to barbecue their chicken and hamburgers particularly well because of the risk of E. coli, a ubiquitous bacteria that can be destroyed by proper cooking but may linger in undercooked or rapidly cooked meat where the necessary bacterial-killing inside temperature is not high enough.

These warnings differ from public health warnings about eating habits. Having witnessed the potentially harmful effects of coffee come and go over the years, I was grateful that the final estimation was that when all is said and done, coffee probably has more beneficial effects on health parameters than negative ones. For me, a coffee-lover, it was a true public health blessing; yet, the European Union recently recommended against drinking more than four cups of coffee a day based on caffeine consumption. On the positive flip side, a recent report recommends us to "hold on tight to that cup of joe, because it could save your life," the result of research at the Harvard School of Public Health that says lifelong coffee lovers could be at less risk of dying from Type 2 diabetes, suicide, cardiovascular and neurological diseases.

So what about the bacon, hot dogs, corned beef and pastrami, barbecued steaks and hamburgers? Does everyone who is not a lifelong vegetarian or subscribe to the Mediterranean diet run the risk of sudden death from a BLT or hot dog at their favourite ball game?

A recent study in the United States reveals that 57 per cent of American Jews eat pork in one form or another, but this should not necessarily be interpreted as a sign of anti-religious drift or impending culinary doom.

The final message should be: most things can be eaten in a moderate and balanced fashion, unless there are specific health-related concerns – more important than how often one eats bacon, meat and pastrami, is the portion size and balance with other non-meat foods, including vegetables and fruits. And always cook meat well, especially on the barbecue.

Food is one of the most enjoyable aspects of life, and we should not make ourselves obsessively concerned every time a new "warning" comes out about the dangers of life and what we eat. Hang in there – the recommendation will likely change over time. Take it all in stride – with a dollop of Dijon mustard. ■

Yacov Fruchter offers an alternative look at the effect of Joseph's actions in Egypt
Rabbi Shalom Spira reviews various laws concerning the Al Hanissim prayer
Rachael Turkienicz explains why our dreams aren't bound by rationalism

Yacov Fruchter

While there's a tradition of portraying the patriarchs as saints, I enjoy noting their human fallibility. As such, I can't help but be disappointed with Joseph. We're introduced this week to the greatest dreamer of all time. He could interpret his own dreams and those of others, and act on those interpretations. At first, Joseph seems to be a snotty kid who, despite taunting his brothers with his visions of future grandeur, is favoured by his father. Though in my book he loses points for his antics, the way he's treated by his brothers, who debated between leaving him to die in a pit and selling him as a slave, make him an underdog in this story.

Miraculously, and partially strategically, like a phoenix, Joseph ascends from slavery to an unlikely meeting with the king of Egypt. He makes the most of the opportunity, and in one fell swoop, Pharoah names him chief economist and urban planner, and viceroy.

His speech to Pharaoh is inspiring and his recommendation is simple: work hard in the first seven years of abundance "so that the land may not perish in the famine" (41:36). He wants to save Egypt, and he articulates a plan of austerity and collective responsibility during a time of wealth. His grave error, however, is that he fails to teach Pharaoh that saving Egypt can't come at the expense of its citizens' freedom. In the famine's sixth year, when people are starving and the remaining food belongs to the empire, and citizens have nothing else to barter, the boy who was sold into slavery turns Egypt into a nation of indentured servants.

Through great miracles and his messenger Moses, God showed the world that human beings are meant to be free. How disappointing that Joseph was responsible for a plan that made slavery the status quo. The great dreamer made it to the top, but created a nation of uninspired slaves on the way. May the lights of Chanukah be a reminder to each of us of the divine and creative spark within us all that requires nurturing, not oppression. ■

Yacov Fruchter is director of community building and spiritual engagement at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Rabbi Shalom Spira

"And Benjamin's portion exceeded… by five hands" (Genesis 43:34). The Maggid of Kozhnitz, Avodat Yisrael, sees this as an allusion to the Al Hanissim prayer, which refers to five "hands."

Rabbi Ovadiah Yosef (Teshuvot Yabi'a Omer IX, Orach Chaim 66) addresses a related conundrum. It often occurs that a slow-paced individual reciting the silent Amidah realizes that his/her only chance to catch Kedushah with a speed-reading congregation is by skipping Al Hanissim. Should he or she do so?

Rabbi Mordechai Winker, (Teshuvot Levushei Mordekhai III, Orach Chaim 59), compares this problem to the debate between Ba'al ha-Ma'or and Ramban on Shabbat (ch. 19). In the days of the Talmud, a circumcised baby had to be immediately washed with hot water. (N.B. Shulchan Arukh Orach Chaim 331:9 rules that nature has since evolved.) Assuming that a kettle prepared on Friday was lost, could tomorrow's circumcision nevertheless proceed, thereby requiring the baby's family to desecrate the Sabbath by heating up new water?

Ba'al ha-Ma'or answers that we cannot circumcise when we know that it will force us to desecrate the Sabbath right afterward. Ramban argues that we should only focus on the mitzvah presently confronting us, which is circumcision, and afterward we are de facto justified in desecrating the Sabbath for pikuach nefesh. Ergo, claims Rabbi Winkler, Ba'al ha-Ma'or would omit Al Hanissim while Ramban would recite it.

Yabi'a Omer is not convinced by either side of Rabbi Winkler's analogy. Perhaps Ba'al ha-Ma'or only meant to be passive, which is inapplicable to a worshipper who is already praying, whereas perhaps Ramban only meant to be proactive regarding circumcision, since failure to be circumcised is punishable by spiritual excision (karet), which is inapplicable to Al Hanissim. Ultimately, because (inter alia) "one who is occupied with a mitzvah is exempt from another mitzvah" (Gemara, Sukkah 25a), Yabi'a Omer concludes that Al Hanissim be recited. ■

Rachael Turkienicz

This week's parshah, Miketz, is filled with dreams, interpretations and a rags-to-riches story for Joseph, Jacob's favourite son. We're familiar with the Broadway musical story of Joseph and his Amazing Technicolour Dreamcoat. As amazing as that production is, the biblical story is more insightful, entertaining and, yes, colourful.

When we last left our hero, Joseph was sitting in jail and is now a trustee in the prison. Years have gone by, and Joseph is finally recognized for his insight as the "dream solver." Summoned by Pharaoh, Joseph must solve the mystery of Pharaoh's recurring dreams.

Joseph has learned that the power of a dream is not in its content, but rather in its interpretation. Long before, as a young lad, Joseph was the dreamer. He had two dreams that he shared with his brothers, and they interpreted them. As a result, they hated him even more than before. The problem isn't the dreams, it's that he handed them over to these people. He gave away his dreams to brothers, who turned them into weapons against him.

Now, years later, Pharaoh, the most powerful man in the world, cannot break his dream cycle. He is powerless to resolve the dreams and is about to hand them over to Joseph, the least powerful man in the empire. The ones who can solve dreams are the ones with the power. They can peek into our souls.

Dreams aren't bound by the laws of rationalism. The sages say that a dream is a message you send yourself, and it should be read. Yet just as you would not hand over your most intimate email to someone you don't trust, you should likewise not hand over your dreams. The dream has no meaning until it is interpreted. Then it is constrained by the interpretation.

Joseph learned this the hard way. His talent is not in solving dreams but in recognizing that dreams can bring us to our knees, while searching for meaning can elevate us to royalty. ■

A marching band parades in New Orleans. NANCY WIGSTON PHOTOS

A fresh take on Old New Orleans

NANCY WIGSTON
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Back in 1947, New Orleans native son Louis Armstrong hit the pop charts with a nostalgic tune. "Do you know what it means to miss New Orleans?" Armstrong sang in his honey-and-gravel voice. Lots of changes have occurred since then – not least an airport named in Armstrong's honour.

Hurricane Katrina is more than 10 years ago, and today the city has much to boast about. If you're going to New Orleans, prepare to be pleasantly surprised. The "Crescent City" offers both traditional favourites (music, food, festivals) and major new or vastly expanded attractions, making it one of the most popular places in the United States to visit.

Our hotel, International House – the city's first "boutique hotel," in the heart of the Warehouse/Arts District – introduces us to the city's new chic. This neoclassical building began life in 1906 as a beaux arts-style bank. A real dazzler – white columns, soaring ceilings, red velvet lobby chairs, pillar candles, fresh flowers, a West African fertility bench – the hotel pays homage to the city's diverse cultural roots.

During our winter stay, International House was alight with watercolour reproductions based on 1896 designs by the city's first Creole costume-maker, Carlotta Bonnecaze. Her paintings of animals dressed like humans – a peacock, mice, a rat, cats, frogs, dragonflies – capture the "whimsical, curious and ironic" theme of her Carnival floats. Art is everywhere in New Orleans, not least in our hotel.

This serene Canal Street hostelry is just a few blocks from the busy French Quarter. At the Café du Monde (1884) servers deliver platters of beignets and cups of café au lait to the breakfast crowd. Chicory-flavoured coffee scents the morning air; the wide Mississippi River gleams in the morning sun.

Shopkeepers are just opening their doors as we head over to Jackson Square, a New Orleans landmark anchored by the Cabildo, where the 1803 Louisiana Purchase Transfer occurred; inside, a large canvas celebrates the victorious Battle of New Orleans; other exhibits showcase city history, from Native American times to the 1825 visit of the celebrated revolutionary, the Marquis de Lafayette.

On Pirate Alley, a tiny street off Jackson Square, we discover Faulkner House, a National Literary Landmark. In 1925, a young William Faulkner – who'd go on to win the Nobel Prize – rented a room here with an artist friend. When not working on his first novel, Soldier's Pay, he caroused with literary pals like Sherwood Anderson and his wife Elizabeth. New Orleans appears in several Faulkner novels, and this being New Orleans, his ghost is said to haunt the yellow house on Pirate Alley.

Much stranger creatures than Faulkner greet us at our next stop, The Audubon Butterfly Garden and Insectarium. Open since 2008, this is a true house of curiosities: the world's largest facility devoted to entomology, with 50 live exhibits featuring an endless array of buggy wonders – Louisiana swamp critters, soon-to-be-butterflies asleep in their cocoons, creepy crawlies of every kind, and finally, the butterfly garden itself, alive with its gorgeous winged inhabitants.

Next stop is New Orleans' astonishing National World War II Museum. Founded in 2000, the museum is another world, it's undergone major expansions and draws enormous crowds to its exhibits, which include a Tom Hanks-produced 4-D film, a 1940s-style cabaret and restaurant, vintage aircraft and military vehicles. Greeted at the entrance to the interactive "Road to Berlin" exhibit by friendly veterans, we board a Union Pacific train – the kind that took American soldiers to basic training camps. (A new "Road to Tokyo" exhibit opens this month.)

> Come to New Orleans before the Mardi Gras crowds descend.

Next, history becomes personal, as we choose an electronic dog tag representing "our" soldier, one Joe Diamond from New Jersey. We'll check in with Joe at various stations as he makes his harrowing way through Belgium and Germany as a combat medic.

The road begins in 1942, as the European invasion is being planned in a North African bunker – complete with jeep, howitzer, and sandbags. Battles quickly unfold as we walk through life-like scenes of war: bombed-out towns and villages, snow-covered forests. The road to victory proves noisy and highly dramatic.

Why, we wonder, is America's National World War II museum in New Orleans? Inspired by the passion of Stephen Ambrose (author of Band of Brothers), the museum began as the D-Day Museum.

Next we tour the Garden District in the comfort of one of the city's famous streetcars, before perusing the outlet bargains at Riverwalk. Dinner awaits at Antoine's Restaurant, a New Orleans favourite, where everyone feels special. Since 1840, family-run Antoine's has embodied the flair and flavour of New Orleans, offering Spanish, French, Alsatian, and Creole dishes.

We lose count of the famous faces on the walls and the exact number of dining rooms – naturally there's a haunted hallway – but we are impressed with the cosy nook reserved for Angelina Jolie and Brad Pitt, whose Make It Happen foundation helps restore the city's Katrina-devastated neighbourhoods.

When our waiter surprises us with a flaming dish of Baked Alaska we too feel like stars, reminded that the Crescent City is synonymous with celebrations, large and small. Come to New Orleans before the Mardi Gras crowds descend, and you'll happen on the excitement of parades that predate the official holiday. One bright February morning, we cheered the clubs and school bands marching along with dancers young and old strutting their stuff. Diving for beads flung from colourful floats, we experienced the timeless magic that is New Orleans. ■

A jazz band plays for tourists in the French Quarter, top, an, above, buskers ply their trade on the river front.

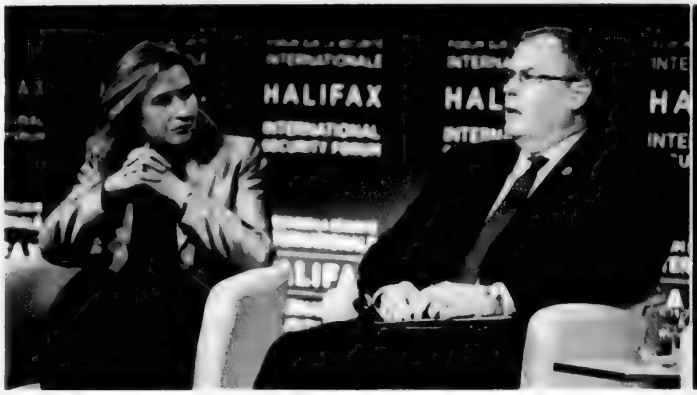
Tzipi Livni: We must fight, physically, for our values



Tzipi Livni and U.S. Deputy Secretary of Defence Robert Work at the Halifax International Security Forum last month.

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT

Tzipi Livni, co-leader of Israel's Zionist Union party and former foreign affairs minister, was in Halifax recently participating in the annual Halifax International Security Forum.

Let's talk about the Islamic State (ISIS), the Paris attack, the Mali hostage incident, the effect of ISIS on the world.

In 2006, the Dutch cartoons of Muhammad created Muslim outrage in Europe, the Middle East and even the world. Today is real. It is not cartoons. It's about who we are and what we believe in. The ISIS threat is about what these extremists in our region want to do, not about what we want. We need to understand what we are facing and then co-operate with our neighbours, with the free world to conquer, to win. It's not just the Middle East. It's all over the world.

How do you combat this threat?

Terrorism has been there for decades and Israeli policies haven't fully resolved it but we have to share our experience fighting terrorism with the rest of the free world. We – us and the free world – have to address different conflicts in a different manner. ISIS is the biggest threat today, and if we don't address it, we'll see more attacks like Paris and Mali. It's clear to me, in this case, that to stop Daesh [ISIS], you must be on the ground. Extremists are willing to pay the price for their beliefs. We have to pay the price for our beliefs, too.

Do you think the conference was a step toward solving this?

> ISIS is the biggest threat today, and if we don't address it, we'll see more attacks like Paris and Mali.

The conference happened at a sensitive, almost opportune time, after Paris and Mali. It was a wakeup call to the international community that Daesh is not isolated to the Middle East, but is here and we cannot turn a blind eye. As I said before, we have to fight, physically, for our values. They won't stop until they win. We cannot let them win.

I heard more and more voices here saying, "You're right!" We need to be more bold. Canada's Minister of National Defense [Harjit Sajjan] promised that Canada will be part of any coalition.

Canada has a new prime minister and a new government. There was such great co-operation between former prime minister Stephen Harper and Israel. Do you see changes with Justin Trudeau?

[Smiling] First, I loved his answer when asked about his 50 per cent female cabinet that this is now 2015. I thought that was a great message for Canadians and world leaders.

[Then in a serious tone:] While in Halifax, I met the minister of national defence and Rafael Barak, Israel's ambassador to Canada. The relationship between Israel and Canada is state to state, not necessarily person to person. I believe there has to be, will be, open discussion. There are issues to be discussed, but the basis is there.

Rumours of change [in prime ministerial attitude]? I don't think so. Maybe in tone, but certainly not in substance.

However, the relationship between the leaders of the United States and Israel is not good. In the end, damage has been done and needs to be corrected, but relationships are between the people of the two nations, not necessarily the leaders.

Let's talk about Israel and the Palestinians. Is the world's attitude about Israel changing?

The world sees our strong army against the poor Palestinians. We need to bridge that gap. We have to show Israel's interest as a Jewish democratic state, living in harmony. We need to promote the idea of two states for two peoples. I prefer to reach an agreement, to have legislated borders. That's the only way we'll get support from the international community. But we need to stick to our vision of two democratic states and our interests. We have to show the international community we're serious.

How important is the United States to all of this?

Is the United States the basis for Israel's security? It's not just money and weapons. We want our enemies to know Israel is not isolated. We want them to know the leader of the free world is with us.

If you and your party were running Israel, what would you do differently?

Our vision and our policies differ from the current government. We're all for two states for two peoples. We're willing to take steps to prove it. When it's clear to the world that Israel's leaders are serious, we can have support for the right of Israel to defend itself. And we're all for serious negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians. But the thinking of the Palestinians has to change.

There's no hope for peace with Hamas, because they hate us for religious reasons, and that will never change. To them, it's a religious war, just like with Daesh. But we think Fatah can deliver. For example, we want to re-create a committee on incitement and work for cultural peace. We also think empowering the Palestinian economy is in Israel's interest, as long as it doesn't affect our security.

Is there stability among the Israeli people?

Israel is a start-up nation. I'm very proud of it and what we've accomplished in a few short decades. But there's a gap between our understanding of Israel and how the world looks at it. Internally, Israel needs to make decisions. We need a vision. We're a Jewish democratic state that has to live in harmony within Israel and within world Jewry.

I see a shared vision, a shared understanding of what Israel means. By definition, it's a home for every Jew. It is there for you, for any purpose, at any time. ■

A labyrinth of deceit

Backstory

EROL ARAF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When the dark storm rose from the banks of the Rhine and settled on Paris 75 years ago, the lights went out in France one by one.

In reality, long before the Nazi Panzers poured in from the Ardennes to reach Paris in 44 days, France had already been morally disarmed by the trauma of World War 1. Indeed, after that war France found herself utterly exhausted: her youth had been decimated, her fertile fields too had been transformed into wastelands, dotted with crumbling trenches and combed with miles of rotting wires crisscrossing gigantic craters.

In spite of all this, at the outbreak of World War II, France enjoyed considerable military superiority over Germany. But Winston Churchill's prayer "Thank God for the French Army" was not answered, as the French military dissolved into thin air before the morally, strategically and tactically superior German onslaught.

A defeat of this magnitude cannot be solely explained in military terms. Indeed, the fall of the Third Republic had its antecedents in a myriad political, ideological and economic conflicts. Accordingly, the French politicians were ready to pay any price and bear any burden to avoid war. The national mood of pessimism and resignation was exacerbated by historical divisions between the secular and the religious, the socialists and the reactionaries, the pro-Nazis and the anti-Nazis, the Dreyfusards and the anti-Dreyfusards, the proletariat and the bourgeoisie, the republicans and the nostalgic remnants of the ancien régime, the pro-Franco and the anti-Franco, the communist gangs and the fascist Croix de Feu, the Action Francaise and the Jeunesses Patriotes. By the time war was unleashed, France was on the verge of disintegration under the weight of its colossal internal conflicts and culture wars.

What made matters worse for France was the growing British preference for Germany, as the appeasers in London saw the Third Reich as a bulwark against communism. From Stanley Baldwin to Neville Chamberlain, it became increasingly clear in Paris that Britain did not have France's back and that London viewed the Quai d'Orsay, the only reliable democracy on the continent, as a liability, not an ally. The daylight between the two nations of the Entente Cordiale became as wide as the Channel when Britain negotiated the Anglo-German Naval Treaty of 1935 without consulting France and even refused to divulge the full text to Paris.

Things got worse as the French aversion to confrontation started to wear thin under constant Nazi provocations. As Germany commenced to disembowel the Versailles Treaty by sharpening its Teutonic swords – compelling Paris to consider taking action to prevent Berlin from rearming itself – French leaders were met with resolute British opposition. Nothing should interfere, according to Her Majesty's Government, with the London-Berlin Axis, fast becoming the fulcrum upon which, they imagined, "world peace and prosperity" would rest. The Times, the official voice of appeasement, went so far as to warn: "In the years that are coming there is more reason to fear for Germany than fear Germany." Hitler's Germany had to be protected from "warmongering" France! No wonder, Chamberlain's sobriquet was Monsieur J'aime Berlin in France!

Eventually, the French, too, succumbed to the blandishments of the Three Monkeys who saw nothing, heard nothing and said nothing. In both Paris and London, silence became the default position. Hitler could not be criticized, the Nazis would not be condemned and dissenting voices, including Churchill's, had to be silenced.

Nowadays, there is a new muzzling zeitgeist haunting the halls of academia and NGO offices, as well as the newsrooms of certain media worldwide, called political correctness, predicated on the prevailing ideological orthodoxy of the extreme left. This is where Orwell meets the Inquisition; where "diversity" means uniformity; where "inclusiveness" means excluding all who do not agree with established dogmas; where "inconvenient truths" are convenient lies; where myths are "settled history;" where perpetrators are "victims;" where those waving the ISIS flag are warmly received and those displaying the flag of Israel are castigated and abused; where criticizing those who call for genocide are "racists;" where unvarnished anti-Semitism metamorphoses into the "human rights" crusade of out time; and, where falsification, outright Goebelesque fabrication and denials are justified to serve "higher truths."

We are lost in a labyrinth of deceit. The Three Monkeys will not lead us out. ■

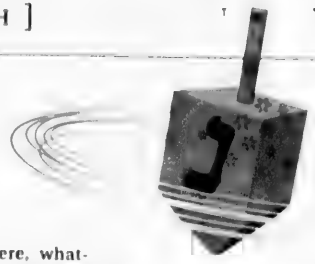
The Dreidel



A story by Sholom Aleichem
TRANSLATED BY CURT LEVIANT

Benny Polkovoy was my best pal. I liked him more than any of my friends in cheder or in town. I adored Benny because he was the best looking, smartest, and cleverest of the boys. He was loyal and generous to me and always took my part. Benny was also the oldest boy in our group as well as the richest boy in cheder.

Benny was a chubby, freckle-faced fellow with yellow prickly hair, bulging white cheeks, gap teeth, popping fisheyes where a shrewd smile always lurked. The minute we met – during my first day in cheder – we became fast friends.

I got my first glimpse of the rebbe when my mother brought me to his cheder.

The rebbe, a man with thick brows and a pointy skullcap, was studying Genesis with all his pupils. Without the slightest hesitation the rebbe told me: "Move to that bench over there – between those two boys."

I squeezed in between the boys and was immediately accepted.

"Remember now, study diligently," Mama said, standing by the door. She turned and looked at me with a feeling of mingled joy, love, and compassion. I understood Mama's look quite well. She was happy that I was studying in the company of respectable children, but her heart ached that she had to part with me.

Sitting there among so many new friends, I must admit I felt happier than my mother. I sized them up; they sized me up. But the rebbe wouldn't let us sit idle for long.

He rocked back and forth and yelled in a loud singsong voice, while we all repeated after him, one outshouting the other. But at one point the rebbe caught me talking to Benny.

He saw that my attention was not focused on Genesis. Suddenly, he began to question me.

"Say, you there, whatever your name is! Do you know whose son Cain was? And what Cain's brother was called? Why are you gaping at me like that?" the rebbe asked. "Didn't you hear me? I'm simply asking you to name the father of Cain the son of Adam and to describe the relationship between Cain and his brother Abel, the sons of Eve."

All the boys were smiling and choking with laughter. I couldn't understand why.

"You silly goose," Benny whispered to me, poking me with his elbow. "Tell him you don't know because we haven't learned it yet."

I obeyed and repeated each word like a parrot. Once again the class exploded with mirth. What are they laughing at? I thought.

Benny and I became good friends. He always stood up for me. Once, when he caught the kids picking on me he took each boy by the ear and gave it a right good twist, chanting with a Torah melody, "Now you know what you'll get for picking on an orphan, a widow's son."

After that the boys never pestered me again.

In cheder I was known as the widow's son. Why the widow's son? Because my mother was a widow. She supported herself by the sweat of her brow, running her own little grocery. I couldn't understand why Mama always complained that she barely made enough to pay for the store rent and for cheder tuition.

"Since God took my wonderful husband from me and left me a lonely young widow, the least I want for you, my son, is to be well-versed in holy lore."

What do you say to that? She always went to my cheder to find out how I was progressing. As for prayers, she made sure that I said them daily. She tried to talk me into becoming at least half the man my father was, may he rest in peace. Whenever she looked at me, she would declare, "You're the image of him, may you live and be well."

Then her eyes would fill with tears, and a curtain of gloom would cover her face.

No one could say that the Widow's Son was a poor student. I did not even trail my friends by a hair. However, I wasn't as good when it came to praying. All children are alike, and the Widow's Son was no less a scalawag than the others. Like them, I loved to fool around. It was my pal Benny who taught us all sorts of game of chance like odd or even, in which we lost our breakfast and lunch money. At gambling Benny was a master, and he outwitted us all. He beat us down to our last kopeck, then wiped his lips, and pulled a disappearing act.

There was only one week during the year when we were permitted to gamble.

What am I saying permitted? It was a moral obligation, a pious duty to gamble.

That week came during Chanukah, when we played, gambled, and made bets with the dreidel. Of the four letters on the dreidel's four sides, N stands for nothing, G for gather money, H is for half the pot, and S for settle accounts. The dreidel is like a lottery. The lucky one wins. For example, take Benny. No matter how often he spun the dreidel it always landed on G.

"That Benny is really something," the boys said, putting more money in the pot.

> It was a moral obligation, a pious duty to gamble.

But Benny didn't care. He was a rich man's son and took them all on. He kept displaying his artistry and skill until he had taken away every last kopeck from us. We all went home, distressed and ashamed. There each of us had to concoct a different lie.

I too had my own cock-and-bull story. I told Mama some fairy tale and got another round of Chanukah money.

With these seven kopecks I went straight to Benny, who relieved me of my money in five minutes flat. And I played with Benny every day until the last day of Chanukah. And then I began to sell everything I owned. My knife, my purse, my buttons. And after every sale I ran to Benny's house, where I lost again. I left his house heartbroken, depressed and vexed. But not at Benny, God forbid. I had nothing against him. Was it Benny's fault that he was lucky at dreidel? Had the dreidel landed on G at my turn, then I would have won.

Actually, I was angry at myself for having squandered so much money – Mama's hard-earned money – and all my possessions besides. I even sold my little siddur, my favourite prayerbook.

Dear children, I grew up and became a young man. Benny too grew up and became a young man with a yellow beard. He developed a big paunch, which he draped with a golden chain. Once he had been a rich man's son; now he was a rich man himself.

We met on a train. I recognized him at once. We embraced and kissed and began recalling good old times.

"Benny, do you remember that Chanukah when you had so much good luck with the dreidel. It always landed on G."

I looked at Benny and saw him turning colours, exploding with laughter.

"What's the matter, Benny? Why the sudden laughter?"

"Oh." He waved his hands. "Don't mention that dreidel. That was some dreidel. Oh, what an amazing dreidel that was. With a dreidel like that it was hard to lose."

"What kind of dreidel was it, Benny?"

"It was a dreidel – ha, ha, ha – with no.... other...letters....only Gs." ■

Sabbath

OLIVER SACKS

My mother and her 17 brothers and sisters had an Orthodox upbringing – all photographs of their father show him wearing a yarmulke, and I was told that he woke up if it fell off during the night. My father too came from an Orthodox background. Both my parents were very conscious of the Fourth Commandment ("Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy"), and the Sabbath (Shabbos, as we called it in our Litvak way) was entirely different from the rest of the week. No work was allowed, no driving, no use of the telephone; it was forbidden to switch on a light or a stove. Being physicians, my parents made exceptions. They could not take the phone off the hook or completely avoid driving; they had to be available, if necessary, to see patients, or operate, or deliver babies.

We lived in a fairly Orthodox Jewish community in Cricklewood, in Northwest London – the butcher, the baker, the grocer, the greengrocer, the fishmonger, all closed their shops in good time for the Sabbath, and did not open their shutters till Sunday morning. All of them, and all our neighbours, we imagined, were celebrating Shabbos in much the same fashion as we did.

Around midday on Friday, my mother doffed her surgical identity and attire and devoted herself to making gefilte fish and other delicacies for Shabbos. Just before evening fell, she would light the ritual candles, cupping their flames with her hands, and murmuring a prayer. We would all put on clean, fresh Shabbos clothes, and gather for the first meal of the Sabbath, the evening meal. My father would lift his silver wine cup and chant the blessings and the Kiddush, and after the meal, he would lead us all in chanting the grace.

On Saturday mornings, my three brothers and I trailed our parents to Cricklewood Synagogue on Walm Lane, a huge shul built in the 1930s to accommodate part of the exodus of Jews from the East End to Cricklewood at that time. The shul was always full during my boyhood, and we all had our assigned seats, the men downstairs, the women – my mother, various aunts and cousins – upstairs; as a little boy, I sometimes waved to them during the service. Though I could not understand the Hebrew in the prayer book, I loved its sound and especially hearing the old medieval prayers sung, led by our wonderfully musical chazzan.

I did not embrace the ritual duties of a Jewish adult

All of us met and mingled outside the synagogue after the service – and we would usually walk to the house of my Auntie Florrie and her three children to say a Kiddush, accompanied by sweet red wine and honey cakes, just enough to stimulate our appetites for lunch. After a cold lunch at home – gefilte fish, poached salmon, beetroot jelly – Saturday afternoons, if not interrupted by emergency medical calls for my parents, would be devoted to family visits. Uncles and aunts and cousins would visit us for tea, or we them; we all lived within walking distance of one another.

The Second World War decimated our Jewish community in Cricklewood, and the Jewish community in England as a whole was to lose thousands of people in the post-war years. Many Jews, including cousins of mine, emigrated to Israel; others went to Australia, Canada, or the States; my eldest brother, Marcus, went to Australia in 1950. Many of those who stayed assimilated and adopted diluted, attenuated forms of Judaism. Our synagogue, which would be packed to capacity when I was a child, grew emptier by the year.

I chanted my bar mitzvah portion in 1946 to a relatively full synagogue, including several dozen of my relatives, but this, for me, was the end of formal Jewish practice. I did not embrace the ritual duties of a Jewish adult – praying every day, putting on tfillin before prayer each weekday morning – and I gradually became more indifferent to the beliefs and habits of my parents, though there was no particular point of rupture until I was 16. It was then that my father, enquiring into my sexual feelings, compelled me to admit that I liked boys.

"I haven't done anything," I said, "it's just a feeling – but don't tell Ma, she won't be able to take it."

He did tell her, and the next morning she came down with a look of horror on her face, and shrieked at me: "You are an abomination. I wish you had never been born." (She was no doubt thinking of the verse in Leviticus that read, "If a man also lie with mankind, as he lieth with a woman, both of them have committed an abomination: They shall surely be put to death; their blood shall be upon them.") The matter was never mentioned again, but her harsh words made me hate religion's capacity for bigotry and cruelty.

After I qualified as a doctor in 1960, I removed myself abruptly from England and what family and community I had there, and went to the New World, where I knew nobody. When I moved to Los Angeles, I found a sort of community among the weight lifters on Muscle Beach, and with my fellow neurology residents at UCLA, but I craved some deeper connection – "meaning" – in my life, and it was the absence of this, I think, that drew me into near-suicidal addiction to amphetamines in the 1960s.

Recovery started, slowly, as I found meaningful work in New York, in a chronic care hospital in the Bronx (the "Mount Carmel" I wrote about in Awakenings). I was fascinated by my patients there, cared for them deeply, and felt something of a mission to tell their stories – stories of situations virtually unknown, almost unimaginable, to the general public and, indeed, to many of my colleagues. I had discovered my vocation, and this I pursued doggedly, single-mindedly, with little encouragement from my colleagues. Almost unconsciously, I became a storyteller at a time when medical narrative was almost extinct. This did not dissuade me, for I felt my roots lay in the great neurological case histories of the 19th century (and I was encouraged here by the great Russian neuro-psychologist A. R. Luria). It was a lonely but deeply satisfying, almost monkish existence that I was to lead for many years.

During the 1990s, I came to know a cousin and contemporary of mine, Robert John Aumann, a man of remarkable appearance with his robust, athletic build and long white beard that made him, even at 60, look like an ancient sage.

He is a man of great intellectual power but also of great human warmth and tenderness, and deep religious commitment – indeed, "commitment" is one of his favourite words. Although, in his work, he stands for rationality in economics and human affairs, there is no conflict for him between reason and faith.

He insisted I have a mezuzah on my door, and brought me one from Israel. "I know you don't believe," he said, "but you should have one anyhow." I didn't argue.

In a remarkable 2004 interview, Robert John spoke of his lifelong work in mathematics and game theory, but also of his family – how he would go skiing and mountaineering with some of his nearly 30 children and grandchildren (a kosher cook, carrying saucepans, would accompany them), and the importance of the Sabbath to him.

"The observance of the Sabbath is extremely beautiful," he said, "and is impossible without being religious. It is not even a question of improving society – it is about improving one's own quality of life."

In December of 2005, Robert John received a Nobel Prize for his 50 years of fundamental work in economics. He was not entirely an easy guest for the Nobel Committee, for he went to Stockholm with his family, including many of those children and grandchildren, and all had to have special kosher plates, utensils, and food, and special formal clothes, with no biblically forbidden admixture of wool and linen.

That same month, I was found to have cancer in one eye, and while I was in the hospital for treatment the following month, Robert John visited. He was full of entertaining stories about the Nobel Prize and the ceremony in Stockholm, but made a point of saying that, had he been compelled to travel to Stockholm on a Saturday, he would have refused the prize. His commitment to the Sabbath, its utter peacefulness and remoteness from worldly concerns, would have trumped even a Nobel.

> I had felt a little fearful visiting my Orthodox family with my lover, Billy

In 1955, as a 22-year-old, I went to Israel for several months to work on a kibbutz, and though I enjoyed it, I decided not to go again. Even though so many of my cousins had moved there, the politics of the Middle East disturbed me, and I suspected I would be out of place in a deeply religious society. But in the spring of 2014, hearing that my cousin Marjorie – a physician who had been a protégée of my mother's and had worked in the field of medicine till the age of 98 – was nearing death, I phoned her in Jerusalem to say farewell. Her voice was unexpectedly strong and resonant, with an accent very much like my mother's. "I don't intend to die now," she said; "I will be having my 100 birthday on June 18th. Will you come?"

I said, "Yes, of course!" When I hung up, I realized that I had, within a few seconds, reversed a decision of almost 60 years.

It was purely a family visit. I celebrated Marjorie's 100 birthday with her and extended family. I saw two other cousins dear to me in my London days, innumerable second and removed cousins, and, of course, Robert John. I felt embraced by my family in a way I had not known since childhood.

I had felt a little fearful visiting my Orthodox family with my lover, Billy – my mother's words still echoed in my mind – but Billy too was warmly received. How profoundly attitudes had changed, even among the Orthodox, was made clear by Robert John when he invited Billy and me to join him and his family at their opening Sabbath meal.

The peace of the Sabbath, of a stopped world, a time outside time, was palpable, infused everything, and I found myself drenched with a wistfulness, something akin to nostalgia, wondering what if: What if A and B and C had been different? What sort of person might I have been? What sort of a life might I have lived?

In December 2014, I completed my memoir On the Move and gave the manuscript to my publisher, not dreaming that days later I would learn I had metastatic cancer, coming from the melanoma I had in my eye nine years earlier. I am glad I was able to complete my memoir without knowing this, and that I had been able, for the first time in my life, to make a full and frank declaration of my sexuality, facing the world openly, with no more guilty secrets locked up inside me.

In February, I felt I had to be equally open about my cancer – and facing death. I was, in fact, in the hospital when my essay on this, My Own Life, was published in the New York Times. In July I wrote another piece for the paper, My Periodic Table, in which the physical cosmos, and the elements I loved, took on lives of their own.

And now, weak, short of breath, my once-firm muscles melted away by cancer, I find my thoughts, increasingly, not on the supernatural or spiritual but on what is meant by living a good and worthwhile life – achieving a sense of peace within oneself. I find my thoughts drifting to the Sabbath, the day of rest, the seventh day of the week, and perhaps the seventh day of one's life as well, when one can feel that one's work is done, and one may, in good conscience, rest. ■

"If a Jew has a dog..." dogs in Yiddish proverbs

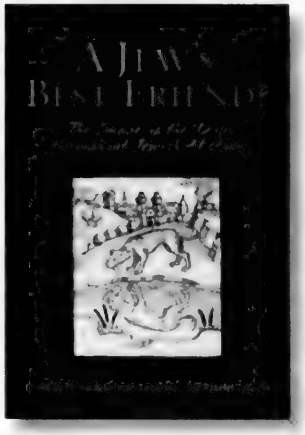
ROBERT A. ROTHSTEIN,
UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS, AMHERST

Sholem Aleichem's story Rabtshik,from his Stories for Jewish Children (Mayses far yidishe kinder) bears the strange subtitle "A Jewish Dog" ("A yidisher hunt"). A Jewish dog? Does the proverb not tell us that "if a Jew has a dog, either the dog is no dog or the Jew is no Jew ("Az a yid hot a hunt, iz oder der hunt keyn hunt nit oder der yid iz keyn yid nit")? In truth, Rabtshik is not much of a dog – he does not react aggressively to beatings and other abuse as other dogs do – nor do the Jews into whose courtyard Rabtshik has wandered behave the way Jews are supposed to. In particular they do not honour the principle of tsar baley-khayim, the obligation to avoid causing suffering to animals.

Rabtshik is beaten with sticks and stones by adults and children, by Jews and Gentiles; is doused with hot and cold water; and gets neither sympathy nor shared morsel of food from his fellow dogs – neither the urban dogs nor those from the village which he encounters when he runs away from the city. He almost gets eaten by a wolf when he seeks refuge in the forest, and the end of the story finds him lying on a road in the middle of a field, having given up on the world.

It is hard to see why Sholem Aleichem imagined the appropriate audience for this bleak story of cruelty to a dog to be children or why he called Rabtshik "a Jewish dog." One might hazard a guess that Rabtshik was "Jewish" not because he belonged to a Jewish family (which he did not), but because he behaved like a stereotypical East European Jew, seeming to invite abuse and not striking back: He was the kind of dog who "looked you straight in the eye as if to say, 'You want to beat me? Go ahead and do it.'" ("...kukt aykh glaykh in di oygn, vi eyner zogt: Na! Vilst mikh shlogn? – Shlog!")

One such beating leaves Rabtshik with a broken leg, a sad instance of a traditional Yiddish riddle that is based on a Hebrew pun. "When does a dog have a holiday?" asks the riddle, and the answer is, "When he gets his leg broken" ("Ven iz bay a hunt yontef? – az men tsebrekht im a fus."). The explanation is that a dog with a broken leg is reduced to walking on three legs. "Three legs" in Hebrew is shalosh regalim, but the same phrase is used in the Bible to mean "three times"—cf. the commandment in Exodus 23:14-16 to observe festivals "three times (a year)," namely Passover, Shevues (Shavuot), and Sukkot (Sukkot). In Mishnaic Hebrew, shalosh regalim came to refer to those three holidays—thus a dog that with three (good) legs would seem to have at the same time three holidays.



Yiddish has a rich stock of proverbs and related constructions (proverbial expressions, riddles, omens and apotropaic [evil-averting] formulas (Yiddish, "simonim un zgules")). In Yiddish, as in other languages, such paremias usually make metaphorical use of concrete imagery to make a more general and/or abstract point. Consider, for example, the proverb "When one wants to strike a dog, one finds a stick" ("Az men vil a hunt a zets gebn, gefint men a shtekn"). This proverb could be understood literally, but the more common figurative reading is that when one is determined to do something, one will find the means. The Yiddish proverb has counterparts in other European languages: the Polish version, for example, was first attested in 1558 ("Latwie kij najdzie, kto chce psa bic,"or in more modern Polish: Kto chce psa uderzyc, ten kij znajdzie"); and Sir Francis Bacon used an English version in 1593 ("He who has a mind to beat a dog will easily find a stick").

Dogs and sticks also figure in a proverb that recommends avoiding painful reminders: "One should not show a stick to a beaten dog" ("Far a geshlogenem hunt tor men keyn shtekn nit wayzn") – though there is also a corresponding proverb which does not refer to dogs: "One should not mention a rope to someone whose family member has been hanged" ("Ver es hot a gehongenem in der mishpokhe, far dem tor men keyn shtrik nit dermanen"). The second of these has international parallels, but the Polish analog of the first makes a different point. "Bitemu psu tylko kij ukazac" means that "it is enough to show a beaten dog a stick" – that is, a painful reminder can be useful. The Yiddish expression "a beaten dog" ("geshlogener hunt") may apply figuratively to a person in at least two related senses: an experienced person (particularly one who has experienced suffering), and a person who is sly or wily.

In another proverb the dog is literal but the stick-throwing is figurative: "Wherever one throws a stick, one finds a dog" ("Vu men git a vorf a shtekn, gefint men a hunt"), which can mean that there are lots of dogs around – or that bad people are to be found everywhere. Sometimes, however, the stick is literal, not figurative. The proverbial expression "a verse with a stick" ("a posek mit a shtekn") suggests that a cautious person should carry a stick just in case the biblical verse that is supposed to protect Jews against dogs fails to work. The intended verse is Exodus 11:7: "But against any of the children of Israel shall not a dog whet his tongue…" Likewise, an anecdote about two Jewish pedlars in a Polish village who want to offer their wares to a Polish homeowner alludes to the same verse. When the pedlars enter the courtyard, one of them is attacked by a large dog. The other yells to him to recite the verse, but his colleague answers that the dog did not leave him enough time to do so ("Der hunt lozt mikh tsum posek nit kumen"). His answer has become proverbial.

Beyond the biblical verse and the stick, there are other traditional ways to protect oneself from a threatening dog. Some Jews believed that a dog would run away if one shows it a "fig" (a "fayg"–the gesture consisting of a closed fist with the thumb sticking out between the index and middle fingers) or one makes the "fig" with one's hand in one's pocket. One might have to accompany the gesture with the incantation "Death or life,/As God grants" ("Toyt oder lebn,/vi Got vet gebn"). Or the "fig" might not even be necessary if one says three times:

Hunt, hunt,/farmakh dayn bunt.
Ikh bin Yankevs,/du bist Eysevs.
Du vest mikh baysn,/veln di velf dikh tseraysn

Dog, dog,/Close your mouth.
I am Jacob's,/You are Esau's.
If you bite me,/The wolves will tear you apart

On the other hand, small children do not have to worry about dogs – since, according to popular belief, "No dog will attack small children" ("Kleyne kinder falt keyn hunt nit on").

> One should not show a stick to a beaten dog.

Dogs bark, of course, and although "not everyone at whom dogs bark is a thief" ("Nit yederer af vemen hint biln iz a ganef"), still, "a dog does not bark at itself" ("A hunt bilt nit af zikh aleyn") – in other words, where there's smoke, there's fire, and "when a dog barks, one should go out and take a look" ("Az a hunt bilt, zol men aroysgeyn zen"). After all, dogs bark at strangers – and there might be a thief in the neighbourhood. Alternatively, "[When] dogs bark, [it means that] in-laws are coming [to visit]" ("Hint biln–mekhutonim forn"). In any case, "When the dog has had enough of barking, it will stop by itself" ("Az der hunt hot zikh oysgebilt, hert er aleyn uf").

Yet sometimes one can simply ignore the barking; the Yiddish version of the internationally-known proverb that "a barking dog does not bite" is "A hunt vos bilt, bayst nit." In Yiddish and in other languages, the proverb is often used figuratively to characterize a verbally aggressive person who makes threats but does not carry them out. Yet the simple meaning of the proverb is challenged in an anecdote in which a Jew visiting a Pole in a village is afraid to enter his garden because there is a dog barking fiercely on the other side of the fence. The Pole tries to reassure him by reminding him of the proverb. "I certainly know that rule," says the Jew, "but how do I know that the dog does too?" ("Avade veys ikh dem dozikn klal! Nor fun vanen veys ikh, az der kelev veyst dos oykh?").

The image of someone ignoring a barking dog appears in two Yiddish proverbial expressions that can be used to suggest that one should ignore criticism – or that someone is too insignificant to be listened to. The first has two versions: "One lets a dog bark and continues on his way" ("A hunt lozt men biln, un men geyt zayn veg"); and "The dog barks, and the landowner travels on" ("Der hunt bilt, un der porets fort"). The second has a Polish cognate first attested in 1671: "Pies szczeka, a dworzanin jedzie" – and other Polish versions say that "The dog barks, but the caravan travels on." The version with the caravan exists in a rhyming Turkish proverb ("it ürür kervan yürür"), which dates from at least the early 17th century. The proverb also exists in English – in Chapter 38 of Margaret Mitchell's Gone with the Wind Rhett Butler asks Scarlett O'Hara, "Did you ever hear the Oriental proverb: 'The dogs bark but the caravan passes on?' Let them bark, Scarlett. I fear nothing will stop your caravan."

As we have seen, Yiddish proverbs that mention dogs are usually about humans and not about dogs. Sometimes there is an explicit comparison, e.g., "A cantor in his old age," says one proverb, "barks like a dog and eats like a pig" ("A khazn af der elter bilt vi a hunt un frest vi a khazer"). The verb untershlogn means "to line (a garment)," but someone said to be "untergeshlogn mit hunt" (literally, "lined with dog [fur]") is a bad person, and a proverb plays on the literal and idiomatic meanings by suggesting that "If one is himself lined with dog fur, he does not need a fur coat" ("Az men iz aleyn untergeshlogn mit hunt, bedarf men keyn pelts nit"). A dog can even serve as a standard of negativity: "A false friend is worse than a dog" ("A falsher fraynd iz erger vi a hund"). This negative depiction of dogs is also maintained in some of the few proverbs that actually are about dogs – for example, "From a dog one cannot even make a good fur coat" ("Fun a hunt ken men afile keyn gutn pelts nit makhn") or "There is no such thing as a good dog" ("Es iz nit keyn guter hunt").

The image of a dog is used to express a less-than-welcoming attitude toward in-laws in such proverbs as: "A mekhutn (a son- or daughter-in-law's father) should not be a dog (i.e., a bad person)" ("A mekhutn tor keyn hunt nit zayn") , and "A son or a daughter is a child; a daughter-in-law is a sore (a wound); a son-in-law is a dog" ("A zun un a tokhter zint a kind; a shnur iz a vund; an eydem iz a hunt" – which exhibits multiple rhymes in the Central Yiddish dialect: "A zin in a tokhter zint a kint; a shnir iz a vint; an aydem iz a hint"). Another Yiddish proverb, presumably expressing the negative attitude of the bride's parents to their new son-in-law, parodies a comparison from a medieval rabbinic text (Pirqe de-Rabbi Eliezer), which says that "a bridegroom is like a king" (in its Ashkenazi version: "Khosn doyme lemeylekh"); the parody tells us that a bridegroom is like a dog. ("Khosn doyme lekelev") "A merchant should not be a dog," says another proverb, "and a dog certainly should not be a merchant" ("A soykher tor keyn hunt nit zayn, un a hunt a soykher avade nit"). In effect, "hunt" (dog) is the antonym of "mensch" (man, in the sense of "decent human being").

There is little hope for a bad person: "A dog remains a dog" ("A hunt blaybt a hunt"), although he is advised not to add the further sin of avarice: "If you are already a dog, at least do not be a pig" ("Bistu shoyn a hunt, zay zhe khotshe keyn khazer nit"). Figuratively, there are degrees of being a dog: one can be described in a mixed Yiddish-Hebrew formula as "a dog of dogs" ("hunt-shebehint") or in its purely Hebrew version (also used in Yiddish) as "kelev-she-be-kelavim". Combining the Germanic and Semitic words for "dog" produces a stronger effect than either alone: "a hunt a kelev" is a very negative way to describe a person. In an anecdote, a wife adds a third term when one of her husband's friends comes to tell her that he has died while playing cards. Having been instructed to approach the matter tactfully, the messenger begins by telling her that her husband had lost money while playing cards (that is, leaving off the fact that he died). The vignette reaches a comic climax when she responds with, "May he croak, the dog," building a crescendo of abuse by adding the Russian word for "dog" to the Yiddish and Hebrew ones: "Peygern zol er, der hunt, der kelev, der sabake!" If you prefer to be indirect, you can call someone a "fifty-second" ("Er iz a tsvey-un-fufts-iker")–from the sum of the numerical values of the Hebrew letters in kelev, 40+10+2.

"All dogs look alike," says another proverb, "and so do all Russians" ("Ale hint un ale yevonim hobn eyn ponim"); an anticlerical version adds "all rabbis" ("un ale rabonim") to the list of those who, literally translated, "have one face." (Yevonim originally referred to Greeks, but later came to mean "Russians" or "Russian soldiers" or even "policemen.")

> If you are already a dog, at least do not be a pig.

Needless to say, this is not complimentary to dogs or to Russians – or to rabbis. Another characteristic of dogs is that they have fleas, and Yiddish has a version of the internationally known proverb that uses the metaphor of dogs and fleas to advise against associating with disreputable characters: "If you lie down with dogs, you will get up with fleas" ("Ver es leygt zikh mit a hunt shlofn, shteyt uf mit fley"). The proverb is first attested in English in 1573, and has a Latin antecedent: Qui cum canibus concumbunt cum pulicibus surgent.

Dogs stand in for humans in other proverbs as well. "If you let a dog get up on the bench, he will jump onto the table" ("Loz a hunt af der bank, shpringt er afn tish") and its synonymous proverb "If you show a dog a finger, he will want the whole hand" ("Vayz a hunt a finger, vil er di gantse hant") are equivalent to the English "Give him a finger and he will take an arm." All are warnings about being too generous or too willing to help. On the other hand, one needs to be careful about a helper who is not a disinterested party: "One does not send a dog into a butcher shop" ("A hunt shikt men nit in yatke arayn") or its equivalent: "One does not send a cat for butter or a dog for meat" ("A kats shikt men nit nokh puter un a hunt nokh fleysh"). Yet another version: "Just as a dog cannot be a butcher, so too an unmarried young man cannot be a matchmaker" ("Vi a hunt ken keyn katsev nit zayn, azoy ken a bokher keyn shadkhn nit zayn"). This would be equivalent to what the English proverbial expression calls "letting the fox guard the chicken coop." A Yiddish equivalent of "When the cat is away, the mice will play" is "When the butcher goes away, the dog jumps onto the butcher's block" ("Az der katsev geyt avek, shpringt der hunt afn klots"). To comment on a person who meddles in matters that are none of his or her business, one can say, "Yes, a wedding, but what is the dog doing there?" ("Yo, a khasene–vi kumt ober der hunt dertsu?").

Occasionally, a dog serves as a convenient straw man to describe human behaviour. A dog is mentioned in the proverb "Only a dog [unlike a person] has no debts" ("Nor a hunt hot keyn khoyves nit"). Cows and horses have no debts either, but the proverb choses a negative representative of the animal kingdom as a counterpoint to the fallible human. A person described as looking at someone "like a dog at its father" ("Er kukt af im vi a hunt afn tatn") has a dumbfounded look of astonishment since, as the Yiddish lexicographer Nahum Stutchkoff explained, a dog typically does not know his father ("his mother the bitch did not marry him under a wedding canopy" ("Keyn khupe hot di mame zayne di klafte mit im nisht geshtelt") and would be surprised to be introduced to him. Once again, dogs are not the only animals that do not typically live in nuclear families, but perhaps the subtext here is an implied misogynistic analogy based on the stereotypical promiscuity of female dogs.

The dog is also a straw man in a proverb that comes from an anecdote about a Jew and a dog. A landlord has ordered one of his Jewish tenants to teach the landlord's dog to speak Polish. The Jew agrees, but says that it will take a long time, perhaps 10 years. The landlord is willing to wait.

When one of the Jew's friends asks him how he could agree to take on such an impossible task, the first Jew replies that in 10 years "Either the landlord will croak (that is, die), or the dog will croak" ("Oder der porets vet peygern, oder der hunt vet peygern").

Jews did recognize some positive qualities in dogs, such as their loyalty: "A wife is like a dog in the house" (A vayb iz vi a hunt in shtub), i.e., she is loyal and protects the home. (Notice that this suggests either that Jews occasionally allowed dogs into their homes, or, more likely, that they were familiar with this practice among non-Jews.) A more elaborate version of this comparison says that "The first wife is like a dog, the second is like a cat and the third, like a pig" (Dos ershte vayb iz vi a hunt, dos tsveyte iz vi a kats un dos drite vi a khazer), in other words, the first wife is loyal, the second is false and the third is greedy.

One proverb suggests a useful role for dogs: "If there is a dog and a potter in a town, one does not need a rabbi" ("Az men hot a hunt un a teper in shtot, darf men keyn rov nit hobn"). The explanation is that a rabbi is needed only to answer questions concerning kashrut. If there is some doubt about the kosher status of a piece of meat, the dog can eat it; and if there is some doubt about a dish or a cooking vessel, the potter can make a new one. So a dog can help one avoid the sin of eating non-kosher food. A positive (and even kind) attitude toward dogs is reflected in the Yiddish version of an internationally known proverbial expression about terrible weather: "It's a sin to drive a dog out (in such weather)" ("Es iz an aveyre, a hunt aroystsutraybn").

Although most Yiddish proverbs that mention dogs are not really about dogs, dogs do play a role in some proverbial omens (Yiddish, "zgules"), e.g., "When a dog howls, someone has died" ("Az a hunt vuyet, iz eyner geshtorbn"). This is a paraphrase of part of a Talmudic citation: "When dogs howl, this is a sign that the Angel of Death is in the town. When dogs frolic (literally, "are happy"), (this is a sign that) Elijah the Prophet is in the town. ("Ven es voyen hint, iz a simen, az der malekh-hamoves iz in shtot. Az hint zaynen freylekh, iz Elyohu hanovi in shtot"). Here we see dogs serving an unusual, mystical function—announcing death on the one hand, and the possibility of redemption on the other. Elijah, after all, is supposed to announce the coming of the Messiah.

From the available evidence from proverbs and other literary sources, we can conclude that dogs were part of the Jewish environment in Eastern Europe, but they were not part of the family. If a neighbourhood dog was familiar enough to be given a name, it was typically a Slavic name, not a Jewish one. The dogs in the Sholem Aleichem story with which we began all have such names: Rabtshik, Tsutsik, Rudek, Zhuk, Sirko. There is also a Sirko in Sholem Aleichem's autobiographical novel From the Fair (Funem yarid), whom the children address in Ukrainian – since, as the author points out, "one naturally speaks with a dog in the (local) Gentile language (af goyish)." Yiddish proverbs about dogs – with some few exceptions – portray a generally negative image. A dog – or a person who can be compared to a dog – is to be disdained or feared: "If you are likely to meet a dog, you should take a stick along to defend yourself (in case the protective biblical formula does not work)". The same attitude is reflected in an American Jewish anecdote about a Jew who had long ago converted to Christianity. He confides to a friend that in some ways he still feels Jewish: "Every day I read the New York Times, every Sunday I have a pastrami sandwich, and I'm still afraid of dogs." ■

In vitro, if you can

Children had not really been on the agenda during my brief first marriage. For many years afterwards, to the extent that I even allowed myself to dream about a better future, I was hoping more for an enduring, loving relationship than for marriage and a baby carriage. But meeting Lisa in Israel was the best thing that happened to me. So the idea of creating a family with her didn't terrify me; whatever my neuroses were, they were not going to dominate my life. We were mature, level-headed, conscientious adults. Given my history, I approached the idea of kids as an awesome responsibility, but one that we were ready for.

Yet three years into our marriage, we were not getting pregnant. Lisa was in her late 30s, so maybe age was a contributing factor. Tests showed I had poor sperm motility. Still, hadn't doctors time and again overcome just such hurdles? And so, with composed optimism, we began treatment – breaking away from our respective offices to keep appointments at Jerusalem's Hadassah Medical Center IVF clinic on Mount Scopus. We started out hopefully enough with the standard medical and social intake assessments. Next came exams, lab tests, ultrasonography, and referrals to outside consultants, including endocrinologists and urologists.

Lisa had to take potent hormonal drugs and undergo repeated surgical procedures, which necessitated mild anesthesia, to reimplant her eggs, which had been fertilized by my sperm in a test tube. My role was simply to relive the inglorious moments of my adolescence, girlie magazine in hand – only this time under doctor's orders. But the eggs that were fertilized in the lab and inserted into Lisa's uterus didn't take hold, for reasons that never became quite clear. Was it just bad luck? Were Lisa's eggs too frail? Did my sperm have a built-in self-destruct mechanism?

I couldn't help thinking back to my years at the New York City Health Department, where one of my jobs had involved working with a device that utilized a radioactive particle to detect lead in the homes of children diagnosed with lead poisoning. Employees had been repeatedly assured the machine was safe. Still, I wondered.

After each failed round, we'd return to the oval waiting room, modern, sun-drenched, with smiling baby pictures on the wall and physicians' offices around the perimeter. We'd occasionally be taken aback to see someone we knew, though the effect was more a sense of camaraderie than embarrassment. We now see some of these same women around our neighbourhood, children in tow.

Our travails at Hadassah coincided with the second intifadah (2000–2005), during which Palestinian terrorism, most notoriously in the form of café and bus suicide bombings, claimed over a thousand Israeli dead and 6,000 wounded. Yet in the surreal cocoon of Hadassah's east Jerusalem IVF clinic we might, on any given day, be assigned to an Arab physician who was treating us with professionalism and empathy, even as, next door, a Jewish doctor might be working likewise with an Arab couple. And, save for incidental expenses, it didn't cost any of us a penny – or in Israeli currency, an agora, because all citizens and permanent residents of metropolitan Jerusalem – Jews, Arabs, Christians, and Muslims – are eligible for fertility treatment, gratis.

As a matter of national policy, little Israel is the country most committed to IVF. Just how deep-rooted this obligation is becomes apparent when you consider what happened in the early 2000s when it was challenged by the Finance Ministry on budgetary grounds. In Knesset (parliamentary) hearings on the Treasury's proposal to cut the budget for IVF, Finance Ministry civil servants told lawmakers that there had been a 54 per cent increase in IVF spending from 2000 to 2009. The tab was covered in the basic "health basket" – meaning that IVF was treated like a flu shot or blood pressure medicine: if you needed it, you got it. Reproduction assistance covered diagnosis and therapy for both couples and non-married childless women.

> As a matter of national policy, little Israel is the country most committed to IVF.

The mandarins at Finance tried to frame the discussion about IVF in straightforward public policy terms: There were limited resources; IVF was an indulgence; plainly it mustn't be allowed to take precedence over, say, cancer treatment or geriatric rehabilitation facilities. Proponents of universal free IVF came back with what amounted to a national security counter-argument. Making babies was a strategic need. Israel was a small country, demographically outnumbered, and surrounded by intractable enemies. Jews needed to remain the decided majority between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea in order for the polity to remain both Jewish and democratic. The claim was put forth that it was less expensive to make babies at home than pay for mass immigration from the Diaspora.

Tellingly, pragmatic arguments about balance sheets and demographic interests didn't sway the Knesset members. What seemed to make the difference in Israel's inimitable sociocultural milieu was the emotional argument, which came from across the political spectrum. From Palestinian Arab nationalists like Ahmed Tibi (who, not incidentally, is a Hebrew University-trained gynecologist), to non- Zionist ultra-Orthodox MKs, to Zionist security hawks, to dovish liberals – all coalesced behind the idea that Israeli citizens have an intrinsic "right" to parenthood, viewing infertility as a treatable ailment and IVF not only as a cure, but as a citizen's entitlement.

Men and women struggling to become parents testified before the Knesset during committee hearings, invoking this "right" to build a family. Paraphrasing the famous talmudic dictum (Nedarim 64b), one MK from the ultra-Orthodox Sephardi Shas Party declared, "If you don't have children you are as good as dead." He spoke of the angst experienced by childless couples: "Everything is extinguished.

There's no happiness, just sadness."

A fertility expert testified in no less poignant terms, describing the "disease" of infertility as "no less fatal than cancer," and painting the psyches of those affected this way: "The woman is ostracized, the man cannot be part of the community, and the family ceases to exist." The recurring theme articulated by lawmakers, witnesses, and experts from disparate backgrounds was that family had a singular place in Israeli society – in both the Jewish and Arab communities.

> And the most important element of family is children.

And the most important element of family is children.

In the words of one MK : "Who among us can say that he would forgo a child? No one!" In fact, went the argument, no one should be expected to "make do" with only one child. A dovish MK said that talk of demography was beside the point. All that really mattered was "the uncomplicated need that society has to provide for couples who want to have more than one child." A rabbi-physician told a hearing: "We are dealing here with the creation of human life, and with the issue of realizing the right to parenthood. This is a basic right."

The Finance Ministry lost the budget battle and money was removed from elsewhere in the social welfare budget to protect the special place of IVF. By 2012, this "basic right" was extended to same-sex couples.

Each new day brings further advances in IVF technology, yet it's hardly the case that IVF guarantees success. All things being equal – age, health, physician skills – most women in their 30s and 40s don't get pregnant. In our age bracket the success rate is about 20 per cent. In Israel, taken as a whole, the IVF failure rate is a staggering 75 per cent. These failures are attributed 30 per cent of the time to women and men equally, to both jointly in 18 per cent of the cases, and to no known reason 21 per cent of the time. There are no empty picture frames in IVF clinic waiting rooms for all the babies that didn't get made.

After five or six gruelling rounds – each cycle takes about six weeks not counting waiting in between – Lisa and I decided we'd had enough. On top of everything else, we worried about the long-term consequences of the hormones she was taking. Thus, we became part of the dismal statistic: some 30 per cent of infertility cases worldwide go unexplained.

Not long ago, former British Labour Party figure David Miliband described his IVF experience as "drawn out," "difficult," and "emotionally exhausting." There came a point when the Milibands too realized they "had reached the end of the line and we weren't going to give birth." They ultimately opted to go through the "daunting" process of adoption in the U.S. and are now the parents of two young children. (David Miliband currently heads the U.S.-based International Rescue Committee.) Although David and Louise Miliband are at least 10 years younger than us, and maybe a little better connected, the question remains: Why didn't Lisa and I consider other avenues, like adoption or surrogacy? All I know is that, like the Milibands, we were emotionally drained and frustrated; we were also angry about our fate. Adoption isn't an easy process, especially not in Israel, and it would have required a resilience we just didn't have at the time. Given our ages, we were probably not prime candidates for a healthy local baby. Adopting from abroad would have entailed battling bureaucracies – foreign as well as Israel's own formidable officialdom. And it would not have been cheap, though that was not the deciding factor.

> Adoption or surrogacy would not have changed the fact that I was the last of my line on my mother's side.

Moreover, I told myself that I wasn't interested in a trophy child which was how I imagined one that wasn't our biological offspring. And anyway, adoption or surrogacy would not have changed the fact that I was the last of my line on my mother's side. The only child of an only child. The decision may appear short-sighted, but that's how I felt. Since neither Lisa nor I were ardently for adoption or surrogacy, we let those possibilities slide.

A friend once asked if we went through something like Elisabeth Kubler-Ross's neat five stages of grief: denial, anger, bargaining, depression, and acceptance. Real life isn't that straightforward. I felt anger, that's for sure. Especially when I read about children abused, abandoned, even murdered by their parents. Why would God give children to people who didn't want them or couldn't care for them, instead of to us?

To the extent that we are at peace with our childlessness and our decision not to adopt – it is thanks to a remarkable, humane, empathetic couples' psychologist named Edna Dolan. Edna came recommended by a close friend, and for a good number of months, first as we wound down IVF and then as we mourned the loss of the child we would never have, she became our emotional life raft. Lisa and I usually met with Edna in her Mevaseret Zion home-office, located on a steep hilltop just outside Jerusalem. Israeli-born, Edna's excellent English came in handy, since we were not about to deal with these issues in anything but our native tongue.

We hashed out our raw feelings about a lot of things, including adoption. We did a lot of crying. Edna was our safe haven at a time when everything seemed fraught and precarious. She taught us how to listen to each other using a technique called mirroring. Sometimes I'd hear Lisa say something, but in a cognitive process of which I was only semi-aware, I'd reinterpret her feelings to fit my own preconceived notions. So to make sure lines of communication were truly open between Lisa and me, Edna showed us how to mirror, listening methodically and then prefixing our replies with, "I hear you saying that…". It may sound banal, but allowing ourselves to be clear about our feelings helped us secure and strengthen our relationship against the ravages of failed IVF treatments.

When I decided to write about Edna, I wanted to check the appropriateness of it with her first. I soon discovered the sad news that she had died of cancer some years ago. That hit me. We had last seen her when we paid a shivah visit after Edna's teenage son died in tragic circumstances. It took me weeks to find the right moment to tell Lisa that Edna herself was now gone. May her memory be a blessing.

As for why Lisa and I did not try surrogacy, that would have been even more problematic than adoption. I understand that some folks pay over $100,000 to make babies using someone else's egg, someone else's womb, and someone else's sperm. It might be right for some couples, but we weren't enthusiastic about the idea of leasing a womb – or more – from another human being, possibly in some underdeveloped country. It would have forced us to wrestle with legal,ethical, and halachic questions at a time when our emotional stamina was low. It was also true that while we knew people who'd adopted or gone through the IVF process, we just didn't know anyone who had gone the surrogacy route.

Lisa and I know any number of women who long to get married and have children, but simply have not found the right partner. Some of our friends, men and women, find the sting of loneliness less painful than the possibility of hurt that necessarily comes with attempting an intimate relationship. Of course I'm glad for the women in our circle, mostly Lisa's friends from before we were married, who had the spunk to go through IVF and bring children into this world on their own. It fascinates me that their children are growing up without dads, and I wonder if they feel "fatherless" despite never having lost one to death, divorce, or abandonment.

> I can't help but think what might have been thoughts as I observe children around us throwing age appropriate tantrums.

Meanwhile, I can't help but think what-might-have-been thoughts as I observe children around us throwing age-appropriate tantrums, taking on likeable personas, cracking jokes, and gradually reaching bar or bat mitzvah age. On such occasions, even as I take joy in the happiness of my friends and relatives, I would be dishonest to deny a sense of melancholy that Lisa and I can only be spectators to such milestones.

Not being a parent has attuned me to the various hues of childlessness.

After our failed IVF experience I made a (for me) monumental decision – though at the time I didn't admit a connection because, really, it was the culmination of a number of factors.

I took off my kippah.

Frum – religiously observant – from birth, I wore a yarmulke on the tough streets of the Lower East Side in the '60s and '70s, mostly without thought or choice, though sometimes defiantly in the face of abuse and bullying from my Puerto Rican neighbours. I continued to wear it for the 23 years I worked in New York City government. I attended meetings on behalf of my agency in some of New York's worst neighbourhoods, wearing my yarmulke.

It was a decision that had been percolating for some time. Theologically, I no longer believed myself to be Orthodox, and worried I was putting up a false front. And in Israel, what one wears or doesn't wear on one's head is laden with political, religious, and cultural connotations. At the time, however, I didn't admit to myself – much less to anyone else – that there was a deeper impetus for the decision, and it wasn't just a desire to avoid phoniness.

The first few days, it was awkward to go bareheaded. At work, several people asked me what was going on. None got a straight answer because I didn't have one. Instead, I resorted to my lifelong fallback: I made a joke and changed the subject. But the truth was I felt let down by the Creator of the Universe and I needed to let Him know. I felt God had hidden His face from me, and keeping my kippah in my pocket was a form of personal protest. It was also a belated rebellion against my spiritually wasted yeshiva years. And it was my own silent stand against those who defame God's holy name by behaving badly with little thought to the yarmulkes on their heads.

At first, my decision left me uneasy. In the Diaspora, yarmulkes are partly intended to declare membership in the tribe, to identify Jews among gentiles. In Israel, they are more like bumper stickers. Jewish Israeli men are defined not only by whether they wear a kippah, but by its style – velvet, large, and black for the ultra-Orthodox, knitted for the national-religious, and endless variations in between.

In post-biblical times, Jewish custom demanded men and (married) women cover their hair: women for the sake of modesty, both sexes as a sign of God above. A mid-19th-century code of Jewish conduct and law held that "a man ought not to walk four cubits" bareheaded because doing so "suggests overbearing pride, ignoring God's omnipresence." By the 17th century, Jews made a point of covering their heads in contradistinction to Christians, who even prayed bareheaded.

> The truth was I felt let down by the Creator of the Universe and I needed to let him know.

I had never explicitly tied the decision to stop wearing a kippah to my childlessness – to feeling abandoned by my Father in Heaven. In hindsight, though, it seems as it was integral. Much later I told my friend George about my kippah saga, and he said that whenever he hears that some great personal misfortune has led X to change his view of life, or of God – "and I definitely include myself in this, and I speak from my own experience" – he wonders whether the evidence was there all along but X ignored it, or its implications, until the misfortune happened to him personally.

Addressing himself to my case, George said: "You must have known long before you met Lisa that there were childless people who longed for children and would have made good parents, but that knowledge didn't have much effect, if any, on your attitude to God. The fact that He had let other people down didn't make much impression on you. That is, in a sense, quite obvious and understandable; but once you start to think about it, it raises questions about us and our capacity for fellow-feeling."

I can't disagree.

Dan Lobel, whom I knew from my days as a technical writer at a high- tech firm in Tel Aviv, is one of those lanky, earnest, analytical people who don't make you feel uncomfortable for not sharing their spiritual passions. I joke that he'd make a good Jewish Dalai Lama. He's principled, ascetic, and always seems to stay on an even keel. Like me and Lisa, he and his wife Tzipi tried IVF only to find it did not work for them.

Born in Toronto, Dan was already in his 30s when he embarked on a two-year trek, mostly in Asia, in search of some greater purpose to his life. His parents were non-practicing Reform Jews who only rarely attended temple.

They perfunctorily sent him to Sunday school, where his interest in Judaism remained, unsurprisingly, dormant.

"I was on a shoestring budget when I arrived in Jerusalem in the autumn of 1995. Costs were considerably more than what I had become accustomed to in Asia. So, I started working as a night check-in clerk at a hostel," Dan recalls. "I was meeting all sorts of travellers who were saying things like, 'Isn't Jerusalem awesome and spiritual?' and it just wasn't clicking with me. I was in a funk, sleeping during the day, getting up at 5 p.m. for 'breakfast' just as the sun was going down, and spending my nights folding guests' laundry, emptying ashtrays and cleaning toilets. I was considering moving on when my travel buddy suggested I do a class. He said that Aish HaTorah, in Jerusalem's Old City, was running a seminar. So I took off a few nights from work and went." Dan enrolled first in Aish HaTorah and later at Ohr Somayach, two academies which specialize in kiruv, making Orthodox Judaism accessible to unaffiliated young Jews, most of whom do not stay on in Israel.

"I recall signs directing participants to the Aish building – things were more Spartan than today – with the word 'Discovery' and arrows pointing you through the maze of Jerusalem's Old City. And below the arrows was the catchphrase: 'If you have questions....' I recall thinking to myself, 'Questions? What questions? I don't have any questions.' God was completely off my radar at that point. But the program turned out to be fascinating, touching on religion, history, philosophy, science. Although I had no questions going in, I came out with a whole pile of them." Dan studied three months at Aish and another three at Ohr Somayach. By the time he returned to Canada he was on an Orthodox trajectory.

He eventually found his way back to Israel where, at a Shabbat luncheon, he met another English speaker, an attractive, tender- hearted social worker with a porcelain complexion named Tzipi. The chemistry was just right.

> Finally she just completely dissolved. She couldn't carry on. I can't say I was surprised

As I sat speaking with Dan in their living room, he told me about their journey through infertility treatments. Within two years of their marriage, seeing they weren't getting pregnant, the couple began IVF at Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital on Mount Scopus – the same place Lisa and I had undergone our treatments. They told almost no one. He was 44 and she was 37.

It turns out that Tzipi has an unbearable fear of needles, and the IVF process requires that you inject yourself at the same time everyday with hormones. She tried it for a while, but just couldn't do it herself. So Dan would go to her workplace to give her the jab. "There we were in the storage room among grimy documents, decaying newspapers, and stale, empty beer bottles. Me with the syringe in my hands, Tzipi often bursting into tears.

Finally, she just completely dissolved. She couldn't carry on. I can't say I was surprised. When Tzipi goes for an immunization, she practically passes out."

Dan's story reminded me of how Lisa would sometimes show up at the Jerusalem Post, when I was an editor there, for her jab. We'd lock ourselves in the dusty newspaper morgue for the procedure. We, however, came out smiling – God only knows what my colleagues surmised.

Dan told me he was angry – at Tzipi, at himself, at the situation – for something like 24 hours. "Then I said to myself, 'OK. It hurts. And I wish we could do something about that. But nothing hurts me more than seeing Tzipi hurting.'" Afterwards, he told me, "I just decided everyone has their limits about certain things, and what's the point of being angry? She had reached her limit – there was no doubt.

"People think IVF is as simple as popping an aspirin," Dan added. "They don't have problems having children, and only become aware of those who do when they hear about a successful IVF outcome. Most people going through IVF don't broadcast it. So if they are unsuccessful, no one will ever know; outsiders will never get a sense of the percentage of failures vis-à-vis successes.

"People whom IVF has failed, for one reason or another, are not flag-wavers. I'm in that 75 per cent."

Barely catching their breath after their IVF ordeal, Dan and Tzipi decided to adopt a child. "We went through all the hoops. All the meetings, interviews, paperwork, psychological evaluations, a daylong psychometric exam, for which we paid NIS 2,500 (US$680). There was a hilarious interview with a psychologist who was evaluating our answers and showing us, I swear to you, Rorschach blots, asking us what we saw; it was like out of a movie. I couldn't believe people still did that.

"So we went through all of that. And the last phase for getting approved for adoption is that they come for a visit to make sure you don't live in filth, with rats. The social worker came to our home and saw that we were clean and normal. She told us that everything was good to go: 'You guys should have no problem getting accepted.'"

Because of their ages, they were not eligible to adopt a healthy newborn, though they could adopt a child between ages six and 10 who most likely would come with some disadvantage or impairment. Dan had concerns about the undertaking, but was willing to go ahead anyway. Now, it was just a matter of getting written confirmation in the mail after the adoption approval committee had made its formal decision. Weeks stretched into months and still Dan and Tzipi heard nothing.

> Then, out of the blue, came an awful blow.

Then, out of the blue, came an awful blow. Dan became aware of a growth, and his worst fears were realized when the biopsy results came back positive. A random unexpected occurrence had fundamentally changed Dan's life. He went from prospective new dad to cancer patient.

"We were on the cusp of adoption, and God said no.

"About two weeks into dealing with the cancer horror, we got a call from the social worker asking if we were coming to the parenting class. It's the class you have to go through once you've been approved. And then you can adopt.

"And we said, 'Approved?' "'Didn't you get the letter?' "'No.'"

They never did get the letter of approval. And because of Dan's cancer treatment, they couldn't attend the class.

Although Dan is now in remission, he still hasn't regained his full stamina, and he and Tzipi are no longer sure the conventional adoption program they were involved in makes sense for them. They are exploring becoming emergency foster parents – "for when the cops have to pull a child out of the house at 3 a.m. – the catch being you have to be willing to care for three children at a time, under the age of six, who are all coming from trauma," Dan explains.

Still another program they're considering would allow them to adopt the newborn baby of a drug addict. The catch is that such an infant would essentially go through withdrawal, and may need detoxification. By signing up for the program Dan and Tzipi would be on a fast track to becoming the infant's permanent adoptive parents. The downside is that such a child may well be damaged by their prenatal exposure to narcotics, and there is no guarantee Dan and Tzipi would be approved to officially adopt the infant. They might care for it for six months or more while its legal status is clarified, only to be told they must give up the child.

It's not a frivolous decision, and they're waiting until Dan feels more like himself before making the final call.

I asked him what he tells people when they casually ask if he has children. He said his stock answer is, "No, be'ezrat Hashem – God willing." When I raised an eyebrow, he replied, "Look, Tzipi hasn't gone through menopause. We're still in the game. A miracle can happen. Why not?"

Of course, I said, there are all these folks who purposefully opt not to have kids. They wonder about the wisdom of bringing children into the world. Some worry that they won't be good parents. Some had such traumatically lousy childhoods that they can't imagine having the inner resources to give a child what he or she needs. Dan reserved judgment. "There is more than selfishness to consider. There are people who think the world is such a mess, they don't want to bring kids into it."

Dan and I agreed that this stance is somehow un-Jewish. However, Dan then surprised me by asking, "But what makes it 'un-Jewish' in your eyes?" My reply was knee-jerk. It is "un-Jewish" because Jews are part of a collective, and in order to have quality, we also need quantity. "That's like a fascist view of Judaism," Dan countered. "That everything is done for the nation."

I recoiled at the fascist accusation. Had I the presence of mind, I might have quoted Emil Fackenheim's proposition about not giving Hitler any posthumous victories. We need to make lots of babies auftzuluchis – to spite Hitler – just to dance on his grave. Not seeing my Judaism through Dan's religious lens – or at least not with his sense of certainty and profound faith – for me being Jewish is, indeed, foremost a notion of peoplehood.

"Stating that by choosing not to have kids you're not contributing to the gene pool – to me, that's a very non-Jewish approach. Or, at least, not a specifically Jewish approach," Dan added. Dan's point is that procreation is the first imperative for all of humanity, and not exclusive to Judaism.

"All right, then what makes it un-Jewish not to have kids, in your eyes?" I asked.

"I think a very Jewish approach to life is always optimism and the hope of things getting better, whether on a national level – believing in redemption and the Messiah – or, on a personal level, in growth and self-development. Judaism has put an incredibly strong emphasis on hope. Despite all the odds, despite all the tragedies, despite all the difficulties. To say 'look how terrible the world is' and to come to the decision not to have kids – that, to me, is un-Jewish. Looking at the world as a mess and saying I am not going to bring anyone into this is un-Jewish because it denies hope. It denies that things can get better, that you can play a part in their getting better. Whereas, Elliot, your answer has nothing to do with Judaism."■

Pebble-like device goes up against the hackers

DAVID SHAMAH
JERUSALEM

More connected devices are connecting with more databases and sharing more information than ever – and we're just at the beginning of the data-gathering revolution that the Internet of Things will bring us. Unfortunately, according to security experts, Kaspersky Lab, that provides hackers with more opportunities to steal more data, especially from devices that are essentially unprotected.

"The bond of trust between users and their devices can lead them to forget about security," said Victor Yablokov, head of mobile product line at Kaspersky Lab.

"It's hard to imagine that something we carry close to us at all times and turn to for everything could ever become a threat. But it can, and does happen. A digital friend can become a digital frenemy," doing good for us while doing harm at the same time, he said.

"A failure to appreciate the potential risks and to protect our devices and information accordingly could mean the loss of confidential information, money and even our identities. Security is simply not an optional extra."

To the rescue comes an Israeli start-up called Dojo Labs, which, with a stylish stone-like device, will monitor all data sent by anything connected to the Internet – smart TVs, smartphones, smart tablets, smart refrigerators, even smart water faucets – to determine whether they are sending out data in amounts or in ways that do not fit their profile.

Such activity, according to Dojo co-founder and CEO Yosi Atias, could be a signal that a hacker has taken control of a device and is using a device as a way to get into a network and steal sensitive data.

"A hacker isn't necessarily interested in a specific device, like a connected refrigerator," Atias told the Times of Israel. "But they may use it as a gateway to get into a network and steal data from a computer that is on the network, or even activate a camera or microphone and upload the video via their hack."

In other words, a smart TV that a user thinks was turned off could be activated remotely by a hacker who breaks into the network via, for example, a connected weather station that downloads temperature and humidity information from the network, and is connected to a home heating system. If that smart TV is in the bedroom, a hacker could get hold of some very intimate footage by activating a webcam in a smart TV – with the victim clueless until they find out from YouTube that they are the stars of a porno.

Israeli start-up Dojo Labs created this stylish stone-like device.

Smartphones and other connected devices are more a part of life than ever, a study released last week by Kaspersky Lab said. Smart devices "are carried and used everywhere, including at work (52 per cent), in a car (41 per cent), on public transport (39 per cent), in bed (58 per cent) and even in the bathroom (29 per cent)."

Users may be giving strangers access to their private moments

The relationship between users and their digital devices is often closer than between best friends, the report said – because how many people would allow even their closest friends with them into the bathroom?

But by bringing a connected tablet into the bathroom, bedroom, or anywhere else in the house, said Atias, users may be giving complete strangers access to their most private moments.

"Our Dojo device is a local intelligent unit which takes care of threat detection and prevention along side with network management and control," he said. "Dojo constantly analyzes all the network traffic within the home network and enforces the security policy of that specific network, while observing the behaviour of specific connected devices.

"We check not the data itself, but how much of it is sent, where it is sent to, and the metadata on what kind of data is being sent. If your connected refrigerator is sending out video, for example, we detect that and alert you with the Dojo 'stone' glowing in different colours," said Atias, adding that the system also prevents attacks in the first place by monitoring suspicious incoming communication, and stopping it in its tracks.

In addition to checking suspicious behaviour based on a profile of the device, he added, Dojo also compares its behaviour with other ones of the same brand and/or type used by Dojo customers.

"We compare the behaviour of your connected refrigerator, for example, not just based on what it usually does, but on what other connected refrigerators do as well," said Atias. "Thus we can determine whether the security breach is a 'local' one due to a hack attack, or if there is security problem with the specific product that the factory needs to address."

The Dojo, which is priced at around $100, including a year of monitoring service, is set to be released next year. The system includes the Dojo device, a "pebble" that can be moved around the house to detect data leaks from smart devices (the Dojo does its monitoring via Bluetooth). Light rings on the pebble glow when there is activity on your network.

When an alert is issued, it shows up on the Dojo mobile app, allowing users to remotely turn off a device or block its communications. Data about network connectivity is uploaded to Dojo's Intelligence Engine, which detects cyber threats and abnormal behaviour through machine learning and proprietary algorithms, paired with Dojo-Labs' cyber research.

While there are plenty of security solutions for computers, from firewalls to anti-virus programs, the need for those safety measures has not yet filtered down to the makers of smart devices, said Atias. "Many of these devices are made by consumer electronics firms that have not had to contend with cyber-security issues in the past, so it is going to take time for them to get used to this new world."

Until that happens, said Atias, Dojo can be the "adult in the room" that keeps an eye on digital "frenemies. Dojo knows when the TV is still recording your voice even if it's off and when that data is being uploaded to the cloud," he said. "We all lock our front doors and yet our devices are wide open. Our homes contain our most intimate data but the security of these things is an afterthought. We created Dojo as the first technology to help us safeguard our homes." ■

Jewish Quarter of Girona is well preserved neighbourhood

MARILYN LAZAR

Hard to believe it wasn't that long ago that I spent a warm, wonderful week in Spain – including a day on the beach! This morning, as I write this in mid-November, there's frost on the ground at home; and troops on the ground in Paris and Belgium. Most eerily, as I submit this travel tale about the end of Jewish days in a European city, I spot this headline on the front page of the National Post: "3,000 years of history end for Aleppo Jews", detailing the evacuation of its last Jewish family after persevering through increasing hardship, persecution and danger.

In years of day school education, lively discussions around the Shabbat dinner table and ruminations about the circuitous Jewish journey, how did I miss the significance of Girona? This much I can say for sure: on two separate trips to Spain, which included beautiful Malaga and the Costa del Sol, Seville, Grenada, Ronda and Barcelona, my most worthwhile day was the one spent in Girona.

The cab driver drops us at the foot of a street so winding and narrow that we can't see more than a few buildings ahead and certainly can't envision our destination: Museu d'Historia dels Jueus, or the Jewish Museum. However, it's apparent that the car can proceed no further and that the driver is aware of the site and confident of the intersection. So we take our bags and his directions and proceed by foot, the way that Jews first did on this very spot some twelve hundred years ago.

The labyrinth of interconnected streets and winding alleyways that comprise the old Jewish Quarter of Girona is among the best preserved Jewish neighbourhoods in all of Europe. At the top, we enter a building which is unassuming from the outside. But it contains a carefully curated exhibit where contemporary architecture and sculpture offer a modern backdrop to an ancient story.

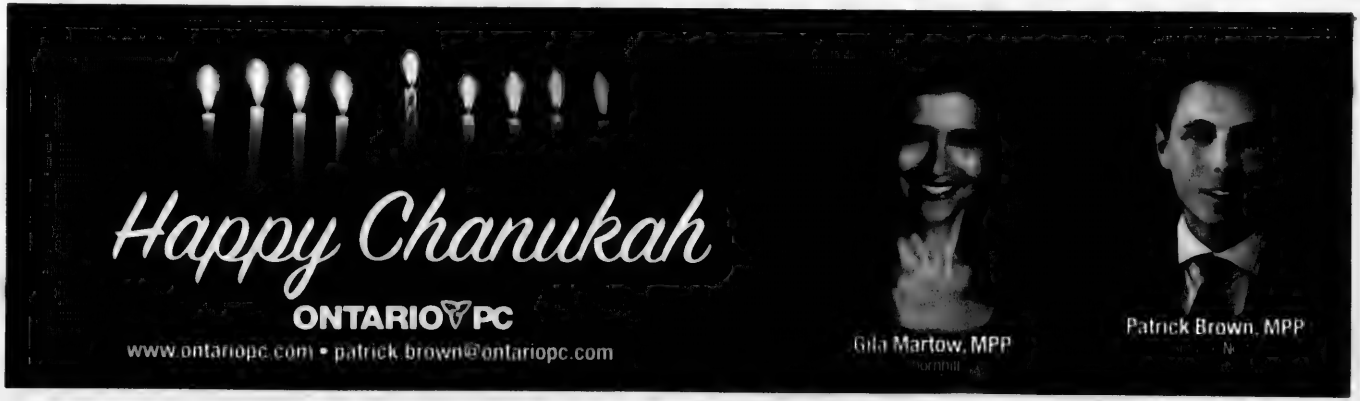
The story of Jews in Girona begins in the late ninth century. Within a hundred years, the community had prospered into an important part of society. However, by the 13th century, Jews were the victims of racism, eventually confined to what became a ghetto and banned from the city beyond. This continued until they were officially expelled from the country in 1492. With heartbreaking and well-documented detail, the museum tells the story of those intervening years, when Jews, with desperation and ingenuity, literally crept between walls and through secret passageways, into each others' homes, taking advantage of the varying levels of their dwellings and the surrounding streets to survive.

The museum is an excellent starting point, a fascinating combination of art, facts and artifacts, and an intersection of history and archeology. Of note, Girona was the birthplace of Nahmanides or Ramban, who spent most of his life there before departing for Israel. He practised medicine, studied philosophy and Bible and furthered the development of the Kabbalah. Allocate at least an hour to look at the exhibits and watch the films.

But you must also allocate at least two hours to walk around the old city and I recommend booking a private guide to accompany you. This experience is not to be missed and impossible to fully appreciate without a guide. Our guide Anna, a Buddhist married to a Christian, showed almost more reverence for the minutest of details of Jewish history which she uncovered for us than for the soaring spires of the Gothic churches we passed. She pointed out new condominiums built with old stones where a groove indicated that a mezuzah once nestled. Anna was knowledgeable about everything from cypress trees to the Cathedral, from the medieval walls to the mikvah, the Arab baths to the best spot for lunch.

Guides can be arranged in advance through the tourist office. Do this to maximize your time and also to co-ordinate with the hours of operation at the Jewish Museum, which vary from day to day. There is a 39-minute express train between Barcelona and Girona. The train is directly accessible from the subway so it makes for an easy day trip. Alternatively, there is good accommodation available in Girona, some very close to the old quarters. Or stay in the surrounding countryside; rustic Bordils for example, is about 10 kilometres northeast. If you drive, enjoy beautiful bonus views of the coast en route.

The town of Pubol, just northwest of Girona, boasts Casa-Museu Castell Gala Dali, a museum which was once a medieval castle, dedicated to surreal painter Salvador Dali and Gala, his wife and lifelong muse. ■



Canadian alumni president shares Brandeis message

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Brandeis University has a new alumni president – and for the first time, it's a Canadian. Mark Surchin was selected in June to represent over 45,000 alumni. As president, Surchin plans to share the Brandeis message in Canada as well as provide even more alumni services.

The Boston-area school changed the course of his life, Surchin says. Growing up in Montreal, he left for Brandeis in 1974, rather than attending CEGEP at home. He probably would have studied medicine in Montreal, but his years at Brandeis – he graduated in 1974 with a degree in politics – steered him into law instead.

Surchin believes that Brandeis offers something other universities do not: a major research university where undergraduates routinely assist professors, within a non-sectarian Jewish environment.

At Brandeis, Surchin says, he broke away from the rote memorization and multiple-choice tests he'd known in high school to explore major ideas and issues. "It's the bedrock of my education and my intellectual development."

His senior honours thesis explored the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. "It wasn't memorization, I don't think I ever did a multiple choice test there… It was about anticipating what people who might disagree would say, expressing my views in an intellectually coherent way."

"Once I did that, I found law school kind of easy. I felt very prepared to study the law."

He says most people have one of two misconceptions about Brandeis: "One is that it's too Jewish; the other is that it's not Jewish enough."

"It's not like Yeshiva University, which started as a yeshiva and combines study of Torah with academic and secular pursuits," Surchin says.

Founded by the Jewish community, Brandeis was open to all students. The school was named for Louis Brandeis, the first Jewish justice of the U.S. supreme court, who championed social justice.

"You can study Jewish studies, there's a very vibrant Jewish life on campus," Surchin says. "But it's not a Jewish university per se. It's a world-class place that combines big with small, Judaism with diversity and academic rigour."

> It's a world-class place that combines big with small, Judaism with diversity and academic rigour.

Jewish life at Brandeis includes Hillel, theatre and Shabbat dinners. "There's a break the fast event on the big lawn after Yom Kippur… You're not going to get that at McGill. The academic calendar is the Jewish calendar."

Compared to other prestigious U.S. private universities, Brandeis faces unique challenges. "Because the school is so young…, we don't have 300 years of alumni history."

Where some schools might have long-standing scholarship endowments, invested over hundreds of years, Brandeis has had to be more creative in funding the next generation. "Brandeis has always had big dreams but… hasn't had the financial resources… We're getting there." About one-third of students now receive some sort of financial aid, says Surchin.

He and other Canadian alumni have put together a six-figure scholarship fund specifically for Canadian students. "We're aware that it's more expensive than a Canadian public university," Surchin says. Though other financial aid is available through the school, this scholarship could "make the difference between a student who's accepted being able to go or not being able to go."

The school's early growth was meteoric, Surchin says. "It went from a school that didn't exist to an elite school rather quickly," hosting prominent lecturers and receiving major accreditations and accolades.

Today, that growth includes a burgeoning cadre of international students from China, India, Korea and other distant countries, drawn to the school's reputation for academic excellence and serious research. And at a time when the climate on other U.S. and Canadian campuses has become increasingly anti-Israel, Brandeis is also a safe haven, he says.

"At some schools, students who are proudly Zionistic feel uncomfortable. That will never be true at Brandeis… Those things are not under attack there." ■

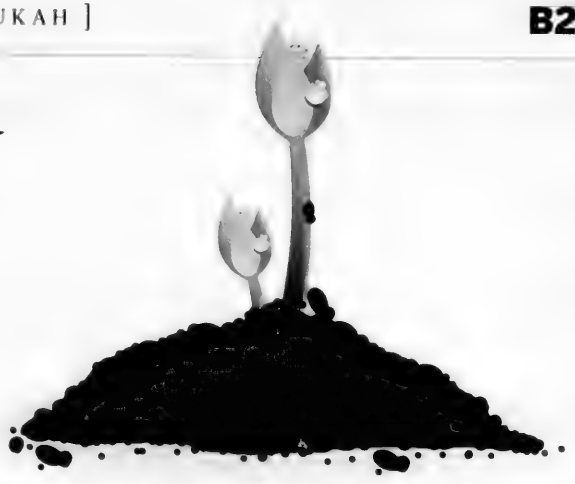
Galilee's 10,000 old beans are a taste of Stone Age innovation



ILAN BEN ZION
JERUSALEM

Next time you dip into some hummus with fava beans in the Galilee, be sure to thank its Neolithic inhabitants.

Researchers at the Weizmann Institute and the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) recently discovered the oldest known domesticated fava beans – about 10,200 years old – in the Galilee, pointing to a Neolithic diet rich in protein-rich legumes.

The study, published in Nature in October, examined the remains of hundreds of fava beans found at Ahihud, Nahal Zippori and Yiftah'el, three Neolithic sites in the Lower Galilee. It determined that domestication of the fava bean, today a major food source worldwide, must have taken place as early as the 11th millennium BCE.

Fava beans remain a major element in cuisines worldwide, the Middle East no exception. Study authors Valentina Caracuta, Omry Barzilai, Hamudi Khalaily, Ianir Milevski, Yitzhak Paz, Jacob Vardi, Lior Regev, and Elisabetta Boaretto point out that the humble fava bean is "the third most important feed grain legume after soybean and pea."

Stewed fava beans, known locally by the Arabic term ful, is a popular topping for hummus, the chickpea puree both Israelis and Palestinians are crazy about.

Moreover, the presence of a large quantity of seeds at the ancient sites points to agricultural planning and social cohesion. Storage of seeds selected for their thinner coats, allowing them to germinate quickly, reinforces the idea they were "used to ensure reliable harvesting, resulting in the build-up of characteristic domestication traits," the writers said.

The uniformity in the size of the 469 seeds studied points to sophisticated organization and deliberation, by which the early farmers harvested the seeds once they matured. Smaller seeds were selected for their ability to cope with drier conditions, and cultivation of legumes 10,000 years ago was possible "due to the ability of the local farmers to select seeds able to germinate under dryer conditions," the authors said.

In short, Neolithic Galileans were practising the long process of plant domestication.

Domestication of grains began in the Fertile Crescent, of which modern Israel constitutes the western flank, around 12,000 years ago, long before the emergence of cultivated legumes such as fava beans. Discovery of great quantities of peas, fava beans, chickpeas and lentils at these Neolithic sites point to their prominence in the diet of early sedentary peoples in the Lower Galilee, and their importance in reducing the risk of famine.

"Identifying the first places where the domestication of species of plants, which today constitute an indivisible part of our diet, is of great importance for research," the IAA quoted the researchers saying in a Hebrew statement. "Despite the dietary importance of grains to this day, apparently in the area we investigated – west of the Jordan River – they actually first domesticated legumes, which are rich in flavour and protein.

"Today it's clear that the area of the modern Galilee was the principle producer of legumes in the prehistoric era," they said. ■

On behalf of the Ontario Liberal Caucus, best wishes to the community.

Happy Hanukkah!

Did Technion students discover cure for baldness?

SIMONA WINEGLASS

When 25-year-old Technion student Alexey Tomsov needed to come up with a project for the prestigious iGEM synthetic biology competition, he decided to untangle a problem close to home.

"My dad is bald, and I noticed my own hair is starting to thin," said the recent graduate in biotechnology and food engineering. "I thought, 'What can I do about this?'"

Tomsov looked at the products on the market and felt that none met his needs. A drug called Finasteride reduces hair loss but can cause serious sexual side effects. Other solutions are still in the research stages. Tomsov wanted to develop a topical solution that stops hair loss without affecting the rest of the patient's body.

Male pattern baldness, also known as androgenetic alopecia, affects up to 70 per cent of men and is believed to be caused by a derivative of testosterone called dihydrotestosterone (DHT). Tomsov and his team genetically engineered bacillus subtilis, a bacterium found naturally on the scalp, to secrete an enzyme that breaks down DHT. They also genetically engineered E.coli to enable the enzymatic reaction to take place. Using a comb, the two genetically engineered bacteria can be combined, causing a reaction that breaks down DHT on the scalp.

The Technion iGEM team.

The Technion iGEM team traveled to Massachusetts in September for the 2015 international iGEM synthetic biology competition, where they competed with 259 undergraduate and high school teams from around the world. The team won an iGEM 2015 Jamboree gold medal and first-place prize for Best New Application.

Tomsov and his team of nine other students, Yael Annis, Tal Ofek, Roni Cohen, Adi Yannai, Ruth Veksler, Liron Abrahami, Ma'ayan Lufton, Nitzan Shmuel and Sagi Sheinkman, won't have to search for jobs after graduation.

They have received an undisclosed amount of funding and assistance from the Technion to patent their technology and turn it into a startup.

"We still have more experiments to do before we can receive approval for human trials. We can't say at this stage how effective our product is or any questions regarding the stages of baldness it will cure."

But if successful, will the Technion students have discovered a cure for human baldness?

"This is a big statement," says Tomsov, "but yes, let's hope so."

If so, it would be quite a breakthrough. Entire movie plots, like that of the 2009 thriller Duplicity, have revolved around the potential discovery of a cure for baldness. Tomsov says he expects the product will more likely help people who are just beginning to go bald rather than people who have been bald for many years.

"When the hair follicle deteriorates and shuts down there's nothing we can do. When a person has been bald for 10 years I'm not sure there's a solution on the market aside from surgery."

If readers want to be part of the clinical trials, they can contact the team through its Facebook page and will be notified if and when these trials begin.

As part of their market research, the Technion team surveyed men and women about their perceptions of baldness. The results among women were inconclusive, but the Technion students did find that a large percentage of men, especially young men, find the prospect of losing their hair upsetting.

Asked why, Tomsov replies, "it has something to do with their sense of pride, but we don't have an answer. [Psychology] is not our field of study."

Tomsov says that all 10 members of the team are enormously proud of their accomplishment in the competition as well as the "pride we brought to Israel."

Does this mean that Israel will provide the world's answer to baldness and that boycotters of the country could find themselves hirsutely challenged?

Tomsov laughs. "Let's hope we have peace by then." ■

Eight ways to celebrate Chanukah without gifts

MAAYAN JAFFE
JNS.ORG

Despite Chanukah being one of the few Jewish holidays not mentioned in the Torah, it gets a lot of play – pun intended.

Shmuel Arnold of Baltimore recalls that when he was growing up in a secular Jewish household, his parents made an extra effort to give Chanukah gifts every night. Sometimes they needed to get creative, like wrapping socks or delivering a gift from an extended family member.

Without even a rendition of Rock of Ages (Maoz Tzur) around the Chanukah menorah, Arnold says the holiday had one meaning: presents. Today, however, married with three children ranging in age from nine to 18, Arnold, like many other parents, tries to infuse more meaning into the Festival of Lights.

With eight days of Chanukah coming up, here are eight ways to celebrate the holiday that don't involve gifts:

Chanukah Crafts

Every year, children learn how to light the candles and about the miracle of the Maccabees in school or Hebrew school. They also make a token Chanukah menorah (or chanukiyah) – likely out of clay, nuts and bolts. Fun and creative activities can help Chanukah come alive at home, too. Pinterest has a colourful variety of Chanukah crafts that work for children ranging from toddlers to high schoolers.

A favourite in my house is the Chanukah handprint. Children dip their palms into a bowl of fabric paint and stamp it on a sweatshirt (it works on paper, too, but a sweatshirt is more practical). Then they dip each of their fingers into paint to create finger candles. Finally, they take their thumb and stamp it in the middle—the shamash (worker candle). Add a flame to each candle, and you're done!

My younger kids love the feel of the gushy paint and often use a different colour for every finger candle. My oldest daughter is careful to ensure her print looks authentic. She uses the same colour for the palm and the fingers and then adds perfect yellow or orange ovals on top.

Chanukah Party

It might not seem so original, but Chanukah is great time for a party. Unlike other Jewish holidays that involve extra time in synagogue, or for Orthodox Jews might preclude playing music or driving, Chanukah is eight days (except for a regularly observed Shabbat) of unabashed fun.

Birthday in a Box offers traditional Chanukah party tips, as well as some fun and quirky new spins on Chanukah decorations, food and favours.

Chanukiyah Tour

If you live in a "Jewish area," where lots of families celebrate the holiday, Arnold suggests taking a "chanukiayh tour." He says that in Baltimore or Israel (where he used to live), one can walk around the streets and see everyone's lights in the windows.

"It's amazing… Being a Yid is something you don't have to hide anymore.

Talk to your kids about the miracle of Chanukah

When my father was growing up, he used to get beaten up for being Jewish, and he learned to place the menorah on the table, somewhere hidden inside the house," says Arnold. "When we light, we make a big deal to put it in the window…and help people remember that you can be proud to be a Jew."

Dreidel Tournament

You have a little dreidel – so use it! Pull the neighbours, young and old, together for a dreidel tournament. Break into teams of three and four and get spinning. We use candy as prizes. (It's best to use something wrapped since it will be touched by lots of little hands.)

You can purchase dreidels in bulk from Judaica.com, or, often, at your local synagogue's gift shop. It adds to the excitement when you have dreidels of various sizes and colours.

If you're particularly serious about dreidel-playing, I found a website for a "Chai stakes" dreidel tournament that breaks down the "official" rules and regulations for "World Series Dreidel." In my house, however, we seem to do better when the children are free to cry over spinning too many Hebrew-letter shins (put two antes in the centre), and the prize is Hershey's candy kisses.

Talk About the Miracle

As Arnold's children have gotten older, he uses the 30 minutes required to sit around the Chanukah candles as a way to discuss the miracles of the holiday and some of its more esoteric significance.

"When HaShem created the world there were no stars or planets. The or – the light – was a non-physical or. That or, the light of God, is what the Yevanim (Greeks) were trying to knock out of the world," Arnold explains. "I tell my children that we can use HaShem's light like a soldier uses night vision goggles… to see His hidden miracles, to appreciate the spiritual light."

Shop – For Someone in Need

Rebecca Katz of Overland Park, Kan., remembers that as a child, she and her family would work with a local charity to receive the names of local families in need – Jewish and non-Jewish. Then, she and her siblings would be given those families' holiday wish lists and go shopping for them (instead of for themselves). Once the gifts were purchased, they would hand wrap them and deliver them in person.

"I remember one year, we got to this family, went upstairs and they had a tree, but it was completely empty underneath," Katz says. "We put all the gifts there and it was so unexpected. The children were so happy."

Re-enact the Chanukah Story

Younger children can enjoy a game of dress-up. If you have enough kids or can get classmates involved, a re-enactment of the Chanukah story can add to the spirit of the eight days. Kids enjoy dressing up in togas (just use some old sheets) and wielding plastic swords and shields. To make it easier, use a book, such as The Story of Chanukah by Norma Simon, as a guide.

If your own children don't want to dress up and tell the Chanukah story, Chabad.org has a large collection of Chanukah videos that both educate and entertain.

Sufganiyot

Chanukah is sweeter and oily-finger-lickin' good with homemade sufganiyot (deep-fried jelly doughnuts). Miriam Litt of Modi'in, Israel, recalls how she used to spend hours in the kitchen baking Chanukah doughnuts.

"I used real whipping cream and added pudding and then I would squirt it inside," she says.

Sometimes, she would get creative by mixing up the creamy flavours.

"I did my thing, and the kids – they sure liked eating it," Miriam says with a laugh. ■

YOUNG DRIVERS

An eight-year-old Indiana Jones

CJN STAFF

An eight-year-old Israeli boy on a day trip with his family in the Beit Shemesh area accidentally made an important archeological discovery, the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) announced last month.

Itai Halpern of Pardesiya was granted a certificate of honour after discovering the head of a statue from the First Temple period and turning it over to Antiquities Authorities' officials. Halpern's school class was also invited to take part in an archaeological dig.

Halpern was hiking with his family when he picked up a round object from the ground. He soon realized that the ceramic object was the head of a sculpture.

The family quickly reported their discovery to the Antiquities Authority. Archaeologist Alexander Glick met the family and informed them that they had made a discovery of historical significance. Itai told Glick that he had recently seen an Indiana Jones movie and wanted to be like him when he grows up. Finding the statue was a dream come true for Itai.

Alon de Groot, an IAA expert on the Iron Age, identified the finding as the head of a sculpture of a fertility goddess.

"Figurines of this kind, depicting naked women which symbolize fertility, were common in the homes of residents of the Kingdom of Judah from the eighth century BCE until the destruction of the Kingdom by the Babylonians in the days of Zedekiah [586 BCE]," he said.

De Groot added that "these figurines serve in our research as a marker for the area controlled by the Kingdom of Judah."

Archeologist Ana Irich said that the area of Beit Shemesh where the figurine was discovered was a known residential area in the First Temple period. "Beit Shemesh is mentioned as a city in the area of the Tribe of Judah." ■

Could the next unmanned mission to the moon be Israeli?

MICHAEL FRIEDSON
JERUSALEM

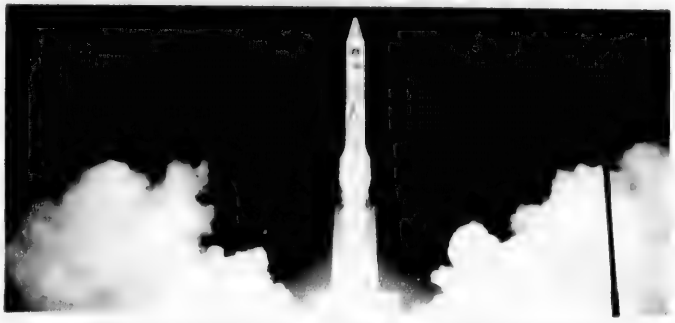
Israel is known globally as a high-tech nation, producing some of the most up to date commercial utilities in a variety of fields. At the same time, it is a leading weapons exporter, researching and constructing its own military capabilities, including a number of missile systems.

What is less well known is that these two characteristics have combined to make Israel the smallest member of a very special club of nations – the potential space travelling states.

Today there are only two countries in the world that have the infrastructure to put astronauts into space: China and Russia. The United States, the first nation to put a man on the moon, lost its capability in 2011 though it has plans to regain the ability. But there is a small club of nine additional states that have the technology to independently launch unmanned missions into space.

Israel currently has 15 civilian satellites orbiting the earth. Two-thirds are observation devices, and the remainder are communications platforms. The Jewish state specializes in "lightweight high-performance satellites" carrying devices that can compete with American satellites' capacity ion image resolution while weighing one-tenth the weight, Yitzhak Ben-Israel, chair of the Israeli Space Agency at the Ministry of Science, told the Media Line.

As with many of Israel's high-tech enterprises, the civilian space industry benefits from the country's military efforts. Both in terms of human capital – knowledge and expertise – and in infrastructure and investment, the Israel Space Agency profits from military programs that came before it, Ben-Israel said. "Although they are two different entities, the Israeli space industry and the Ministry of Defence, we don't have two separate production lines."



The Israeli military spy satellite Ofek 10 is seen being launched in April 2014 from the Palmachim army base, outside of Tel Aviv. FLASH90 PHOTO

It is notable that the Israeli space rocket, the Shavit (Hebrew for comet), is built from technologies believed to be based on the Jericho II ballistic missile.

Although Israel is not part of efforts to conduct manned space operations, it is keen to contribute to the exploration of the solar system.

"Human landings are too big for us. We have from time to time had human missions with the U.S.A. and we would like to have more in the future," Ben-Israel said, adding that negotiations are taking place with NASA to facilitate this. The Curiosity rover – currently trundling across the surface of Mars – was built with subsystems developed and constructed in Israel, Ben-Israel said. An idiosyncrasy of Israel's indigenous launch program is that rockets taking off from Palmachim Air Force Base do so in a westward direction, travelling out over the Mediterranean Sea. This removes the danger of debris falling on populated areas and removes the necessity for the Shavit to travel over any of Israel's neighbours. As the Earth spins on its axis in an eastwardly direction, this means that the rocket has to work harder to get into orbit, resulting in a 30 per cent reduction in payload-lift capacity.

This will not be a problem for SpaceIL, Israel's next venture into space, as the non-governmental program has secured a lift skyward from a launch site in the United States.

SpaceIL is one of 15 organizations competing in the Google Lunar X Prize competition, a contest to place a vehicle on the moon by 2017. SpaceIL became the first of the groups to secure a launch contract – with SpaceX, a commercial transport service that conducts logistics runs into orbit for NASA.

This means there is a very real possibility that the next mission to the moon might be Israeli, albeit not state-owned.

The industry appears to be moving in the direction of private companies and non-profit organizations and away from the previously state-dominated model for space exploration, Deganit Paikowsky, a senior researcher at the Yuval Neeman Workshop for Science, Technology and Security, at Tel Aviv University, told the Media Line.

This new direction is one in which Israel, the "startup nation" with an abundance of entrepreneurial spirit, could do well, Paikowsky said.

In Israel, the space industry and the startup sectors are closely connected, she explained, saying that Israel's space capability is tied into the startup nation idea, and they feed one another.

However, regarding the next big prize, getting astronauts to Mars, commercialization of the efforts might not bring the next "giant leap" any nearer, Paikowsky cautioned. "I'm not sure if it will shorten the duration of time for that." ■

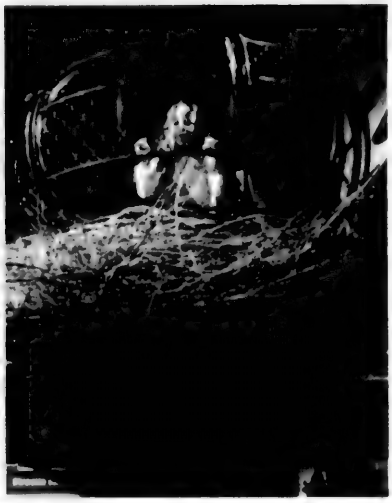
LAUREN KRAMER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN



The Old State Capitol Building was built in 1892 and has been home to the office of the Superintendent of Public Instruction since 1906. At the Pacific Northwest-themed Hands On Children's Museum, kids can play in a reconstructed bald eagle's nest. LAUREN KRAMER PHOTOS

Most small Jewish communities decrease in size over the summer, but not Olympia, Wash. The city's Jewish population swells by up to 600 as youth from all over the Pacific Northwest and as far afield as Las Vegas converge by bus and plane on Camp Solomon Schechter, a Jewish camp founded 60 years ago.

Located on 180 lush acres filled with trails, wetlands and towering maple forests, Camp Schechter boasts a trout-filled lake, hot water showers and heated dormitories. It's a version of "roughing it" specially designed for Jewish kids!

I ventured to Olympia, a five-hour drive from Vancouver, on a stormy, grey Friday in November, looking for a weekend away from home. Camp Schechter's sunny season was well behind us, and any leisure activities were going to be determinedly indoors. Still, I witnessed a city of 48,000 with a lively, active Jewish community, two synagogues and a Chabad presence.

My daughter Maya and I stayed in the downtown core and were thrilled to attend Friday night services at Temple Beth Hatfiloh, a Reconstructionist synagogue housed in a beautiful building on 8th Avenue downtown. The rabbi was out of town, and the service, led by lay leaders and attended by locals with a good turnout of comparative religions students, was filled with song.

Afterward, at the Oneg in the dining area, I learned that the synagogue building had once been home to the Church of Christian Science and was purchased, renovated and converted into a synagogue 12 years ago. Walk into the sanctuary, with its high ceilings, elegant Aron Kodesh and stained glass windows, and you'd never know it started its life in another of the world's great religions.

Olympia is a stately, historic city filled with soaring examples of Greco-Roman architecture and irresistibly browsable book shops, galleries and boutiques. Washington's version of Victoria, it spreads in an elegant square on either side of Budd Inlet, its beautiful state buildings on a bluff over the ocean and its 278-foot capitol dome visible from most everywhere. There are daily tours of the capitol dome, and we gladly joined one led by Ed Smith, a history teacher whose father had once served in the legislature. He primed our small group on the ornate granite, European marble, carved masonry and more than 300 Tiffany lights and chandeliers that decorate the palatial interior. It's an impressive place and one that certainly lends gravity to Washington's history and the business of lawmaking.

It was less than fascinating for a six-year-old, though, which is why our next stop was the very antidote: the Hands On Children's Museum of Olympia. These days, almost every city has a generic children's museum – but this one is far from generic.

"Our goal was to only feature exhibits from the Pacific Northwest, things children might see in their own backyards," said Jillian Henze, communications manager for the 28,000-square-foot museum.

Best suited to the three-to-eight-year-old crowd, this innovative space delves into the farm-to-fork eating experience, the Puget Sound waterway, the forest and the life cycle of water. Children learn how currents flow, how large a bald eagle's nest really is, how water and wind pressure work, how to build a house and where food comes from. My daughter Maya had to be dragged out of the museum at closing time.

We left Olympia the next day for Grand Mound, 20 minutes away and home to Great Wolf Lodge, Washington's equivalent to Disneyland. The massive indoor waterpark is a kids' paradise, with waterslides that sweep riders on circuitous watery journeys, a large wave pool and two well-designed water play structures – one for toddlers and the other for kids seven and younger.

There's easily enough entertainment in the waterpark alone for a half-day. But once you dry off, there's more to do in the rest of the resort. Kids were running around with wands, pointing them at treasure chests and learning their way around a game that lasts four-to-six hours and occupies them for the duration of their stay. Great Wolf is a hedonistic kids' experience from which parents emerge looking flushed and exhausted from the combination of heat, chlorine and noise. By contrast, their kids come out starry-eyed and determined to return.

We took the long road back to Olympia on Old Highway 99 to get a glimpse of Tenino, a sleepy city with a fascinating history. I was anxious to learn about Tenino's sandstone legacy, which dates back to 1888 with the discovery of a large deposit of sandstone – a valuable commodity in the pre-concrete era.

In the four decades that followed, Tenino quarries supplied sandstone for buildings in San Francisco and Vancouver, among others. The quarries closed in the late 1920s but one of them, the Tenino Stone Company Quarry, was deliberately flooded with water from natural springs by the City of Tenino. It became a 95-foot-deep swimming pool with beautiful, terraced walls that bear evidence of its history.

Unfortunately, most of that history remained an enigma because the doors of the Tenino Depot Museum, usually open on the weekends, were shuttered when we were in town. That's the problem with sleepy cities, particularly in November. They tend to go into a long hibernation. ■

Gonna light this candle without a flame

VIVA SARAH PRES
JERUSALEM

While the Swedish band NoNoNo sang Fire without a Flame, Israel's Candle Touch is proving you can light a flame without fire.

The app-enabled Candle Touch is a real wax-scented candle that can be controlled by any smart IOS or Android device loaded with the app.

The user simply places a Candle Touch wax block – available in vanilla, lavender, melon, lemongrass, amber and patchouli scents – in the black or white clean-design case, and clicks on the app to light a real flame via Bluetooth. You can light any number of candles at once.

The device is charged through a USB cable and each 10x11x10-centimetre candle gives 55 to 70 hours of burning time. Extinguish the flame instantly through a command, by setting a timer, by blowing air into the smartphone's speaker or by leaving the 30-foot Bluetooth communication range.

The product, which is not yet on sale, was recently introduced at Web Summit 2015 in Dublin, in its showcase of international early startups. Candle Touch was chosen by the Irish Times as one of the five rising stars among 2,400 startups at the convention. CEO and cofounder Moshe Lev tells ISRAEL21c.

The Candle Touch is a real wax-scented candle that can be controlled by a phone.

"The crowd and journalists were very excited about our product," says Lev. "Candles are one of the oldest inventions in history that haven't changed at all over the course of thousands of years... It's time to integrate the authenticity of the candle with today's world technological progress to get a new safe, easy to use and technologically advanced candle."

> The Candle Touch prevents lives and homes being destroyed due to candles left unattended.

The four-person Candle Touch team from Rishon LeZion spent two years creating this smart, patent-pending technology for everything from home to wedding décor.

It adds a welcome layer of safety to the ambiance of candles. Statistics provided by Fire Prevention Canada show that fire kills on average eight people a week in Canada, and residential fires account for 73 per cent of these fatalities.

"The Candle Touch prevents lives and homes being destroyed due to candles left unattended by detecting when a person falls asleep or leaves the house and extinguishing the candle when that happens," says Lev.

The Candle Touch team is now preparing a Kickstarter crowdfunding campaign to raise financing, and will also announce the price of the new candle. ■

On Chanukah, just let the lights go out

EDMON J. RODMAN
JTA, LOS ANGELES

There's a popular Chanukah song recorded by Peter, Paul and Mary, Light One Candle. Its chorus insists we "don't let the light go out" – but I've been thinking that maybe we should.

Not that I want to leave all those Maccabee children stumbling in the dark on cold December nights, or leave them without an image of light and hope to plug into. But, sometimes, letting the light go out kindles an altogether different kind of luminance in which to examine the moments of our lives that we hold dear.

So my urging that we watch the light go out is a literal one – while we love to bask in the glow of our menorahs, what is really illuminating is watching the candles go out. Watching them burn out, one by one, makes me think about how remarkable it is to kindle light.

In a time when LED menorah decorations are plentiful and one can use an app to light the "candles" on their smartphone, please give me candles blue, yellow, red and white. The fire of my imagination lights up as their wicks burn down.

One Chanukah – after our family menorah was lit, the blessings chanted, the songs sung, the gifts opened – everyone trudged upstairs to watch TV. I stayed downstairs alone and watched the menorah burn low. Though the communal and commercial push on Chanukah is toward shopping-mall candlelightings, house parties and group crafts for kids, I wanted to see if the holiday could also be quiet and contemplative.

> The fire of my imagination lights up as their wicks burn down.

I'm not talking "silent night" here – that's that other holiday – but a real chance to take in the play of shadow and light and contemplate what Chanukah means.

The Jewish life cycle, from bris or baby naming to funeral and shivah, leaves little time for singular reflection. Judaism calls for a group, a minyan, to experience much of what it offers. Even on Yom Kippur, we do not confess our sins alone, but together as community.

So I admit that sitting alone and watching the candles burn down seemed a little downbeat and weird at first.

But the traditional prayer Hanerot Halalu (These Lights) – which reminds us, as we look upon the candles, to thank and praise God "for the wondrous miracle of our deliverance" – helped me view this solo experience in a different, well, light. While watching the flames, I finally connected with the words of the prayer, realizing that after eight nights of parties and presents (as well as latkes, sufganiyot and black cherry soda), I felt miraculously delivered, like I was a Maccabee who emerged victorious from the combat zones of holiday shopping.

Casting a shadow on my reverie, however, was the Chanukah Meditation in my Sim Shalom prayer book. It suggested that "in the last glimmer of spiralling flame," I should be able to see the spark of "Maccabees, martyrs, men and women of valour."

Try as I might, staring at the candles burning down, all I could make out were colorful driblets of wax.

I wondered: was there some other message?

Flames reach out at us from most every part of Judaism. Looking into our menorahs, they can draw us into a light of memory, like a yahrzeit candle lit at the anniversary of a loved one's death. Flames also light us up with celebration, such as illuminating the candles of Shabbat or setting bonfires on Lag b'Omer.

In the window of my dining room, another candle connection was burning up right before me. The shamash, the candle used to light all the others on the menorah, was burning out first, making me ask: who had been my shamash? Taking bows in the candlelight were a basketball coach, a college lecturer, the rabbi where I grew up, a kid from Scouts and, to a well-earned round of applause, my parents. In turn, they had showed me how to move my feet, write, parse Torah commentary, cook and strive toward menschhood.

In the Sefer Yetzirah, the Book of Creation, the earliest foundation text of Kabbalah, there is a passage about a "flame in a burning coal." Aryeh Kaplan, an Orthodox rabbi who was known for his knowledge of physics and Kabbalah, wrote that it can be used as a meditation. In his book Sefer Yetzirah: The Book of Creation in Theory and Practice, various parts of the flame correspond to the Sephirot, or attributes through which Ein Sof — "the infinite" — is revealed.

In Rabbi Kaplan's meditation, the wick represents the physical world; the blue flame closest to the wick is "the counterpart of Malchut," or Kingdom, which is our perceptions of God's actions and attributes. Surrounding this is the bright yellow flame, which corresponds to the Sephirot of Kindness, Strength, Beauty, Victory, Splendour and Foundation.

The hottest part, the white flame, is the Sephira of Binah, or understanding, with the "light radiating from the candle," corresponding to Chochmah, or wisdom.

"The only way in which the flame can rise is for all of these parts to come together," Rabbi Kaplan wrote.

And rise they did, growing brighter first, and then sputtering out, one by one, but leaving me with a glow. ■

From tragedy to celebration

VIVA PRESS
ISRAEL 21C

Photos and videos of newlyweds Sarah-Tehiya Litman and Ariel Beigel celebrating their wedding in Jerusalem continue to move the world to tears. Litman's father and brother were murdered in a Nov. 13 terrorist shooting attack – just three days before the planned nuptials.

Litman and Beigel had to postpone their Nov. 16 wedding so that Litman could sit shivah for her father, Yaakov, and her 18-year-old brother, Netanel.

When they announced the new Nov. 26 date for their celebration, they said they hoped "multitudes will come to make us happy."

And that's exactly what happened.

Sara Netanyahu, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's wife, came to offer her best wishes. So did hundreds of other well-wishers who had seen the couple's open invitation on social media that included the verse from the Prophet Micah: "Do not rejoice over me, my enemy, for I have fallen but I have gotten up."

Jewish communities from Australia to Canada, and Chabad Houses from across the globe, sent representatives to the open wedding.

"We join in the deep resolve of this couple that terror not define our lives, and that goodness and kindness and joy fight the wave of darkness and despair that seems so overwhelming," said Rabbi Aaron Slonim, executive director of the Rohr Chabad Center for Jewish Student Life at the State University of New York at Binghamton.

The wedding took place at the International Convention Center in Jerusalem. ■

Medical clowns' work steeped in smiles and research

JEFFREY F. BARKEN

"You treat a disease, you win, you lose. You treat a person, I guarantee you, you'll win, no matter what the outcome," the late actor Robin Williams says in the 1998 film Patch Adams, which shed light on the life of influential physician, social activist, comedian and clown Hunter Doherty Adams.

Today, although doctors can't promise miracles, there is mounting evidence that laughter – applied pragmatically in diverse settings – can heal. And as it turns out, Patch Adams has a Jewish counterpart in the New York City area.

Israeli researchers, led by Dr. Shevach Friedler at the Assaf Harofeh Medical Center's in-vitro fertilization (IVF) unit, published results in 2011 from a study examining the impact of medical clowning on patients struggling to bear children. Women who undergo IVF experience tremendous stress. Partners lament the absence of intimacy during IVF, the procedure remains costly, and perceived infertility brings a heavy emotional toll.

The study tested the hypothesis that stress diminishes the effectiveness of IVF, positing that exposure to medical clowns shortly after an embryo transfer (ET) procedure may reduce the patient's stress level, thereby enabling successful impregnation.

Among 219 patients participating in the study, 110 were in the clown intervention group; the other 109 women were in the control group. Friedler's team observed 16 per cent improvement in the IVF success rate for the women entertained by clowns.

Dr. Neal Goldberg finds such results encouraging. His wife was a pioneer recipient of IVF treatment, and his four children were all the result of successful ET procedures performed when the science was still in its infancy.

"The study coming out of Israel really corroborated my theory, emphasizing that humour can help couples deal with the lack of intimacy," Goldberg told JNS.org.

Goldberg is the founder and executive director of Lev Leytzan (Hebrew for "Heart of a Clown"), an organization based in Lawrence, N.Y., which initiates collaboration between medical professionals and a highly trained troupe of therapeutic clowns. Lev Leytzan brings clowning to hospitals, nursing homes, senior centres, camps for people with special needs, and private homes in the United States and abroad. Since founding the organization in 2003, Goldberg has helped train nearly 1,000 clowns. Many are volunteers as young as 12. Others are paid professionals.

"We're not an entertainment troupe," Goldberg said. "We're trying to create meaningful, creative engagement with people."

Initially, the focus was to "work with Jewish youths in our community and expose them to the greater world at large," he said.

Lev Leytzan began by taking clowns to Israel to help terror victims. The organization later added missions to Europe, where the clowns provide therapy for Holocaust survivors. Now, Goldberg's team is focused on duplicating the success the Israeli IVF study achieved. Likewise, Goldberg is expanding his vision for medical clowning, embracing another ailing community: senior citizens.

Lev Leytzan doctors and clowns recently launched a pilot geriatric patient-focused program called ElderHearts. The stated goal is to provide "Alzheimer's and dementia patients with interactive experiences designed to help them reconnect with the world and alleviate the loneliness and isolation they feel."

Before tackling the most severely affected patients, however, Lev Leytzan is taking a more general approach, assessing the effectiveness of its methodology.

The clowns work in pairs. They enter only with the patient's permission, and they allow the patient or the doctor to lead off. To establish a familiar role, the clowns wear vintage costumes and use props from the 1930s through the 1950s, artifacts that evoke rich memories.

> A spoonful of humour makes the medicine go down.

"We join them in their reality, [utilizing] problem-solving, reminiscence and improvisation," Goldberg said. When "one Alzheimer's patient refused to take her medications," he recounted, offering an example of the clowns in action, "we threw a tea party, began toasting old friends and old times while we carved the cake, and the patient swallowed her pills." Indeed, a spoonful of humour makes the medicine go down.

"Unlike most people in the hospital, we are not bound by time or space or reality," Goldberg said. "We can spend as much time as we like. We talk to the nurses and staff beforehand, find out who has had a rough day and needs cheering."

The medical and psychosocial teams (graduate and doctoral students) at the Margaret Tietz Nursing and Rehabilitation in Jamaica, N.Y., observe the Lev Leytzan clowns and collect data.

ElderHearts may require adjustments in strategy and narrower parameters before an official study like the one conducted in Israel yields meaningful quantitative data. But in the meantime, the program's troupe of students, doctors and volunteers are, at the very least, putting smiles on the faces of senior citizens in need.

Thanks to Lev Leytzan, "I can visit people who are lonely, in pain and extremely vulnerable," says Natan Davidowitz, a 12th-grade student based in West Hempstead, N.Y., and a regular volunteer clown.

Davidowitz says he is enthusiastic about wearing makeup and smiling "shamelessly, [to] make people in hospitals feel like they are important enough for someone to spend time with them in a way that solely focuses on making them happy."

Patch Adams would call that a "win," regardless of the outcome of medical treatment. ■

Christians and Jews trade niceties, and Israel helps ex-president beat cancer

Interfaith warm and fuzzies

It's been an month of breakthroughs for Christian-Jewish relations. On Dec. 3, 25 prominent Orthodox rabbis in Israel, Europe and the United States signed a document published by the Center for Jewish-Christian Understanding and Cooperation in Israel titled "To Do the Will of Our Father in Heaven: Toward a Partnership between Jews and Christians" that calls for "appreciating the religious value of Christianity." Then, on Dec. 10, the Vatican issued a report saying clearly for the first time that Catholics shouldn't work to convert Jews, who can attain salvation in their own faith. It also urged the church to help eliminate anti-Semitism.

Carter has Jewish state on the brain

A U.S. cancer drug that was researched and tested in Israel helped former U.S. president Jimmy Carter beat life-threatening melanoma – an irony flagged on social media because of his criticism of Israel's treatment of Palestinians in recent years. Carter, 91, said Dec. 6 four cancerous lesions on his brain were gone and doctors found no new signs of cancer. He also said he'll keep taking Keytruda, a new immunotherapy drug that helps the immune system stop cancer's spread. It was researched by Jacob Schachter at Sheba Medical Center in Ramat Gan. Bolstering the immune system differs from chemotherapy, which destroys cancerous cells and healthy ones. Experts said it's not clear the drug cured Carter on its own – he also had chemotherapy – and that the cancer has been known to return.

Kaia and clan in happier times. FACEBOOK PHOTO

Maybe she doesn't like Canadians

Veterinary authorities quarantined Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's family dog after she bit an MK at a Chanukah party. The dog, Kaia, was seized Dec. 10 after she bit Sharren Haskel of Likud, Israel's first Canadian-born lawmaker, as well as another person the day before at the prime minister's home. Kaia bit Netanyahu in July, after he adopted her, but wasn't quarantined, though he was given precautionary rabies shots. Described by the family as "kind and friendly," Kaia, who is 10 years old, has bad hearing that makes her startle and sometimes bite when approached from behind. ■

Another look at tuition hikes

Rabbi Jay Kelman writes passionately about school funding ("How to leave a lasting legacy for Jewish education," Nov. 26). The burden on parents is escalating far faster than inflation or rise in earnings. Schemes like Rabbi Kelman's to run down endowment funds or raid retirement nest eggs rely on non-renewable fossil money that, once depleted, is gone forever.

Efforts to gain state support for supplementary needs such as speech therapy ("CIJA renews effort to alleviate school funding squeeze," Nov. 19) can only chip away at the problem, but will not provide any significant relief. These approaches cannot work in the long run, and a more sustainable model must be developed.

It's easy to moan, but what can we, individually and collectively, do? We must begin by recognizing that government funding is not going to be forthcoming in the foreseeable future. We must live within our means.

We need greater transparency from the schools. Many parties have contributed to the agonizing deliberations in these pages regarding the tuition crisis. The schools, however, have been very reticent in explaining how subsidies are calculated, or why huge annual increases are necessary.

Are we supporting bloated non-teaching administrations? How much duplication is there in running independent offices for each school? Are there economies to be had by merging non-teaching operations or by forming a group-purchasing organization to negotiate better deals with suppliers?

We need to develop a spirit of volunteerism that encourages contributions in kind by parents and students. There is a wealth of talent and skills that we can tap to reduce costs, whether it's help at drop-off, security, or professional services. Parents' and grandparents' special expertise or interests must be leveraged to provide enriching experiences in many areas.

Contest in poor taste

I read the report about Miss Holocaust Survivor several times before I actually believed that a story of this type, one that personifies the pinnacle of poor taste, could be found in the paper ("Still beautiful," Dec. 3). Running a beauty contest that capitalizes on the murder of six million innocent victims is something I never dreamt could happen. How about Miss Slave Labour or Mr. Crematorium? Miss Starvation or Miss Yellow Star of David could be some good choices.

Israel and its ties with the EU

It is about time that Israel suspended diplomatic ties with the European Union. Israel, in its unceasing battle with Middle East-based terrorist organizations, has for decades effectively buttressed Europe's back door against these murderous thugs. By failing to support Israel, Europe is now reaping the whirlwind of its cowardly acquiescence to the terrorists, evidently hoping that "by feeding the crocodile it would eat them last." Dinner time is now upon them.

It is also way past time for Israel and all of the other nations of the erstwhile free world to at last cease their memberships in the United Nations, which has long since been hijacked by despotically run, West-hating, terrorism-fomenting, anti-Israel nations. The former should stop their financial contributions to this gang of nations that overtly and unwaveringly pursue their campaigns to undermine and ultimately destroy societies with any semblance of open democracy and human rights. And the United States should summarily boot the UN from its New York location and dispatch it to any one of the rogue countries where it will feel much more at home.

RABBI·2·RABBI

To speak up or stay silent

Judaism has the power to bring a moral voice to any issue , but what are rabbis' parameters for activism, and when should they take a stand from the pulpit?

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER
CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Cutler: Recently, 1,000 American rabbis signed a letter encouraging the U.S. Congress to welcome Syrian refugees to the United States. I often receive solicitations to add my name to petitions on all sorts of issues, ranging from Israel and environment concerns to the death penalty and doctor-assisted death. I imagine that you do as well.

As religious leaders, I believe that it is incumbent upon us to join the public debate and use our moral voices for good. At the same time, such petitions generate concerns. When an issue has a strong partisan quality, is it appropriate to speak up? When should I fear alienating my community? And more broadly, what differentiates a rabbi from a prophet?

Rabbi Scheier: Your questions cut to the core of what it means to be a congregational rabbi in the 21st century. Equal in importance to our engagement with traditional Jewish texts is our engagement with the social and political issues of the day.

Our voices need to be heard when it comes to contemporary issues. The media that our congregants consume doesn't recognize borders – who in our community isn't following the drama of the American election cycle? The issues we discuss should be those that matter to us and inform our Jewish lives, regardless of whether they emerge from events outside our immediate communities.

For an activist rabbi, Judaism has the power to bring a moral voice to any issue, and signing petitions is one way to exercise this voice.

What are your parameters of activism? When do you believe, as a rabbi, it's important to speak up, and when should one remain silent?

Rabbi Cutler: Ecclesiastes teaches that there is "a time to be silent and a time to speak." Unfortunately, Ecclesiastes doesn't give guidance as to which situations merit which response.

Each situation becomes a judgment call. I ask myself: will my voice make a difference? Does engaging this time mean I will be more or less effective the next time? How will I see myself in 20 years if I don't speak up?

Rabbis engage in activism in a variety of ways. One of which is from the pulpit. It can be a powerful venue to encourage a community to engage with an important issue. Some sermons take an issue about which our community is divided, and the role of an (activist) rabbi is to argue for a particular side. In such a situation, the rabbi serves as an authentic Jewish voice – indeed, the voice that a particular community has chosen as its Jewish guide.

Other sermons address issues about which there exists near-communal consensus. In those instances, the rabbi spends less time arguing for a particular side (none of our congregants, for example, are pro-genocide, so rabbis need not spend time arguing why genocide is wrong) and behaves more as a community organizer, encouraging congregants to take action.

My ordination certificate refers to me as a "teacher and preacher." When I speak on issues about which there is not yet consensus, I feel that I am acting more as a teacher. When I address issues about which consensus exists, I feel that my role is closer to that of a preacher.

Rabbi Scheier: I am reminded of the joke about the rabbi who proposes to speak about intermarriage, kashrut or Shabbat. "No," the synagogue president says, "those topics are too contentious and might offend members of the congregation." "What, then, should I discuss?" the rabbi wonders. "Judaism!" responds the president.

I suppose my parameters for discussing "hot-button issues" are a) whether or not I can express a unique approach based on Jewish thought, and b) whether the topic is sufficiently stimulating to the members of my community to foment further conversation.

I have a friend who is a rabbi in the American South. Whenever I share an insight that he likes, he'll tell me, "As we say down here: 'That'll preach!'"

The instinct of knowing what will "preach" is not something to which we can apply objective parameters. It is something, perhaps, that we learn over time, through the inevitable journey of trial and error. As you taught, Ecclesiastes doesn't specify which is a time to speak and which is a time for silence: the application of this verse is our responsibility. ■

My favourite cover stories, part one

One of the best parts of my job is deciding what will grace the cover of The Canadian Jewish News each week. As 2015 draws to a close, here are some of my favourite cover stories from 2015:

1. Say What, Jan. 29: In the wake of the terror attacks on a kosher supermarket and the offices of Charlie Hebdo in Paris, we explored the issue of free speech. Marni Soupcoff, executive director of the Canadian Constitution Foundation, argued that it's best to air, not muzzle, offensive opinions, while B'nai Brith Canada honorary counsel David Matas countered that incitement to hatred is different than blasphemy.

2. Jewish. Black. Canadian, Feb. 26: Moshe Modeira explained what it's like to be Jewish and black in a moving essay. "I had to be given a dual education in the richness of my Jewish heritage alongside reminders of the responsibility that comes with being a black man," he wrote. Elsewhere in that issue, we explored the state of black-Jewish dialogue in Canada, and looked back at the life of Emerson Swift, Canada's first black Jew.

3. Jewish high schools search for answers, March 26: After Ottawa's main community high school announced it would close due to low enrolment, Lila Sarick reported on the state of Jewish high schools across the country. School administrators in Winnipeg, Montreal and Toronto were very open about their struggles, but the news wasn't all bad: in Vancouver, where enrolment has improved over the past four years, King David High School co-president Ari Shiff outlined his strategies for overhauling the local Jewish day school system.

4. A time to be born, a time to die, May 14: Laying out the cold, hard facts, Lauren Kramer, investigated how much a Jewish funeral costs across the country. It turns out the price of a Jewish funeral varies significantly depending on where you live in Canada – in Ottawa, Halifax and Saskatoon, plots range from $2,400 to $12,000, while in Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal the cost of a plot, headstone and burial can run beyond $30,000. The lesson: plan ahead, and start saving now.

5. Priced Out, June 18: The Jewish community is not immune to the effects of the housing bubble, as Sheri Shefa found out. In fact, soaring housing prices are affecting where Jews choose to settle, and in many cases, young families are being forced to live outside the traditional boundaries of the community.

6. When Jews come out of the closet, June 25: To mark Gay Pride Week, Jodie Shupac explored how coming out can place major strains on Jewish families. The issue remains such a taboo in the Jewish community that many are still unwilling to even discuss it. Still, some people are beginning to speak out, and Torontonian Marilyn Lazar is a case in point. She described celebrating Pride with her son: "He not only 'came out,'" she wrote, "he came in – he came into his own. He looked free, confident, happy and himself. What more could a mother ask?"

ESSAY

Resisting Christmas made me the man I am today

Jay Teitel

When my older sister was eight, she was so consumed with envy for the gentile kids in her Grade 3 class who got to celebrate Christmas that my parents, in a moment of weakness, decided to buy her a Christmas present.

The present appeared on the morning of Dec. 25, on the coffee table in our basement rec room, in front of the fireplace. It sat there, a solitary oblong box wrapped in red and green reindeer paper, with no accompanying card or other ID, a gift that dared to be known by context alone. My sister was beside herself with joy. I was six, and even then, it left me cold.

To be a non-Orthodox Jew in the western world is to be intimately acquainted with Christmas envy as practiced by the Chosen People, either as a sufferer or witness. I was a witness. Besides my sister, I saw it in certain friends of mine who actually enjoyed sitting on Santa's lap, and eventually on the faces of my own children when my wife and I took them to the mall to sit on Santa's lap, too (a creepy tradition for any child, it always struck me, let alone a Jewish one). I heard it in the voices of my wife and her sisters when they talked about looking in the holiday windows at various department stores (Yuletime lure seems to be stronger for Jewish females, for some reason), and how much they loved Christmas movies like White Christmas (directed by a Jew, co-written by a Jew, and co-starring a Jew), and Christmas songs like I'm Dreaming of a White Christmas (written by a Jew).

I heard about it from friends with teenage daughters, who, like weird inversions of Marrano Jews secretly observing Passover in 15th-century Spain, were sneaking into their suburban basements to decorate clandestine Christmas trees. Meanwhile, the only Christmas movie scene I wanted to see didn't involve a kid named Ralphie putting his eye out with his new air rifle, but a kid named Susan (one of my sisters-in-law) being told, at the age of eight by the kid who lived across the street, that she had killed Christ. "How could I kill him?" she said. "I don't even know him."

I didn't just resist the siren call of Christmas, I enjoyed resisting it. It felt like a righteous act. This was probably due to a defensive haughtiness I'd affected, from an early age toward anyone who had anything I didn't have or couldn't get. So if the kid down the block got five bucks for allowance instead of the one dollar I got, that kid was fatally spoiled and doomed to be a shiftless failure, while I was being forged by my Spartan parents into a noble paragon of rock-solid values and infinite promise.

If I lived in humble Toronto instead of titanic New York, I would convince myself that Toronto was actually bigger than New York (this is the gospel truth), based on my observation that the Toronto phone book was actually thicker than the Manhattan phone book, the one that guy on To Tell the Truth could rip in half with his bare hands. (I had forgotten that Manhattan was one borough of five, each of which had a phone book as thick as Toronto's.)

And if the vast majority of the world enjoyed a juggernaut of a holiday called Christmas, which came equipped with monumental chutzpah and 7,000 replays of The Little Drummer Boy, then I would simply believe that our holiday, Chanukah, was 7,000 times better. How could it not be? Chanukah was about fighting and miracles and Judah the Maccabee pulling cedar trees out of the ground on horseback. Christmas was about one little Jewish kid's birthday.

The author says he doesn't have the kind of holiday envy that afflicts other Jews.

But there were things even I couldn't deny: the cultural power of the man in red, for one. One Pesach, when the time came for the kids to open the front door to let in the invisible prophet Elijah to drink his wine, the door swung wide to reveal my 11-year-old son, wearing a long cotton-batten beard, carrying a staff, and a sheet draped over his head. The seder crowd went wild, but my first thought was, "Hey, he looks like Santa."

So maybe I will grant Christmas its due. Maybe I will give it that much. But envy of Christmas proportions? Never. My Christmas-sized envy is reserved for larger existential challenges, like, for instance, the two people I spent most of my Chanukahs with while I was growing up, my cousins Jerry and David. Their father, my uncle, ran an ad agency, that counted among its clients the Disney corporation. This meant that at regular intervals, licensed Disney toys would show up at my cousins' house that hadn't made their way to the Canadian market yet, some of which hadn't been released anywhere yet.

Another of my uncle's clients had a connection with the National Hockey League. One year around Chanukah/Christmas time during the early 1960s (when pro sports teams still travelled by rail), Jerry and David got to take the train with the Montreal Canadiens from Toronto part way to Detroit, where the team was playing the Red Wings that night. (My cousin Jerry claims the train ride was his birthday party, not a Chanukah event, and that I was actually there. He remembers my "brush cut." He says he has "evidence," to which I can only reply, "Sure, Jer.")

My cousins personally met Habs legends Doug Harvey and Dickie Moore, and conspired – unsuccessfully – to steal Jacques Plante's goalie mask and throw it off the train. But when they told me about all this later, I just smiled and nodded, buoyed by the certain knowledge that their profligate indulgence was already sealing their destinies, that in adulthood while I was making my mark, they would be out on the street, their wills broken by privilege, homeless ne'er-do-wells, lost souls, bums.

They're both doctors. ■

How bad is it on campus? Depends who you ask

Some students downplay anti-Israel rhetoric, while others bemoan a lack of action on the part of Jewish groups, university administrators

LILA SARICK
lsarick@thecjn.ca

A mural in the York University Student Centre in Toronto is a Rorschach test of sorts for thinking about anti-Semitism on Canadian campuses.

The painting is of a man with rocks in his hands, looking at a house and a bulldozer. On his back is a Palestinian flag with a map of Israel that does not show any borders. Underneath are the words "Peace" and "Justice"

Danielle Shachar, a fourth-year psychology student and active in Israel advocacy, passes by the painting most days and said it leaves her feeling unsafe, especially on a campus where there has been violence against Jewish students in the past.

"If a mural condoning violence against any other nation was hung on campus, it would rightfully be condemned. Only when it pertains to Jews do we see this disturbing double standard," she said.

The painting won second place in a student art contest a few years ago, and despite Jewish students' complaints to the university administration, it still hangs in the student centre.

This painting hangs in York University's student centre, despite repeated complaints from Jewish students.

Marc Newburgh, CEO of Hillel Ontario, has walked by the painting as well. When he's asked about anti-Semitism on Ontario campuses, he's quick to point out while each school has its own concerns, there are no riots, no fires burning. While there may be anti-Israel protests, hateful graffiti and divisive votes for boycotts, sanctions and divestment (BDS), students can generally go to school and get an education in peace.

"Like any other minority on campus, our students certainly, at times, are confronted with issues of discrimination and confronted by those who are not pleased with our support for Israel," he said in an interview.

"I don't think it's out of control, I don't think it's running rampant. Students feel safe. They're having a good experience."

Shachar disagrees. In an essay published in The CJN earlier this year, she described York as "a breeding ground for violence, hate and discrimination against Israel and its student supporters."

For his part, Newburgh said that while he wishes anti-Israel protests weren't part of the campus landscape, he acknowledges that university students are at an age when they express their opinions forcefully and can be attracted to a narrative that paints the Palestinians as the underdogs in the Middle East.

But most Jewish students, and in fact students in general are oblivious, "going to university with their ear buds on," he said.

"Those students that are actively engaged are going to feel it more than the average Jewish student," he added.

While some Canadian campuses seem to be perpetually engaged in BDS campaigns, others have remained more tranquil. Similarly, some students are able to walk past the protests and ignore anti-Israel comments from faculty and student associations, while others feel isolated and deeply frustrated that Jewish groups and university administrations can't reach a consensus on how to best counter what seems like a propaganda machine intent on demonizing Israel.

Nicole West, a fourth-year communications student at Wilfred Laurier University in Waterloo, Ont., and president of the Students Supporting Israel club, said there is little anti-Israel sentiment on her campus.

But she's discouraged that there was also apathy from the Jewish community when students organized a mock checkpoint where they yelled at participants in order to simulate what life is like for Palestinians on the West Bank.

She understands that reacting will only provoke a heated response, but said, "I'm the kind of person who fights fire with fire.

"I think it's important to be proactive and say our narrative before the other side can say theirs. Once they say Jews killed babies, it's very hard to turn back."

Last month she helped organize an event that saw several young Israelis come to campus and speak with students.

The reaction, for the most part, was respectful. The group included a Druze Israeli and a Bedouin who were an effective counterpoint to the "social justice warriors" who protest against Israel, she said.

Not all campuses are so easygoing. A similar event last year at Hamilton's McMaster University saw 75 students stage a "die-in protest." A Palestinian-Israeli participant was so shaken after she was harassed at a tabling session that she withdrew from an evening event.

Fourth-year arts and science student, Hayley Goldfarb, president of McMaster's Hillel, didn't see the protests last year, but said they were instigated by a fringe group of people.

Hillel "tables" regularly in the McMaster student centre, promoting its own events and preferring to deliver a pro-Israel message to the entire university community rather than engage with protesters, she said.

In these perilous times, words matter

Gil Troy

These are worrying times. We have an American president who refuses to acknowledge the nature of the harshest ideology targeting America since Communism, and resents using the "t" word, terrorism, for blatantly political acts of violence. We have university students – emboldened by cowed professors – imposing their own language, hierarchies, sensibilities, even their own versions of history, on their campuses. We have a perverse international sensibility that demonizes a small, embattled democracy while applauding a nationalist movement that maims and slaughters innocents. And, in response, we have populist demagogues rising to fame, grasping at power, by seeming to "tell it like it is," unlike the stiff, suffocating and politically correct elites.

If you think this is "just" an American or European problem, you're missing the dynamics on many Canadian campuses, and among many Canadian elites, too.

As Jews, these mass idiocies are particularly worrisome. Not only has Israel become the Jew among the nations, targeted viciously. But when populist irrationality festers, when truth suffers, we suffer too. If traditionally the Bible urged us to "speak truth to power," today we must tell truth to those who define themselves as powerless, too.

That's one of the great, perverse inversions of our political moment. The topsy-turvyness has people who claim to be powerless asserting a Stalinist kind of ideological power in the media and on campus, and launching self-righteous violence through terrorism. Those of us who oppose them, who fight for truth, reasonableness and moderation – or at least an acknowledgment of messiness, complexity and contradictions – are often intimidated, demonized or shut down by being labelled "racist."

The civil rights activist Bayard Rustin called it 40 years ago, when Palestinians and Soviets cooked up the Big Red Lie, calling Zionism "racism." Fearing the hijacking of this specific term whose moral power comes from denouncing biologically based bigotry, Rustin, a close friend of Martin Luther King, Jr., warned that racism would became an all-purpose meaningless epithet "in international discussions," like "s.o.b." is "in personal relations."

How right he was. So, today, if you criticize this phenomenon called Islamist radicalism and suggest that slaughtering people in the name of Islamism is terrorism, you risk being called "racist," despite the many Quranic injunctions justifying jihad and the millions of Muslims who embrace this hateful ideology. And, today, if you defend free speech and free thought on university campuses, let alone controversial ideas or even edgy Halloween costumes, you risk being called "racist," despite the pressing needs of minority students for freedom from conformity, and from suffocating, stultifying, established ways of thinking and acting. And, of course, if you dare defend Israel, you risk being called "racist," even though there are dark-skinned Israelis and light-skinned Palestinians, facing off in what is a national clash, not a racial or biologically based one.

So, no, neither Canadians, nor anyone else should be saying, "it cannot happen here." Following the Paris massacre, we are all reliving Pastor Martin Niemoller's warnings, that "first they came" for the socialists, the trade unionists, the Jews, and when "they came for me, there was no one left to speak for me." In France, first they came for the Jews, and that was OK, because after all, we're (all!) racist oppressors of the Palestinians. Then they came for the satirists, and that was OK, because as even U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry said, there was a reason why Muslims might hate these Islamophobes. Then they came for Friday-night revellers in the City of Light, and even so, my kids in Jerusalem wondered why there was so much anger against those murders but so little outcry about stabbings in our neighbourhoods.

So, yes, ideas count, words matter, truth must prevail – otherwise we will all sink into moral confusion and encourage foolishly rationalized evil. ■

Selling crazy: from Niemöller to Trump to Nicholson

Sara Horowitz

If someone had predicted 10 years ago that a mainstream candidate for the U.S. presidency would have called for an outright ban on members of a religious group, I wouldn't have believed it. In fact, if someone had predicted it 10 minutes before a Republican hopeful released his policy statement on Muslims, I wouldn't have believed it.

If it had been Purim, not Chanukah, it would pass as a Purim spiel, albeit not very clever and more than a bit offensive. But GOP aspirant Donald Trump was serious when he called for a "total and complete shutdown of Muslims entering the United States." More chilling still was the boost in the polls the statement gave him. While many people in the Unites States and abroad, and across the political spectrum, denounced his blanket scapegoating of all Muslims, the bump in the polls is deeply disturbing. Although the presidential primaries are still a way off, I suddenly understood how a power-hungry demagogue with not much to offer but narcissism could play the fear card to put himself in power through democratic processes.

Many Jewish groups joined in condemning Trump, as they should – as we should. I was reminded of the oft-quoted statement of the anti-Nazi Lutheran German pastor, Martin Niemoller, whose politics shifted once he understood the nefarious nature of National Socialist ideology. "First they came for the Jews, and I did not speak out, because I was not a Jew. Then they came for the Communists, and I did not speak out, because I was not a Communist. Then they came for the trade unionists, and I did not speak out, because I was not a trade unionist. Then they came for me, and there was no one left to speak out for me."

In fact, Muslims join a growing list of categories of folks that Trump would ban outright from the United States, or whom he dismisses disrespectfully when their views collide with his own, or about whom he promulgates stereotypes. While Jews aren't first on his list of enemies, Niemoller's statement can serve as a caution for where Trump's rhetoric may land if they – if we – don't call him on his bigotry. His crude rhetoric of hate and scorn has taken aim at Mexicans, the disabled, women, veterans, professors, the poor, and many, many others – yes, Jews, as well (although the Anti-Defamation League has officially pronounced his recent remarks about Jews as negotiators and money-wielders to fall short of anti-Semitism).

Disturbingly, Trump isn't the only power broker who plays the politics of fear. The sort of heightened rhetoric and irresponsible pandering to insecurities and prejudices that Trump employs has become increasingly part of the political arsenal of those aspiring to power, or holding on to it in countries that define themselves as democratic, diverse, and ethical. This not only cheapens the civic discourse. It pits people and communities against one another, polarizes them and fans the flame of discord rather than lowering the temperature. In the guise of fighting extremism, such rhetoric fertilizes it and entrenches its roots.

Soon after Trump called for a ban on Muslims until such time as some unnamed Americans "can figure out what is going on," spoofs began to appear on the web. One satire announced that the Canadian government has declared a ban on Americans, sealing its borders with the United States because "it is impossible to vet them, know where they've been or what they really think." Another suggested that since white supremacists have been a source of violence, white people should be banned from America. J. K. Rowling compared the GOP hopeful to Lord Voldemort, Harry Potter's evil nemesis.

Perhaps laughter is the best strategy, pointing out the absurdity of a would-be president. Comedy can be deadly serious. To quote Jack Nicholson's line in the movie As Good as it Gets: "Sell crazy someplace else. We're all stocked up here." ■

Jews and Christmas: Enjoy the holiday

Michael Taube

As a longtime newspaper columnist, one of my favourite annual traditions has been to write about Christmas.

I'm an agnostic Jew, but I've celebrated this holiday since I was young. My wife and I purchase a tree each year, and decorate it with ornaments. There's a wreath on the door, and other ones throughout our home. Garland is wrapped around the banister. Holiday music, both traditional and modern, can often be heard. My son excitedly opens up his presents on Christmas Day, although that goes without saying!

This year, I decided to write about Christmas for what could be my most unusual audience: CJN readers.

How would I tackle it, exactly? Most of you celebrate Chanukah, and I don't. A few of you might have trees, ornaments and wreaths, but it wouldn't be extensive. Some of the most popular Christmas songs were written by Jews, but that's common knowledge.

So, I thought that I could address Christmas from different angles.

It would be interesting to examine early North American Jews and their positive feelings toward Christmas. As noted in Penne L. Restad's Christmas in America: A History, an 1877 issue of the Philadelphia Times reported "the Hebrew brethren did not keep aloof" from Christmas, and that young Jewish children "were as happy… as Christian children" with the Christmas trees which "bloomed" in their homes.

Another possibility was to mention that Christmas, aside from its name, has pagan components. While Christmas trees date back to 15th- or 16th-century Germany, it also has a long association as a pagan symbol. It wasn't until the 19th century, in fact, that North Americans accepted this long-honoured European tradition as their own.

My own family could make for a good column. To my parents' credit, they both had tolerant attitudes about Christmas. My father had a little fake Christmas tree (or Chanukah bush, depending on the client) in his office. My mother never wanted to put one up, but she enjoyed looking at my tree and putting up ornaments.

I could also target the astonishing intolerance some Jews have about Christmas. You know, the sanctimonious feelings of supposed "confusion" during this time of year, being "left out" of the holiday mix, believing Christmas is "only" for Christians, or "hating" Jolly Old St. Nick, trees, lights, music, etc.

Then again, some Jews combine elements of Chanukah and Christmas for personal reasons, or because they're in a mixed marriage, or otherwise. I saw a Star of David on a home in place of a wreath last year. There are Jewish ornaments specifically made for Christmas trees, and even full-sized Chanukah bushes/trees.

Hmm. What's the best way to discuss Christmas with people who don't, for the most part, celebrate this holiday?

Oh, wait. I know what to do.

Christmas isn't just for Christians. It never has been, and it never will be. Rather, Christmas is a wonderful, beloved holiday that we can all enjoy in our own way. (For most Jews, it would likely be in a modern, non-religious manner.)

It's important to have the freedom to celebrate any holiday, custom or tradition. Placing restrictions on a person's enjoyment and teaching them that they can't or shouldn't participate in a specific religious/cultural event helps facilitate an environment of ignorance and intolerance. Is this what we really want?

Meanwhile, there are many benefits in exposing people to different religious customs and experiences. Obtuse hang-ups about Christmas would surely fall out of fashion. Religious holidays like Chanukah would become less of a mystery. A bit more tolerance and respect wouldn't kill us, either.

Here's what I would suggest: enjoy Chanukah, and the customs and traditions associated with it. But if your children express interest in singing Christmas carols, trimming a tree, and so forth, let them enjoy these traditions. Who knows? You might even learn to enjoy them, too.

Merry Christmas, everyone! ■

Growing up in the shadow of the refugee experience

Bernie Farber

I've written often on the refugee experience because I was brought up in its shadow. Both my parents left their ancestral homes not because they wanted to, but as a result of persecution and anti-Semitism.

My late mother, Gertrude, was brought to Canada as a child prior to World War II. After her family was driven from their village of Zaslav in Ukraine by violent pogroms, Canada was a welcoming home at that time.

My father, Max, was not so fortunate. He suffered the brutalities of the Shoah. At its tragic conclusion, he had to face the fact he was the sole Jewish survivor of his small Polish shtetl. Murdered in Treblinka were his first wife, two young children (Shalom and Yitzchak), as well as seven brothers and sisters.

Once again, this time following a heartless closed-door immigration policy, Canada re-opened its borders to the stateless people of Europe, including thousands of Jewish survivors like my father.

Through my lived experience as a child of refugees, one thing became clear to me: they all had a story. Their stories ranged from the insignificant to the truly heroic, and from sadness, despair and heartache to joy and elation.

Last month, following almost three years of painstaking research, interviews and conversations, a book on the refugee experience co-written by refugee advocate Ratna Omidvar and Ryerson University researcher Dana Wagner was launched. Flight and Freedom tells 30 individual stories of refugees, experiences that were at once complex and harrowing. My father's story is among the 30, and what strikes the reader is both the common experiences and the stark differences that brought them to Canada and helped them start a new life.

All the stories in Flight and Freedom are truly compelling. Yet each reader will take certain scenes away that speak to them. The story of Christine, a survivor of the Rwandan genocide is one such story. On its surface, it's as different from my father's Shoah experience as one could imagine.

> Their stories ranged from the insignificant to the truly heroic

Geographically, politically, in terms of people and places – little is familiar. Yet, Christine's familiarity with life over death was a theme I sadly understood. As the génocidaires were committing mass murder, Christine, then a young child, experienced the slayings of her father and brother. Through the luck of what my father used to call the necessary "1,000 miracles" she and her mother escaped with their lives. Horror surrounds you in such evil times, and understanding how one copes was explained all too well by Christine: "Because you were trying to save your own life, we wouldn't pay attention to what's happening. We would just run."

But perhaps the story that has stayed with me more than others is that of a young Bedouin woman, Sabreen. Brought up in a Bedouin camp in southern Israel, she became a pariah within her tribe because her mother had given birth to her out of wedlock. Within the tightly bound Bedouin community, this was heresy. Her mother was murdered as a result – an honour killing – and Sabreen was suspect from the day she was born.

A forced marriage and its continual physical abuse drove her to attempt suicide. And strangely, it was then that another commonality made itself known. As in my father's story, despair, anger and fear led her to death's door. However, as with my father, death was cheated by happenstance. Her suicide was unsuccessful, and with the help of Israeli friends, Sabreen made it to Tel Aviv and eventually to Canada, where after two attempts, her bid for refugee status was approved.

There is so much more to Sabreen's story, as there are to all the others in Flight and Freedom. In the end, each refugee and immigrant in this book share one collective conclusion: each is deeply grateful to Canada for embracing them and giving them back their dignity.

As we welcome Syrian refugees today, it would behoove us all to remember the stories of Sabreen and Christine. ■

Islamist allegations surface after MP given key role

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Ten years ago, as Omar Alghabra and his supporters celebrated his election victory in Mississauga-Erindale, someone on the noisy stage uttered the phrase, "This is a victory for Islam! Islam won! Islam won!... Islamic power is extending into Canadian politics."

In the chaotic aftermath of his election victory, the boast was heard by some of the people nearby, but not by others.

The incident was reported in a local Mississauga newspaper and picked up abroad by U.S. academic Daniel Pipes, who cautioned about Islamists who support the imposition of sharia law coming close to the levers of power. Relying on reports from Canada, Pipes later ran updates saying it was unclear who actually uttered the Islamic supremacist statement. Alghabra has denied every saying it, and it has been attributed to Khalid Usman, a Liberal party member and Alghabra's supporter.

During the recent election campaign, that incident, along with several others that purported to show Alghabra's support for an Islamist agenda, were promoted in a mass email by Media Action Group, an organization that opposes anti-Semitism. The email referenced a report on the website of Terrorism and Security Experts of Canada (TSEC), which was headlined, "Has the Liberal Party been infiltrated by extremist candidates?" The article referred specifically to Alghabra, who headed the Canadian Arab Federation from 2004 to 2005, and to several others, none of them as prominent as the MP from Mississauga.

Omar Alghabra

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said the TSEC report relies on "guilt by association." He acknowledged, however, "there are multiple points of influence trying to insert themselves into the Liberal party," but he noted that Prime Minister Justin Trudeau has been "unequivocal in his support for Israel."

University of Toronto political science Prof. Nelson Wiseman called the TSEC report about the purported infiltration of the Liberal party by Islamists replete with innuendo and guilt by association.

"It reminded me of websites that claim that Jews are taking over Canada," he said.

"There's very little evidence of extremism here. There's a lot of innuendo," he added.

A different perspective was offered by David Harris, director of the terrorist intelligence program of INSIGNIS Strategic Research Inc. in Ottawa, and formerly chief of strategic planning at the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS).

On the question of Islamic influence and infiltration of the Liberal party, he said, "very senior people in the Liberal party in the past have expressed serious concern on the extent to which certain individuals – Islamist elements, among other interests – may have gained access to the party."

With Alghabra's appointment recently as parliamentary secretary to the minister of foreign affairs for consular affairs, allegations about his agenda have resurfaced. Ezra Levant of The Rebel, a right-wing, web-based news and commentary site, and formerly of Sun TV news, questioned what Alghabra's influence could be on the vetting of Syrian refugees, Canada's position on normalizing relations with Iran and on its position on Israel.

Alghabra did not respond to a request for an interview by The CJN's press time.

However, Howard Adelman, a retired York University philosophy professor, reviewed Alghabra's record and concluded not all of the allegations were supported by credible or convincing evidence.

So what exactly is Alghabra accused of?

His critics say he's made several statements over the years that cause concern, such as condemning CanWest newspapers for labelling Hamas and Hezbollah terrorist organizations. In a 2006 interview with B'nai Brith's Jewish Tribune newspaper, he declined to condemn suicide bombers; he said he didn't believe Hamas was dedicated to Israel's destruction; and he claimed UN Resolution 242 required Israeli withdrawal from all captured territories, which the clause itself leaves indeterminate, and that he'd criticized Toronto's police chief for taking part in a charity walk for Israel. He also said he mourned the death of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat. And when Ontario declined to permit the use of sharia law in Ontario, Alghabra said he was disappointed.

Recently on TheRebel.ca, Levant devoted considerable time to reviewing Alghabra's problematic statements, including one in 2014 in which he posted a critique on Facebook of Israel's "blind and cruel" bombing in Gaza. Alghabra later modified the statement to criticize the killing of all civilians, but not before the Conservative party used that quote in campaign material to contrast it with their position of standing with Israel.

In Adelman's estimation, "the accusations against Omar Alghabra concerning sharia law prove to be even more of a tempest in a teapot without even being able to find any tea leaves."

Adelman did find grounds for concern that the CAF had denounced use of the word terrorist to describe the al-Aqsa Martyr's Brigades. (Years after Alghabra left the CAF, it lost federal funding over its support of terror groups, with a Federal Court judge writing, "All of the [CAF] statements and actions raised by the [then-immigration minister Jason Kenney] can, in my view, reasonably lead one to the view that CAF appears to support organizations that Canada has declared to be terrorist organizations and which are arguably anti-Semitic.")

As for whether Alghabra is a "closet Islamist crusader? I just don't know. He could be an incrementalist on behalf of Islam, secretly moving into a position of political authority. I have no evidence to exonerate him from such a charge. But I have plenty of evidence to insist he be taken as innocent until solid evidence is offered to come to such a conclusion." ■

Renowned Beth Tzedec choir resigns en masse

plungen@thecjn.ca

By all accounts, the Beth Tzedec Singers are a remarkable vocal group. The synagogue itself is effusive in its praise of its in-house choir, calling it "fabulous" and touting its "smooth signature sound [that] makes attendance at our Shabbat and holiday services a unique musical and inspiring experience."

But as of Dec. 12, all that was scheduled to change when the 16-member choir was to deliver its final performance.

According to an email to members from synagogue ritual committee chairs Leonard Cappe and Bill Sklar, the choir announced it is resigning en masse. The move was prompted by a requirement that "members of the choir affirm their Jewish identity by Dec. 31 in order to remain in the choir," Cappe and Sklar write in their email.

"Our wonderful choir consists of both Jews and non-Jews. The inclusion of non-Jews in our choir predates Chazzan [Simon] Spiro. Our choir regards itself as a family tied together by a love of the music of the synagogue. They do not wish to have their family broken up, and as a result, they have decided to leave as a group, effective this coming Shabbat Dec. 12, 2015," the email states.

Cappe and Sklar go on to say the resignation of the choir "will have a significant impact on our Shabbat and Yom Tov services."

But it's the question of whether non-Jews are entitled to daven (pray) on behalf of the congregation on those holy days that is at the heart of the disagreement over the choir's future.

According to a tshuvah (a response to a question of Jewish law) by the shul's senior rabbi, Baruch Frydman-Kohl, it is inappropriate and contrary to precedent for non-Jews to lead certain prayers.

The chazzan (cantor) and by extension, the choir, is the shaliach tzibur (representative of the congregation) in prayer, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl notes. From the first time non-Jews were permitted to join Jewish choirs in Reform congregations in the 19th century, questions were raised "whether the most sacred parts of a service should be sung by people unable to enter into the spirit of the religious community they were meant to represent."

The rabbi added: "Those who serve as choristers should be part of the covenantal community. In the most basic sense, this is the role of a shaliach tzibur and what the prayer leader does."

The Conservative movement adopted that position in 1954, reviewed it and affirmed it several times since, he noted.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

But Walter Soles, who's been with the choir for more than 20 years, said its members "feel it is demeaning" to sign the document being asked of them. "We rejected it, considering we had been there quite some time. It seemed kind of silly."

Soles said the choir's decision to resign was made unanimously last summer after a round of Internet correspondence.

Nevertheless, "We sang the High Holidays... We are connected to the synagogue, and feel an obligation to it," he said.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl told The CJN "the issue has been around for a long time" and was raised in meetings with the synagogue's lay leadership. Three years ago he tried to clarify the shul's position and bring the policy regarding the choir into line with the synagogue's policy on other issues, such as marriage and burial.

The choir was told months ago of the impending change, and an April deadline was extended to December, he said.

He acknowledged, however, that "we were taken aback by the resignations." He had expected the members to affirm their Jewish heritage so that, in future, non-Jewish choir members would simply refrain from participating in prayers that recognize God and affirm faith, such as the Shema and Shmoneh Esrei, as well as affirm Jewish peoplehood. That would leave many morning psalms that could have the choir's full participation, he said.

Soles, however, was unaware of that possible compromise. In an email to a member of the synagogue's music committee, he stated, "You mean you're willing to turn your back on the group that is there every Shabbat, rain, snow or shine; a group that brings you such prominence; a group whose only wishes are to help make your prayers and presence more beautiful and meaningful? Honestly, I wish I could understand. I can't... help me."

Interestingly, neither Rabbi Frydman-Kohl nor Soles knew how many non-Jews were in the choir, and the rabbi said Cantor Spiro will have to recruit a new group. ■

Protest disrupts York U Chanukah celebration

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

A pre-Chanukah fun get-together sponsored by Hillel at York University was disrupted recently by supporters of Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA) who were attending a "silent protest" nearby.

As students gathered at a Chanukah photo booth in Vari Link on Dec. 3, protesters attending a YU Divest event tens of metres away approached the Hillel display and chanted slogans. At one point, before the Hillel event formally kicked off, they were seen handing out leaflets only a couple of metres from the Hillel display. YU Divest is a campaign launched by SAIA in 2011.

"We had students come up to us expressing their frustration that a protest was happening and that it created a negative atmosphere for the students," said Anna Baev, director of Hillel York and Jewski, an outreach program to Russian Jews. "They felt it was ruining the overall environment on campus."

The pre-Chanukah event featured a photo booth and various Chanukah-related props, including an inflatable chanukiyah. Students took fun pictures in the booth and asked Hillel student leaders and shinshinim – visiting Israeli emissaries – about the holiday. About 400 students participated at the Hillel event over two days, many of them not Jewish, Baev said.

On its Facebook page, Hillel stated, "What was planned as a silent protest turned into chants and the blocking of the hallways. While Hillel prides itself on promoting respectful discourse on all campuses, we find tactics of harassment and intimidation to be intolerable."

Hillel later added: "We would like to clarify that the demonstrators were not protesting the photo booth itself. The protest was an unrelated event that took place nearby."

Joanne Rider, director of media relations at York, said "we are in the process of reviewing video footage and soliciting feedback from staff members who were present."

"YU Divest, a group with members from various clubs and organizations, held a silent protest in Vari Hall on that day. The table booked by Hillel was located in the Ross Link. Hillel members were advised in advance by York staff that YU Divest was tabling in the adjacent space and they agreed to be in the link which is a distance from Vari Hall," Rider said.

(Baev told The CJN that York's administration confirmed the booking of the Chanukah event Nov. 23, but were only told of the nearby protest on the morning of Dec. 3.)

"Janet Morrison, vice-provost students, has personally reached out to students who have expressed concerns. We have not received a formal complaint from a student, nor have we been contacted by any students who said they were present and felt intimidated," Rider said.

York students with an inflatable chanukiyah

"Any student who has or does contact us will be advised about how – under the Student Code of Rights and Responsibilities – they can file a formal complaint. We encourage them to do so.

"York University is committed to freedom of expression and takes proactive measures to help ensure a safe and inclusive environment free from discrimination and harassment," she added.

The Chanukah get-together was part of Hillel's mandate of creating a visible presence, presenting Jewish programming and enhancing Jewish life on campus. Despite the disruption, "we consider our event a success," Baev said.

On Dec. 7, after the start of the holiday, another 60 students – Jewish and non-Jewish – participated in a candle-lighting ceremony and continued the celebration at Hillel's campus headquarters. The event included a food drive to benefit Jewish and non-Jewish food banks, Baev said.

Commenting on the photo booth incident, Avi Benlolo, CEO of Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said, "The true anti-Semitic nature of the anti-Israel boycott crowd at York University was on full display as a Jewish student celebration of Chanukah was disrupted by anti-Israel students chanting and blocking hallways... This incident may be the beginning a more profound effort to marginalize the Jewish presence at York as anti-Israel incitement on campus, encouraged by a large mural at York's student centre which promotes Palestinian violence against Israel, does not typically cross over into direct anti-Jewish action, as it now has done."

SAIA representatives did not reply to requests for comment by The CJN's deadline. ■

Why I had to be at Sarah Litman's wedding

Rabbi Mark Fishman

Last month, a father and his son were taking a drive together outside their home in the city of Hebron when terrorists opened fire on their car. The father, Rabbi Ya'akov Litman, and his 18-year-old son, Netanel, were both murdered. The fact that their daughter and sister, Sarah, was scheduled to be married just days later made this tragedy all the more poignant.

In the face of such loss, the family, including Sarah Litman and her fiancé, Ariel Beigel, decided to postpone the wedding by one week in order to sit shivah. When she was interviewed in Israel, Sarah said, "Very soon, we will marry in a large and happy wedding. We will go on and be happy as father and Netanel always were. We will not be crushed."

When I heard this courageous and incredible display of strength, I was touched to my core. I felt that Sarah represented much more than just one person. She came to symbolize the spirit of the entire Jewish People. Her words emphasized that we will not be defined by tragedy, and we will not stop living our lives even in the face of darkness. I knew then that I had to go to Israel and dance at this wedding, and with just two days notice, 12 leaders of my congregation decided to join me.

We entered the wedding hall together with 20,000 other people – Jews from every walk of life, from every corner of Israel and beyond, from every religious stripe. We were secular and religious. Some wore their army uniforms, while others wore uniforms of a different sort, including the traditional ultra-Orthodox garb of bekishes and shtreimls. The message was clear: Am Yisrael had gathered together to find peoplehood.

In the middle of the craziness, through circles of circles of dancing men, I somehow found myself propelled to the very epicentre of the joy, where the chattan, with his beaming smile and larger than life joy, was.

I told him we had come all the way from Canada to be with him and to dance at his wedding. He took hold of my shoulders and for a moment that felt like an eternity, he looked at me with disbelief. Then he said, "Wow! Thank you so much for coming here and for being with us!"

> We came from Montreal looking for brotherhood, and brotherhood is what we found.

I just burst open with awe and pride.

To go from the fresh grave of a father and brother to invite the entire nation to your wedding, and for that entire nation to respond with an incredible "Yes," despite the pain – or, perhaps because of the pain, the need to harness, uplift and sanctify the pain – all the dire strivings of our people were encapsulated right in that single gesture, a wedding in defiance of a funeral.

We came from Montreal looking for brotherhood, and brotherhood is what we found. I silently prayed: "Ribbono Shel Olam, Master of the World – this is your chattan, this is your kallah, these are your sons, these are your daughters. And if for just that one moment we could truly see all that was important, then dayeinu – it was enough."

For 2,000 years, we sat shivah, outside our land, aware of what we have lost. And yet we have continued. We keep getting married, keep having children, keep celebrating, notwithstanding the tears we may still have on our cheeks. Our people never give up on life itself. ■

Rabbi Mark Fishman is spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Tikvah in Montreal.

Beth Torah Congregation
קה"ל בית תורה

A traditional Family Shul in existence for 50 years. Our approach to Judaism and Jewish education merges the traditional with the modern.

We are in search of a full-time Cantor to be an integral part of sustaining and growing our family Shul and the Congregation's Jewish identity.

At Beth Torah, the Cantor is a full time member of the Clergy and is directly responsible to the Rabbi. The Cantor works closely with other members of the professional and administrative staff and the lay leadership of the Congregation.

As an essential part of our Clergy, the ideal candidate will be warm, outgoing, and an effective communicator; an enthusiastic teacher of both children and adults, possessing a love of music; and a team player who brings creativity, innovation and a deep understanding of, and respect for traditional Judaism as it merges with the modern.

The role of Cantor includes responsibilities as Clergy, music and liturgy, educational and programmatic initiatives, Synagogue leadership, event and community responsibilities.

Interested candidates should send their CV by email to Canadian Jews criticize Trump for Muslim comments

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Donald Trump's ability to elicit reaction with controversial comments reached north of the border into Canada where Prime Minister Justin Trudeau joined a chorus of condemnation for the Republican presidential candidate's call to restrict Muslim entry to the United States.

"Canadians are very aware of my feelings on this," Trudeau said, while not referring specifically to Trump by name. "And they, by the way, sided pretty clearly against the politics of fear and division in our election here."

Jewish organizations in Canada joined in condemning Trump.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) stated, "While CIJA does not ordinarily comment on internal American politics, Donald Trump's call for a blanket ban on Muslims entering the United States is appalling. Blacklists and bigotry are not only offensive, they obstruct meaningful debate around public policy solutions to the serious challenge of Islamist terrorism. Such reckless statements risk undermining the efforts of governments, security services and Muslim moderates who are working to counter extremism.

"When political leaders stake out such positions, they provide legitimacy to extreme rhetoric usually confined to the margins of political discourse," Fogel said.

Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center opposes "the racism inherent in Donald Trump's proposal to ban Muslim immigration to the United States," the organization's CEO, Avi Benlolo, said.

"Mr. Trump, by lumping all Muslims in the cross-hairs of the terrorism crisis, only hurts the legitimate campaign against Islamist fundamentalism and demeans law-abiding American citizens," he said.

In a statement, Shahid Akhtar and Barbara Landau, co-chairs, Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims, also condemned Trump's "hate speech" and called for him to be banned from entering this country and "that corporations rename buildings bearing his name."

They added: "In our lifetime, Jews, blacks, First Nations people, Japanese and others have been the focus of such racism. When people of goodwill fail to raise their collective voices, history teaches us that this silence can be devastating. If we ignore this outrage we will do so at the expense of our children and grandchildren, who will ask why we stayed silent."

Trump drew the ire of public figures around the world when he called "for a total and complete shutdown of Muslims entering the United States until our country's representatives can figure out what the hell is going on."

That statement came soon after a husband and wife terror team killed 14 people at a Christmas party in San Bernardino, Calif. It prompted bipartisan condemnations from both Republicans and Democrats, as well as from around the world.

U.S. Jewish organizations joined in criticizing "The Donald." Anti-Defamation League CEO Jonathan Greenblatt called Trump's remarks "unacceptable and antithetical to American values."

"In the Jewish community, we know all too well what can happen when a particular religious group is singled out for stereotyping and scapegoating," Greenblatt wrote in a statement.

MICHAEL VADON/WIKICOMMONS PHOTO

The American Jewish Committee (AJC) condemned "in the strongest terms" Trump's "latest offensive and inflammatory comments," while two modern Orthodox groups, the Orthodox Union and the Rabbinical Council of America, issued a joint statement saying they "reject calls to limit immigration to the United States based on religion."

Trump, who made billions in real estate, has close ties to the American Jewish community. His daughter, Ivanka, converted to Judaism and observes the Sabbath. Her two children are being raised Jewish.

Last summer, the Forward ran an article outlining his Jewish ties. The paper noted he has served as a grand marshal at New York's annual Salute to Israel Parade. After Hurricane Katrina, he was among a group of celebrities who decorated Jewish federation tzedakah boxes to be auctioned off to support hurricane disaster relief, and he was honoured with an award at the annual gala for the Algemeiner, a right-wing Jewish news organization.

On Israel, Trump was quoted as saying, "We love Israel. We will fight for Israel 100 per cent, 1,000 per cent. It will be there forever." Trump, however, cancelled plans to visit Israel this month, after Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu criticized his call to ban Muslims from entering the United States.

"I have decided to postpone my trip to Israel and to schedule my meeting with Netanyahu at a later date after I become president of the United States," he said the morning of Dec. 10 on Twitter.

Earlier, 37 Israeli MKs, almost all from opposition parties, signed a petition calling on Netanyahu to cancel the Dec. 28 meeting with Trump. Meretz MK Michal Rozin, who initiated the petition, said to hold the meeting would lend support to Trump's comments, disgrace the democratic character of the State of Israel and hurts its Muslim citizens.

Trump was criticized only a few weeks ago after an address to the Republican Jewish Coalition, in which he suggested his audience was preoccupied with money and were good negotiators. He said Israel was partly to blame for the failure to come to terms with the Palestinians.

He has also been criticized for mocking the disabled, accusing immigrants of being killers and rapists, advocating a database to track Muslims in America and making fun of women's looks.

Meanwhile, an online survey by Bloomberg Politics/Purple Strategies PulsePoll, found 37 per cent of likely voters supported Trump's position on Muslim immigration, while a YouGov poll in Britain found 25 per cent support. ■

Thornhill residents reject revised Muslim housing plan

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Thornhill Woods residents who have been fighting an Islamic organization's plan to build a community housing complex for Muslims in the predominantly Jewish suburb say the latest revision to the proposal still isn't good enough.

In 2013, the Islamic Shia Ithna-Asheri Jamaat of Toronto (ISIJ) applied to build a new Islamic development built around the Jaffari Community Centre that included two 17-storey residential towers, 61 townhouses and retail space on its 11- hectare property at 9000 Bathurst St., south of Rutherford Road.

A residents' group set up to oppose the proposed development, Preserve Thornhill Woods Association, led by Rom Koubi, has been working to prevent the City of Vaughan planning department from approving it ever since, claiming the project contravenes density guidelines and is intended for Muslims only.

The city rejected the original plan based on zoning bylaws and the impact that more than 1,400 new residents would have on the suburb's infrastructure, traffic and parking, as well as local schools that are already at capacity.

A working group was established in 2014 to help the ISIJ revise its proposal, since the city's official plan designates the area for low-rise development.

Shabbir Jaffer, vice-president of ISIJ Toronto, and Shafiq Punjani, the housing project's chair, said they're "cautiously optimistic" the latest revision, submitted in late October, will appease residents' and city officials' concerns.

"We tried to adhere in good faith to the principles of the process that were established. Now we put our full confidence in the city council and its staff to consider the proposal objectively before they arrive at their decision," Jaffer said.

Punjani said the plan is to reduce the height of the two buildings from 17 stories each to six and eight stories, respectively. He said the ISIJ has also addressed traffic concerns by proposing a public road going through the development.

"We've also agreed in principle to have the parking facility that we are going to be constructing be accessible to other neighbours, including the [Toronto] Waldorf School, with whom we already share a parking agreement."

But Koubi said despite the fact the high-rise buildings have been replaced with shorter, wider buildings, the same density problems still apply.

Jaffari Community Centre

"It doesn't conform with the rest of the neighbourhood when it comes to look and feel of the neighbourhood... We're talking about 60 townhomes in an area on a street that has 17 houses on it. Everything is really dense," Koubi said.

He added that he also opposes the plan to make it a segregated development for Muslims.

According to the planning justification report submitted to the city, "the proposed development is considered a cultural campus, because it is envisioned to meet the unique needs and serve the members of the Islamic Shia Ithna-Asheri Jamaat of Toronto."

Punjani countered that "this development will be an inclusive development, and it will be open to all members of the public, although it is being designed with our community needs in mind. So the seniors centre that is being proposed would cater to their dietary needs, like halal meat... but having said that, it would be open to anyone who wanted to reside in the facility."

Koubi said that when he challenged that claim at a public hearing, asking the developers how many of the units would be reserved for the broader public, "They said, 'It is going to be offered first to our people, and whatever is left over will be sold to other people and we expect eight to 10 per cent to be available to the wider community.'"

Koubi added that the ISIJ agreed to allow members of the broader community to use its facilities, which include a soccer field and a tennis court, "but they allowed one hour a week to be open to the public."

His group will hold a community-wide meeting next month to review the new application. The City of Vaughan is expected to hold a public hearing about it in early February. ■

New OISE project aims to counter academic anti-Zionism

jshupac@thecjn.ca

An anti-Zionist bias has "expunged" the study of anti-Semitism and the Holocaust from curricula at the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) and it's time to reinstate them, says human rights consultant Karen Mock.

A desire to change a campus climate that equates Zionism with oppression has inspired the "The Antisemitism and Holocaust Studies Project: Enhancing Social Justice, Antiracist and Anti-Oppression Education," a new venture initiated by Mock, a human rights consultant, former executive director of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation and former national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, and Bonnie Burstow, an associate professor in adult education at OISE who will act as the project's faculty chair.

The project was officially launched Dec. 8 at OISE at an event that drew about 50 people from the spheres of academia and activism.

However, while the organizing team invited faculty from OISE's social justice education departments, Mock said none of them came. Nevertheless, she said the event was successful and will help to create a network of people who will work on this, including from within the local school boards and teachers' federations.

With a stated mandate to reintroduce what Mock and Burstow say is the "reality of anti-Semitism or anti-Jewish oppression as a critical dimension of social justice education," the project, which Mock stressed will evolve over time, will entail a library and online collection of scholarly and practical resources related to Holocaust studies and anti-Semitism – including curriculum materials and teacher education resources – and educational events on anti-Semitism and related topics.

The latter will include an annual lecture on anti-Semitism as a prototype of racism and discrimination, presentations, consciousness-raising workshops and conferences.

Mock told The CJN that during the 1980s and '90s, academic journals about social justice education that were published at OISE typically included articles about anti-Semitism, or about how teaching books such as The Diary of Anne Frank, could help students understand the dangers of totalitarian thinking.

However, she said, the erasure of such teachings in OISE departments that deal with "so-called equity and social justice" has come about as a result of an "anti-Zionist bias" on campus, manifested in the increased popularity of the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement, Israeli Apartheid Week and what Mock referred to as "new anti-Semitism in the form of anti-Israel rhetoric."

"There are faculty who identify people like us as Zionists and [say we] are therefore not credible in the anti-oppression world, so this is what we're doing to try to counter that," Mock said.

She added: "There are those who express ideas like, 'Holocaust education is just a tool used by Zionists to cover up the atrocities committed by Israel against the Palestinians' – That's the kind of language that's used [on campus]."

Determined to get their message across in a way that is proactive and rooted in strong academic principles, Mock and her co-organizers created a program focused on what they say is missing in the scholarly landscape and that uses academic teachings to show that underlying the Holocaust was the racialization and demonization of the Jewish people.

Further, the project aims to show that the Holocaust and Holocaust denial are key to understanding modern anti-Semitism, as is the idea that studying anti-Semitism is no longer relevant.

According to the project's official media release, it "will be doing this in a way that is counterhegemonic and which indeed pays careful attention to systemic oppression and the relationship between oppressions."

Organizers will be working with like-minded organizations and individuals and stressed they welcome activists and scholars – Jewish and not – to join them in developing the project. ■

Cyber crime a threat, Israeli-inspired conference told

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Cyber security topped the agenda for a number of presenters at Toronto's first Cybertech Canada conference, held Dec. 9 to link both local and Israeli leaders in business, technology and the start-up world with investors and venture capitalists.

Adapted from Israel's annual Cybertech conference, which lets prospective investors learn about innovations and solutions in the field, the Toronto event was held at the MaRs Discovery District building downtown, a hub that brings together educators, researchers, social scientists and entrepreneurs.

Cybertech Canada was organized by Israeli security magazine Israel Defense and sponsors included the City of Toronto, the province of Ontario and the Toronto Financial Services Alliance. The event featured talks and panels delivered by Israeli and Canadian experts on cyber tech from business, the military, government and academia. More than 100 people attended.

Conference chair Yossi Vardi, an Israeli investor and entrepreneur, said the conference grew out of the close relationship between Israel and Canada, as well as between Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and former Canadian prime minister Stephen Harper.

From left, Yaron Varona of IOTA Security, Tomer Magid of Firelayers and Rami Efrati, of Firmitas discuss cyber start-ups.

"Canada's a country with substantial industries and financial institutions, so there's political significance to doing this but mainly there's business significance... From our perspective, Canada has many large financial institutions... From Canada's point of view, we know there's a lot of curiosity about the whole start-up phenomenon in Israel."

Presenters stressed that the current landscape is increasingly vulnerable to threats posed by hacking and security breaches, and that greater risk awareness is needed.

Kellman Meghu, head of Americas security architects for Check Point Software Technologies, an Israeli company that provides hardware and software products for IT security, spoke about the prevalence of hacking crimes and the advancement of hackers' methods, from credit card theft to larger-scale systems disruptions.

As technological systems become more integrated, hacks to things such as the health care system, airplane control systems or heating and power systems could have grave consequences, Meghu warned.

Robert Gordon, director of Global Cyber Security at CGI, an IT and business process service firm, said greater interconnectivity of devices has created newer, more globalized ways of doing business as well as increased vulnerability.

"People used to access their bank accounts a couple times a week, and now they do it multiple times per day from a variety of digital media.... At the same time, organized crime has moved online and has greater tech capabilities," Gordon said, posing the question, "Can security [developments] match the speed of innovation?"

Rami Efrati, founder and president of information security company Firmitas and former head of the civilian division of the Israel National Cyber Bureau in the Prime Minister's Officer, discussed cyber security for critical infrastructure, saying, "We're going to suffer more and more cyber attacks."

He said Israel and Canada must work together and invest in protection. "We're ready to share our knowledge with you [in Canada]... We're looking for local partners who know the landscape here and can adapt our solutions to their systems," he added.

Former provincial Tory cabinet minister Janet Ecker, now president and CEO of the Toronto Financial Services Alliance, a public-private partnership dedicated to growing the GTA's financial services cluster, stressed that breaches of cyber security is a topic "any CEO in the financial service world is rightly consumed by."

She warned that the growing prevalence of financial technology – "fintech" – firms and the use of mobile devices for financial services increase cyber security threats to the financial sector.

"We're seeing cities who've identified this as a priority, like London, New York and San Francisco, who are viewed as fintech hubs... If we don't push for this [in Toronto], there's a greater risk of slowing down in both sectors. If we get it right, [these partnerships] can be a dynamic source of new growth and future jobs," she said. ■

Pursuing justice 'guided my work,' Cotler tells Aish event

sshefa@thecjn.ca

As keynote speaker at Aish Toronto's gala dinner last week, Irwin Cotler – professor of law, former minister of justice and attorney general of Canada, and the Law Society of Upper Canada's first-ever Human Rights Award winner – said his Jewish values are what "underpinned not only my life's work as a lawyer, but underpinned my life itself.

"It was my father who taught me, when I was too young to understand the profundity of his words – he said to me, 'Tzedek, tzedek tirdof,' Justice, justice shall you pursue – which was equal to all the other commandments combined," Cotler said at the fundraiser, which attracted about 500 people to Vaughan's Terrace Banquet Hall in support of Aish Toronto programs, including the Jewish Legal Network, a campus-based initiative that provides support to law students who aim to balance career, family and community life.

Cotler said that throughout his career, he immersed himself in two of the greatest human rights struggles of the second half of the 20th century – Soviet Jewry and the fight against South African apartheid.

"I had my parents' teachings in mind when I said I would be guided in my work by one overarching principal... justice, justice shall you pursue, and within that, the promotion and protection of equality as an organizing principle, the building of a just society, and the promotion and protection of human dignity."

Throughout his 30-minute talk, Cotler outlined a number of Jewish principles that promote human rights and guided him throughout his career, including freedom of speech, the value of which he learned from working with former political prisoners, such as Jewish Agency chair Natan Sharansky and the late South African president Nelson Mandela.

But he was also well aware of the dangers of evil speech, or lashon hara.

"The Holocaust did not begin in the gas chambers. It began with words," he said. "We sometimes forget... that the 21st century began... with the supreme leader of Iran saying that there can be no solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict without the annihilation of the Jewish state."

He said the current Syrian refugee crisis is the "worst humanitarian tragedy since the end of the Second World War in terms of refugees. The epicentre of this tragedy is Syria, where... more than 300,000 people have been killed, 12.5 million of Syrian citizens have been forcibly displaced, close to five million have become refugees."

But, he added, it's important to differentiate between the consequence and the cause of a humanitarian catastrophe such as this one.

"The cause is the criminality today, cause by [Syrian President Bashar] Assad and joined as well now by ISIS and other radical jihadists," he said. "If we don't address the cause, we will continue to suffer and endure the consequences."

Before Cotler spoke, six lawyers who were being honoured for their commitment to justice and community work – Aaron Blumenfeld, Donald Carr, Darrell Gold, Elena Hoffstein, Berl Nadler, and Jordana Stockhamer – took part in a panel discussion offering advice to young lawyers.

Carr, who has been practising law since the 1950s, spoke about his beginnings as a Jewish community "foot soldier" volunteering for UJA of Greater Toronto. He's gone on to volunteer for a number of Jewish organizations, including the United Jewish Welfare Fund, and serves as the CJN's chairman emeritus after more than 20 years as the CJN's president.

"What led me to this, as I've said before, I think there is such a connection between the law and community that is almost, not just an easy step, but virtually part of the practise of law," Carr said.

"You're part of the community and the community operates because of the law." ■

Outremont adopt restrictions on houses of worship

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Members of the chassidic community are vowing to go to court after Outremont adopted a controversial rezoning bylaw Dec. 7 banning new houses of worship on and around Laurier and Bernard avenues.

After a 2-½-hour discussion with a capacity audience of about 60, the borough council voted 4-1 in favour of amendments affecting its busiest commercial arteries.

In a repeat of the result at the proposed modifications' first reading on Nov. 16, Mindy Pollak, who is chassidic, was the only councillor voting against it.

As is common is controversial zoning matters, a public register is expected to be opened, and if a still-to-be-determined sufficient number of citizens sign it, the issue will likely go to a referendum.

The council went ahead despite receiving a lawyer's letter on Dec. 4 demanding that the vote be postponed.

Jacob Karmel and Alex Werzberger, with the support of a large number of members of the chassidic community, have retained prominent civil rights lawyer Julius Grey to fight the rezoning.

They feel the changes target their community, which largely lives in proximity to the affected zones and had recently applied to open another synagogue in the area.

They also object to the designation of a zone in the northeast corner of the borough for any future houses of worship.

Grey objects that the modifications do not take into account the needs of the chassidic community, which is growing at a faster rate than the rest of the population.

"It is clear that the regulation targets them directly, not with the goal of satisfying their needs, but with the goal of bullying them," the letter states. "Furthermore, Outremont has an unfortunate history of strained relations with this community."

Grey notes that the designated zone for houses of worship is a 20- to 30-minute walk from where most of the community lives.

Adopting the bylaw would be an act of "bad faith," as a majority spoke against it at a public consultation on Dec. 1.

The letter demands that the borough suspend going ahead and conduct both a demographic study and a study of its citizens' needs, particularly the religious communities.

The council said it is rezoning in an effort to "revitalize" its commercial districts based on a report of the urban planning department.

Borough Mayor Marie Cinq-Mars said several other Montreal boroughs have adopted similar regulations restricting houses of worship in commercial districts.

On the day of the vote, Outremont council, as well as Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre, also received a letter signed by 25 people, mainly non-chassidic and living in Outremont and elsewhere, who expressed their "grave concern" over the rezoning.

Mayer Feig, right, and Rafael Brecher speak to the media at a public consultation on Dec. 1.

Among the signatories are McGill University law professors Shauna Van Praagh and Tina Piper, lawyers Yves Corriveau and Martha Shea, Université du Québec à Trois-Rivières professor Sylvie Taschereau, as well as rabbis Ascher Grunfeld and Levi Roth of, respectively, the Vizhnitz and Belz communities.

They say the borough should have collected "objective and measurable data" to support the need for these changes, and not one complaint about houses of worship in their midst was recorded from a merchant in the affected zones.

"No public administration in a 21st-century democracy should have proceeded blindly ahead, fostering divisions and tensions with baseless assertions about the impact of communities of faith," they write.

Confining all religious establishments to one small area will cause logistical problems, such as traffic congestion, as well as detract from "human dignity."

"Corralling all people of faith into one area based on evidence-free decision-making contravenes the spirit of the Canadian and Quebec Charters of Rights and Freedoms, the Montreal Declaration on Living Together [signed this past June] and the commitments made by our city as part of our membership in the Canadian and International Coalition of Municipalities Against Racism and Discrimination," the letter reads.

The signatories say Outremont could learn from the neighbouring Plateau Mont-Royal borough, where businesses are now thriving beside places of worship on the previously derelict area around Park and Bernard avenues.

Meanwhile, Luc Ferrandez, leader of the opposition Projet Montréal, also spoke out against Outremont's move, saying it is causing anger and resentment. He urges an immediate city-wide public consultation on how best to integrate new houses of worship in a spirit of tolerance.

That approach is being endorsed by CRARR (Centre for Research-Action on Race Relations), a non-profit organization that fights discrimination. It's critical of Outremont's plan, saying it has caused "social tensions," infringes on rights, and is vague in its definition of "lieux de culte" (places of worship) and "activités religieuses" (religious activities). ■

Korczak set standard for children's rights, book launch told

jshupac@thecjn.ca

The extent to which Polish Jewish pediatrician, educator and orphanage director Janusz Korczak, often called "the father of children's rights," was ahead of his time was emphasized repeatedly at a book launch at Queen's Park last week.

Organized by the Office of the Provincial Advocate for Children and Youth and UNICEF Canada, the Dec. 10 event helped mark the release of Israeli author Lea Lipiner's book My Life as a Child of Janusz Korczak, the Father of Children's Rights: The Biography of Shlomo Nadel, which tells the story of Nadel's experiences growing up between the two world wars in an orphanage in Warsaw founded and run by Korczak.

Korczak was the pen name of Henryk Goldszmit, who founded the first progressive orphanages in Poland to shelter Jewish and Catholic children. After turning down offers of sanctuary from the Polish resistance, he chose to die with the Jewish orphans in his care at Treblinka in 1942.

Lea Lipiner signs books at the launch.

Nadel's father died when he was four and his mother was unable to care for him, so he came to Korczak's orphanage in 1927 at age 7 and stayed until 1935, aged 16. He left Warsaw in 1939 due to rising hostilities there and moved from place to place, finally landing in Uzbekistan. He eventually found his way to Israel, where he lives today. His mother died in the Holocaust.

Korczak's philosophy about respecting children as fully formed human beings and giving them the same rights as adults – concepts we take for granted today – is widely considered to have inspired the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC), ratified by the UN General Assembly in 1989. The launch was timed to honour Human Rights Day.

The event drew about 100 people and included speakers, a book signing by Lipiner and an exhibit of black-and-white photographs from Korczak's orphanage.

Irwin Elman, provincial advocate for children and youth, emphasized the importance of the rights of children and youth in care not being treated as a partisan issue, but one that unites all three parties – a point reflected in the attendance of MPPs from all three parties in the legislature.

"I'm often told, 'You can't legislate love,' but my response is that we can legislate policies that create conditions in which love can flourish. This book is full of examples of that, like Korczak making sure [the deprivation] of food was never used as a punishment against the orphans, or the importance of providing children with mentors," Elman said, stressing that lessons learned from Korczak about creating physically, emotionally and spiritually safe, nourishing and respectful environments for children should be applied to the ways Ontario treats children in state care.

MPP Sylvia Jones, Conservative critic for children and youth services, said reading Lipiner's book showed her "how far we still have to go" to ensure that children and youth in care are protected, while her NDP counterpart, MPP Monique Taylor, said the book "is a powerful read and an example of how we should be treating our children."

Grzegorz Morawski, consul general of Poland in Toronto, underscored the universality of Korczak's message in a world where global conflicts create many orphans each year. He said Korczak's famous quote, "There are no children; there are people," is an important standard by which all children should be treated. ■

BDS votes generate tensions, even when they don't pass

"They have tables, we have tables to offer another side of the story," she said.

Goldfarb said she has never been harassed for expressing her pro-Israel beliefs. "I'm always wearing a Star of David," she said pointing to her necklace. "We're all very comfortable here."

Last year's protest at McMaster came weeks before the students' union voted to endorse a BDS motion, which also heightened tensions on campus.

BDS votes, even if they don't pass, can generate a hostile environment, said Leonard Saxe, a professor of contemporary Jewish studies at Brandeis University and co-author of a report entitled Anti-Semitism and the College Campus: Perceptions and Realities, released earlier this year.

Hillel and other Jewish advocacy groups are quick to point out that BDS votes are largely symbolic, and university administrators continue to forge close ties with their colleagues in Israel. But there is no doubt, Saxe said, that the campaigns themselves generate tension.

"Across the board, the BDS movement has gained steam, and in some ways, it's a more serious situation than it was five years ago," Saxe said in an interview.

In British Columbia, Rabbi Phillip Bregman, executive director of Hillel BC said a contentious BDS vote at the University of British Columbia last year, which was defeated, led to "a storm of anti-Semitic events.

"Relatively speaking, things are quiet," on the seven campuses where BC Hillel works. "If you're smart, you're probably just holding your breath until things are not quiet," he said.

Hayley Goldfarb

Saxe surveyed 3,000 North American Jewish students, including 400 Canadians, and singled out Canadian and California universities as schools with the highest levels of hostility toward Israel. The respondents were students who had applied to go on a Birthright trip and are representative of the average Jewish student on campus, he said.

The survey found that one-third of students reported being verbally harassed because they are Jewish, but on some campuses, this can be as high as 40 or 45 per cent, Saxe said.

Perception of anti-Semitism tends to go "hand in hand with high levels of identification," but it's unclear if these students are an easy target or perceive it more intensely, he said.

Nonetheless, on some campuses, anti-Semitic incidents create "a hostile environment for Jewish students who support Israel's right to exist."

And the survey illustrates that the effects are widespread. "It's not just a small group of the most engaged people who are subjected to this," Saxe said.

Students who are pro-Israel, in fact, face a dilemma when they find themselves unexpectedly thrust into a hostile environment, but have no desire to become embroiled in debate or politics.

Emma Corber, a second-year theatre student at Montreal's Concordia University said, "I'm not here to be an advocate for Israel. I don't want to be a human sacrifice," but she said she was left feeling isolated and powerless after her first semester of school, when an active BDS campaign was underway.

"It was the opposite of a welcome wagon for me. Everywhere I'd go, there was some sort of petitioning going on. I felt really isolated," she said.

"There were posters everywhere. A lot of them would say 'Come to this panel where we're going to uncover Israeli war crimes.' That's really hurtful to see."

The worst was seeing the student newspaper publish a series of articles about Israel and the BDS vote that were "blatant propaganda.

"I saw the newspaper everywhere, and it crushed me."

She says she met with a university dean who empathized with her, but said he was also powerless to intervene.

Corber turned to Hillel as a refuge and a place to meet Jewish friends who understood her feelings, but she is leery of the pro-Israel advocacy she has seen on campus.

"They put out arguments that are one-sided the other way. It's not conducive to positive political discourse and problem-solving," she says. "I'd rather not be a part of any group that's going to add to the flames."

But sometimes, on a volatile campus, the flames are fanned inadvertently.

An anti-Israel protest last month at York that Hillel students were observing escalated and led to campus security being called, said Hillel student president Natalie Slavat, who is in her final year studying psychology.

"A lot of [first-year] students were shocked," she said. "Now they understand the reality."

In response to the protest, Hillel led a prayer for Jewish unity and world peace to offer a more constructive response, Slavat said.

Being an active Zionist on campus can be challenging, especially when the student government has repeatedly pushed a BDS agenda.

"It can feel very uncomfortable to approach them with other issues. It can feel very isolating," to the Jewish student community, she said.

Slavat recently spoke with students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto as part of a workshop on life after high school.

"When you grow up in Jewish day school, the experience of coming to campus can be nerve-wracking," she said.

But her message to students was unequivocal. "As much as it's tough, it's very, very rewarding. I'm very passionate about the opportunity to stand up for the Jewish People and Israel on campus," she said in an interview. "I feel very lucky to do the work that I do."

The reality is that on many campuses, students wish that Slavat and her activist peers did not have any work to do at all. ■

Applications down for prestigious Israeli fellowship

LILA SARICK
lsarick@thecjn.ca

The Bronfman Youth Fellowships are still looking for a few good teens.

The prestigious Israel study program for students entering Grade 12 usually attracts 300 applicants each year for 26 spots, but worries about security have led only 150 students to apply so far, organizers say. The deadline to submit an application is Jan. 6.

Highly publicized attacks in Israel and the U.S. State department's caution on worldwide travel issued last month are likely responsible for the shortfall, said New York-based Becky Voorwinde, co-director of the program.

"For people who are watching the news, there's added fear," she said.

The highly selective program offers a five-week trip to Israel, where students travel and meet with leading Israeli thinkers, artists and educators. Students also participate in two educational seminars in New York and undertake a social action project.

The program is also unique, in that nearly all costs are paid, with families responsible for a $600 fee and airfare to New York for the two educational seminars. Financial aid is available to cover those expenses for families if necessary, Voorwinde said.

The program attracts a diverse group of high school students. About two or three Canadians are among the 26 fellows selected annually, she said.

Although the program is now in its 30th year, the challenge is still getting the word out, especially to students who are less connected to the Jewish community, she said.

Applications from students in Jewish high schools, across denominations, have remained stable, she added."We're not panicked that we won't have a strong cohort, but we really want to reach the widest pool of candidates possible." After a recent conference call with 40 families, more applications were completed, she said.

> For people who are watching the news, there's added fear.

The program has not changed its security protocols, but in the last year, there has been a greater attempt to inform parents about how decisions are made about where to tour in Israel, she said.

Enrolment is also down slightly at the Conservative movement's high school semester in Jerusalem program, which starts next month, said Judy Greene, registrar for Ramah's Israel programs.

"We have 36 students. We usually have 50, but we're still receiving applications," she said, adding that most parents are very supportive of their children going to Israel, and sometimes it's the students who feel they should go to Israel another time.

Applications for the movement's summer program, Ramah Seminar, are up, however, compared to last year, she said.

Bronfman Fellowships runs a similar program for Israeli high school students in New York, and their parents "were just as anxious at having their children come to America as Canadian and American families were about their children coming to Israel," Voorwinde said.

Students entering Grade 12 in 2016 can apply to the Bronfman Fellowship at www.bronfman.org. ■

Defence experts back IDF's 2014 Gaza claim

Report says Israel set a standard no other army can match

JUDAH ARI GROSS
JERUSALEM

Armies of the world would be rendered far less effective if they were forced to operate under the same restrictions as the Israel Defence Force (IDF) during last summer's Gaza campaign, a group of former military and defence leaders from nine countries claim in a new report released Dec. 11.

Following a months-long investigation into the 50-day conflict, the High Level Military Group (HLMG) – made up of retired generals and defence officials from Germany, Colombia, India, Spain, Australia, the United States, France, the United Kingdom and Italy – found that Israel not only abided by the laws of armed conflict, but far surpassed their requirements, despite damning reports by the UN and non-governmental organizations that accused the IDF of potential war crimes.

The group had already defended Israel's actions in the Gaza Strip earlier this year, submitting their preliminary findings to the UN Human Rights Commission's probe into the operation, but the group's final 80-page report goes far beyond their initial assessment.

"Our findings were diametrically opposed to the UN report," Col. Richard Kemp, one of the document's authors and the former commander of British forces in Afghanistan, told the Times of Israel, blasting the lack of military expertise by the United Nations commission that investigated the conflict. "The UN report was done too quickly and was done by the wrong people."

The HLMG, which includes, the former chairman of the NATO military committee, the former chief of staff of the Italian army, a former U.S. ambassador-at-large on war crimes and the former director-general of the Indian Defence Intelligence Agency, was formed by the Friends of Israel Initiative, a group created by former Spanish prime minister José María Aznar in 2010 to fight an "unprecedented campaign of delegitimation against Israel."

The UN and NGO reports were investigated by human rights experts, not military personnel who are familiar with the laws of armed conflict. Because of that, the commissions investigating Operation Protective Edge arrived at biased and inaccurate conclusions, Kemp said.

A central issue in all of these reports is that of civilian casualties. One of the problems, the report found, was the UN accepted Hamas' figures for combatant vs. civilian casualties, which put the ratio at close to 70 per cent non-combatants of the 2,000 or so deaths, compared to the dramatically lower 50 per cent that Israel claims.

A new report shows the IDF abided by the laws of armed conflict during the 2014 conflict in Gaza. ISRAEL SUN PHOTO

The HLMG found Hamas' numbers to be rife with inconsistencies, such as the "inclusion of duplicate names, incorrect ages, combat-related deaths caused by Hamas or its affiliate organizations, such as in the case of misfired rockets, and deaths not related to the hostilities but classified as such."

More problematic, however, is that the UN and NGO reports were researched from a human rights standpoint and treated the concept of civilian deaths as inherently wrong, even when those incidents occurred under legally acceptable circumstances, Kemp said.

"Human rights law was not the right set of laws to govern this; the laws of armed conflict are," he added.

Commissions investigating the conflict should have looked to see that everything feasibly was done to avoid the deaths of non-combatants, not that casualties didn't happen, as they inevitably will in wartime. That standard of zero civilian deaths is an impossible one, Kemp said.

The 11 former army and governmental officials found that Israel adopted a far higher level of restraint than other militaries citing Israel's now famous "knock on the roof" technique of dropping a non-explosive ordnance to alert residents that their building is about to be bombed, the telephone calls and leaflets dropped warning non-combatants to leave the scene of an impending attack and numerous examples of missions cancelled due to potential non-combatant casualties.

"That threshold isn't something other nations could handle," Kemp said. This standard is a hindrance to military expediency, Kemp argued. "You can't achieve that aim and also be effective." The group met with representatives throughout Israel's defence and political structure, from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to enlisted soldiers who fought in Gaza, while gathering material for their report.

Kemp, who also previously led the UK Joint Intelligence Committee's international terrorism team, has defended Israeli military actions against Gaza before, testifying before the UN's Goldstone commission on Israel's 2008-2009 Operation Cast Lead. The rest of the group, however, had only brief or tangential connections with the IDF, and many came in to the group anticipating to find indications of Israeli crimes, Kemp said.

But the HLMG found practically none, laying the blame for the vast majority of civilian casualties at the feet of Hamas instead, who they claim instituted a deliberate policy to cause as many Palestinian civilian deaths as possible in order to wage a PR war against Israel. The report lauded not only Israel's aforementioned operational measures to avoid civilian casualties, but also its overall strategic and organizational structure, which required the constant involvement of Military Advocate General representatives to ensure that the laws of warfare and rules of engagement were respected.

The report noted that Israel tried multiple times to avoid and end the conflict through diplomatic means, only to be rebuffed by Hamas at every turn.

The report decries Hamas' use of human shields and confirms many of the allegations levied against the terrorist group, namely that they used hospitals, UN schools, ambulances and other "sensitive sites" in order to force Israel into compromising positions and bring about international condemnation against the Jewish state.

In addition to the military aspects of last summer's operation, the HLMG focused considerable attention on Hamas' manipulation of the media, noting both censorship and "proactive fabrication" as tools in the terror group's PR arsenal.

Hamas forcibly prevented the media from taking and publishing photographs of wounded fighters, only allowing pictures of wounded civilians, the report found. Hamas would also "prepare" the scenes after Israeli strikes, removing weapons and fighters, before allowing journalists into the area in order to make it appear as though only civilians were hit in the attacks.

The HLMG blamed not only the terror organization for perpetuating these acts of bullying and chicanery, but also the international media for not being more forthright about the clearly distorted and censored view of Gaza that they were reporting. Though some news outlets later admitted to the manipulations, the HLMG found, the damage was already done.

The same might be said of the HLMG report. With reports by the UN, Amnesty International, Israel's Breaking the Silence, and others, the HLMG document may be too little too late.

In addition to their public release of the document, the group already has plans to discuss their findings with the U.S. Congress, and members of the HLMG will also speak in their home countries. Though there are not yet official plans in the works, the group also hopes to present their findings to the UN, the International Criminal Court and other global bodies, Kemp said. ■

Obama calls on Israel, Palestinians to work together to diffuse tensions

JTA
NEW YORK

U.S. President Barack Obama, making a surprise address, told a Ha'aretz-sponsored conference in New York that Israelis and Palestinians must "exercise restraint."

"Inexcusable violence has taken too many lives – Israelis, Palestinians, Americans and others," Obama said via teleconference on Dec. 13 at the liberal Israeli newspaper's event with the New Israel Fund. "I've been clear that Palestinian leaders have to condemn the ongoing attacks and stop the cycle. Individuals responsible for violence, including violence against Palestinians, have to be brought to justice, and we call on both sides to work to diffuse tensions, exercise restraint, prevent more loss of life and restore hope.

"Of course, the best way to reduce tensions and ensure Israel's own security is to continue working in concrete ways towards a two-state solution."

A spate of attacks since October has killed 22 people, according to the Israeli government. In the same period, 106 Palestinians have been killed by Israeli soldiers, police or civilians either while committing attacks or in their aftermath, on suspicion that they were about to carry out attacks or clashes with Israeli forces, Reuters reported last week.

The U.S. leader, who was not on the program of speakers, told the audience of approximately 600 at the Roosevelt Hotel that they would always have a partner for peace in him and in the United States.

"Peace is necessary, just and possible," Obama said.

Israel's president, Reuven Rivlin, in his keynote address noted his visit last week with Obama and emphasized that "the president's commitment to a secure Israel is beyond any question."

Saying peace is important for Israel's safety and security, Rivlin said, "For that we need to think outside of the box."

The conference, the first of its kind for Ha'aretz in the United States, is designed to provide a "unique platform for robust debate and intelligent reflection" on key issues regarding Israel, according to the newspaper.

"Isolated under [Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu, the editors of Israel's leading liberal newspaper are coming to New York to try to restore a sense of reason," Aluf Benn, editor-in-chief of Ha'aretz, wrote in the Daily Beast on Dec 11. "We begin by turning to our American friends whose voices have been drowned out for too long."

Rivlin, saying he sometimes is "annoyed and angry" by what he reads in Ha'aretz, said however that the newspaper is "a beacon for freedom of expression in Israel" and "I am here today because I believe the free market of ideas is a holy principle."

With Breaking the Silence – an Israeli organization of military veterans that accuses Israeli soldiers of mistreating Palestinians – presenting on one of the panels, Rivlin praised the morality of the Israel Defence Forces and earned vigorous applause.

"The IDF does everything in its power to keep the highest moral standard possible, even under impossible conditions," he said, adding that no other army in the world is as moral.

Tzipi Livni, a Knesset lawmaker from the centre-left Zionist Union party and Israel's former justice minister, in her address criticized the settlements.

"Settlements don't give security to Israel," she said, "settlements take security from Israel."

Saeb Erekat, the secretary-general of the PLO and a leading negotiator for the Palestinians, said the source of the current violence is failed peace talks.

"When every day we bury our loved ones – it's for one thing," Erekat said. "It's our failure to achieve peace. It's our failure to achieve a two-state solution." He begged the audience not to give up on the idea.

Erekat insisted that Israel has a partner for peace with the Palestinians, saying the conflict with Israel is purely political. He also called the Islamic State terrorist group "criminals and thugs," saying they have nothing to do with Islam. ■

Israel has an interest in stopping global warming, Netanyahu says

JTA
JERUSALEM

Israel "will do its part" to help slow global warming under the climate agreement signed in Paris, Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said.

"Like the other countries, we have an interest in ensuring that global warming, if it will not be halted, will at least be slowed down – and Israel will do its part," Netanyahu said last Sunday at the weekly Cabinet meeting of the agreement signed by 196 countries on Dec. 12 in Paris after nearly two weeks of negotiations.

The agreement seeks to reduce greenhouse gases emissions, which are blamed for global warming.

"This is a complex international mission. It is built on the premise that large and small countries alike will not deviate from it," Netanyahu said. "This demands international discipline, which is not easy, but for the good of humanity, I hope that it will be found. It will certainly be found in the State of Israel."

Benjamin Netanyahu

The prime minister cited the fact that Israel is a leader in wastewater purification technologies, recycling and water desalination, and has a national plan for alternatives to oil.

"We will reduce greenhouse gas emissions on behalf of future generations," Netanyahu pledged.

Israel was represented at the talks by Environmental Protection Minister Avi Gabbay and other Knesset members. The Israeli government presented a target of reducing the country's growth in greenhouse gas emissions by 25 per cent by 2030, according to Ha'aretz.

"History will remember this day," U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon said after the agreement was passed. "The Paris agreement on climate change is a monumental success for the planet and its people."

The agreement is considered a major diplomatic achievement for the Obama administration, which has made climate change a signature issue, despite major opposition from congressional Republicans. ■

Trump brushes off Bibi's comments

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
WASHINGTON

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump says that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's criticism of his widely condemned calls to ban Muslim entry to the United States was "modest," but still "inappropriate."

In an interview to CNN aired last Sunday the GOP front-runner brushed off the dropped meeting and Netanyahu's comments rejecting the ban.

Netanyahu "did [condemn the call], and that was sort of interesting," Trump said. "He modestly condemned [the statements], and I thought it was sort of inappropriate that he condemned them, but that's OK. He wanted to condemn them, that's what he does."

Netanyahu, Trump remarked, did not reject his comments about Muslims outright, and he insisted he could still meet the prime minister anytime he wanted.

"They're not distancing themselves [from me]," Trump said of the Israeli government. "I had a meeting [set up] with Netanyahu. I could be at the meeting right now."

He also told CNN that his Muslim friends back him for highlighting the problems of extremism within their community, even if they don't support the idea of a travel ban.

Trump last week cancelled a scheduled trip to Israel, after Netanyahu rejected his comments but indicated that he would still meet with the businessman. He said in an interview Dec. 10 that he was postponing the slated Dec. 28 visit for "lots of different reasons," including a desire to take pressure off Netanyahu.

On Twitter, Trump said the meeting with Netanyahu would take place "after I become president of the U.S."

After the visit was postponed, Netanyahu's office said it had nothing to do with the announcement and he had not spoken to Trump about the matter.

Trump's call last week for a "total and complete shutdown of Muslims entering the United States" drew anger in the United States and around the world. In Israel, 37 lawmakers signed a petition calling on Netanyahu to cancel his planned meeting with Trump.

A Reuters/Ipsos survey released Dec. 11 showed that 35 per cent of Republican voters support Trump, putting him far ahead of his closest rival Ben Carson, who has the backing of just 12 per cent of voters. ■

OPINION

A nation that still dwells alone

Gerald Steinberg

Theodor Herzl's Zionist vision was of a state that would be like any other, bringing an end to anti-Semitism, isolation and vulnerability.

However, after 67 years of sovereignty, this is far from the reality. Israel is the focus of a new form of anti-Semitism, expressed through double standards and obsessive attacks, not only from Palestinians and many Muslim countries, but also among western elites. As a consequence, many Israelis and Jews have given up on the so-called "international community", the media, "human rights" groups and global bodies such as the United Nations and Red Cross.

The use of double standards and singling-out of Israel was most recently reflected in the exclusion of Israeli victims from the outpouring of sympathy and condolences following what are often referred to as "global terror attacks" in Paris, Mali, and California. On Facebook memorial pages, in media coverage, and in official memorial ceremonies, the Israeli flag is absent, as are the names and faces of the victims. Between Sept. 13 and Dec. 6, 2015, there were 88 stabbings, 32 shootings, and 14 car rammings, killing 22 and wounding 215 Israelis.

Among many western politicians, in the media and for groups claiming to promote human rights, there is more than a hint of the view that the Israeli victims "had it coming", and that the terrorists are the real victims. A typical BBC headline declared "Palestinian shot dead after Jerusalem attack kills two," turning terrorists into victims. Similarly, Sky News told viewers: "Palestinians shot dead in alleged knife attacks."

In a different way, the EU's Ambassador to Israel, Lars Faaborg-Andersen, tried to justify the European double standard by alleging that "ISIS [Islamic State] is organized terror, and it should be countered with force. Palestinian terror should be met with diplomatic and political means."

This moral inversion, including from many political leaders, led to an angry response from Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, expressing the wider fury. "Whoever condemned the attacks in France needs to condemn the attacks in Israel. It's the same terror. Whoever does not do this is a hypocrite and blind."

> The prize for hypocrisy goes to Swedish Foreign Minister

However, Sweden's Prime Minister Stefan Lofven, rejected Netanyahu's demand. In a response to a question, he stated, "No, it [meaning the Palestinian attacks against Israelis] is not classified as [terrorism]. There is an international classification regarding what constitutes or does not constitute [terror]. As far as I know, the [stabbing attacks in Israel] are not defined as terror." After some criticism, he issued what was termed a clarification, claiming "that it was unclear if the knife attacks are organized by a group classified as a terrorist organization." This only served to highlight the problem.

But the double standards denying that Israelis are equal victims, and the repletion of Palestinian justifications for terror, are only part of the problem. In parallel, a widespread campaign is underway to delegitimize the Israeli defence against the terrorists, while approving the forceful (and late) responses following the attacks in Paris, Brussels, and San Bernardino.

A number of anti-Israel "human rights" groups, including Amnesty International, have exploited the stabbing attacks to repeat blood libels, again accusing Israel of using "excessive force". The NGO created the fiction of "heavily armed soldiers and police wearing body armour facing a possible knife attack", in contrast to the reality of unarmed victims, including children and elderly civilians.

The prize for hypocrisy goes to Swedish Foreign Minister Margot Wallstrom, who, echoing Amnesty, accused Israel of conducting "extrajudicial executions" of Palestinian terrorists. (She also mentioned "Palestinian frustration" with Israel as a factor in the Paris attacks.) Following Israeli outrage, a confused "correction" was issued which, like her prime minister's, only highlighted the problem.

By singling out the Jewish state repeatedly and in so many ways, Western politicians and "progressive" leaders are reinforcing the widely held view among Israelis that Herzl's goal is a mirage. For this group, we have always been a "nation that dwells alone" and nothing has changed. ■

Barcelona home to one of the Europe's oldest shuls

MARILYN LAZAR
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Is it the oldest synagogue in Spain? The oldest Sephardi synagogue anywhere? It seems that there are more claims about this minuscule edifice than actual square footage. Suffice it to say, it is one of the oldest synagogues in Europe and was once the main synagogue of Barcelona.

The Sinagoga Major de Barcelona is tucked deep into the Barrio Gothico or Gothic Quarter of Barcelona and it wasn't easy to find. Remains of the ancient synagogue still survive in the Call Jueu, or old Jewish Quarter, very near the Plaça de Sant Jaume, right in the middle of this Barcelona neighbourhood.

In contrast with the well-marked and heavily-trodden path to La Seu, the huge Cathedral of Barcelona, and other Gothic churches, including Santa Maria del Pi in whose shadows it literally sits, the ancient synagogue of Barcelona in the old Jewish Quarter is a small gem that almost requires a treasure hunt to locate. Even armed with a warning that it isn't well-marked and wearing good walking shoes as I tracked back and forth multiple times on endless narrow cobblestone streets, I was confounded by my search.

I heard Hebrew being spoken multiple times during eight days in Barcelona. In fact, it was easier to find Israelis visiting Barcelona than to find the old Jewish Quarter of the city. Come with a map and double check directions.

When we finally wended our way in, we were joined by accidental tourists, not Jewish, nor having ever heard of the synagogue, let alone seeking it; they rather fell upon it by accident and found the site fascinating enough to explore.

The old synagogue is a museum now, with a short presentation put on by volunteers and supported by a modest entrance fee of 2.50 euros. The Sinagoga Major attracted as many as 20,000 visitors in a recent year. Those that visit enjoy personalized attention and patient answers to all questions from a member of the Jewish community.

The Antiga Sinagoga in the medieval Jewish Quarter of Barcelona lay in the shadow of the cathedral both literally and figuratively. Under the careful scrutiny of the Catholic Church, no other religion's temple height or size was permitted to exceed that of the smallest church in town. Based on archival reconstruction of the route followed by a 13th-century tax collector that ended at the Sinagoga Major, research pointed to the current site as the location of the Ancient Synagogue.

Over the centuries, additional storeys were added to the building, which was used for many purposes including as a jail and as a warehouse. Its original use was forgotten. The Call Association of Barcelona, comprised of historians of many different religions, has taken on its recovery and restoration. They are united in their belief in the importance of preserving the Jewish history of the area. Excavation began in 1996.

The original exterior of the building was constructed in compliance with religious requirements in that it faces eastward toward Jerusalem and has two windows. In fact, the eastward orientation of the building toward Jerusalem broke with the northwest/southeast alignment of the streets in its neighbourhood. Discovering this wall was pivotal in recognizing the Jewish history of the building.

The building re-opened to the public as a synagogue and museum in 2002. The presentation is given in what was once the main section of the synagogue. There is no access to the original women's section, which is now behind a wall and part of another property. There aren't regular services held at the Sinagoga Major, but it can be used for festive occasions. In 2003, a Canadian couple was the first to be married there in more than 600 years. A 500-year-old Torah scroll was donated to the synagogue in 2006. The original structure dates back to Roman times. There are many interesting details to note including the number 18 carved into a stone.

There was a strong Jewish presence in Barcelona during medieval times and until 1391. By the time the Jews were officially expelled from Spain in 1492, they had been gone from Barcelona for 100 years, either forced to convert or fled. The synagogue is located at No. 5 Marlet St. Explore. Find it on your own or arrange a private guide for a walking tour of the Jewish quarter including the Ancient Synagogue through your concierge at any major hotel. ■

Teen tryouts for JCC Maccabi hockey team announced

plungen@thecjn.ca

If it's early August, it must be hockey season. At least it will be at next summer's JCC Maccabi Games in Stamford, Conn.

The Games, which will be held Aug. 7 to 12, will now include an ice hockey component, to replace an inline hockey competition.

Tryouts for the Toronto team will be held on Dec. 17, 6:30-8 p.m., at the Rosemount Community Centre on New Westminster Drive in Vaughan. A second round of tryouts will take place in January, said Alex Voihanski, managing director of JCC Chai Sports, who is assembling the team.

Any player who will be no younger than 13 and no older than 16 by Aug. 1, 2016, is welcome to attend.

"There has been a push by several delegations including ours to make this change. It is much easier to recruit and attract more players," said Voihanski.

"The sport of inline hockey has really deteriorated, especially in Canada. With most competitive ice hockey players playing year round, inline hockey has seen a massive dip in numbers," he said.

The Toronto team will be coached by Spencer Hyman, who was part of the Canadian gold medal hockey team at the 2013 Maccabiah Games in Israel. Hyman played at the University of Michigan and is now coach of Markham Royals of the OJHL, Voihanski said. ■

Writer witnessed the horrors of prewar Soviet Union

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Rhea Clyman, an accomplished journalist born to a Jewish family in Toronto in 1904, wrote many front-page newspaper stories in the late 1920s and 1930s about political events and their tragic human consequences in Russia, Ukraine and Germany, but died in near-obscurity in New York in 1981.

Clyman wrote rare and chilling eyewitness accounts of the Soviet Union's government-induced famine in the Ukraine known as the Holodomor. She also travelled to Murmansk through treacherous terrain by automobile and train, and exposed the inhumane conditions of gulags and labour camps in Russia's far north.

After becoming the first foreign correspondent expelled from Russia in more than a decade, she reported on events in Hitler's Germany with equal fearlessness. Her stories appeared in the London Daily Express and the Toronto Telegram, where editors would often place them prominently on the first page and continue them inside.

Jars Balan, a scholar of Ukrainian studies at the University of Alberta, recently discovered Clyman's stories, and has been researching her life with the intention of writing a book about her. Balan recently presented a talk on the little-remembered journalist at a meeting of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Toronto.

An intrepid and determined person, Clyman didn't let the fact that she was a single woman hold her back, Balan said. Neither was she much deterred by the fact that she was missing part of a leg due to a streetcar accident in childhood.

Clyman studied business and commerce in Toronto, then went to New York and worked briefly as a secretary. She moved successively to London, Paris and Germany, acquiring an impressive smattering of French and German in turn. "She had a gift for picking up languages, and was very bright," Balan said. "When she went to Moscow, she obviously learned Russian well enough that she didn't need a translator."

The timing of her arrival in Russia in late 1928 "was auspicious," Balan said. "The Soviet Union, under Stalin's leadership, was just embarking on the first of its five-year plans to rapidly industrialize the Russian economy and forcibly collectivize Russian agriculture."

Previously a supporter from afar of Soviet reforms, the 24-year-old Canadian was appalled by the realities she witnesses on the ground. She wrote candid reports about the horrific plight of the prisoners she encountered in the remote northern forests and mines where they had been deported, and where they were fed just enough calories per day to keep them alive. "The Nazis actually learned about concentration camps from the Russians," Balan said.

At Solovetsky Island Prison, an area that was supposedly closed to foreigners, Clyman typically bluffed her way through various perils. "She was incredibly resourceful and she was fearless," Balan said. "The woman had moxie. She didn't pull any punches."

When she told her editor she was going to Ukraine, he bade her farewell and said he had already written her obituary. She and her companions drove through countless deserted Ukrainian farming villages where the villagers had already been deported. The few people remaining were so desperate for sustenance they were down on all fours, eating grass like cattle.

"In this area the famine didn't even really take hold until a few months later," Balan said. "People were dying 25,000 a day just of starvation. We're not including the people they shot or the ones who died in the gulag."

Towards the end of the evening, Balan said he was interested in speaking with anyone in the audience who might have known Clyman or been related to her, and could tell him more about her. He seemed delighted when an elderly woman identified herself as Clyman's first cousin. ■

CHAT grad making waves on the big screen

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

After The CJN profiled filmmaker Allan Ungar in September 2014, CHAT invited him to speak at his alma mater on career day.

"I guess they didn't want to just limit it to lawyers and doctors; they wanted to give the kids an idea that there are other things you can branch out into," he says with a laugh.

Obviously, CHAT has a bevy of esteemed, creative alumni, but Ungar, now 27, is making waves on the big screen. His second feature film, Gridlocked, had its world premiere at the Fantastic Fest in Austin, Texas before making its Canadian debut at the Toronto After Dark Film Festival in October.

Gridlocked, an action movie that Ungar co-wrote and directed, stars Danny Glover and Trish Stratus. Canadian distributor Mongrel Media recently picked it up.

Lately though, Ungar has been taking a break from directing in order to write and produce.

This past summer he co-produced Lower Bay that stars Christopher Lloyd – best known as Doc Brown in the Back To The Future trilogy – about the abandoned – and apparently haunted – subway platform beneath Toronto's busy Bay Station.

Ungar, says there's something distinctly Canadian about the movie because it's actually set in Toronto, unlike the many productions that use this city as a stand-in for place like Chicago and New York.

Allan Ungar on the underground set of Lower Bay, his newest project which is about a haunted subway station platform.

That's part of what drew Ungar to the project. "And to be honest, I had always wanted to go down to that abandoned tunnel. I just wanted a chance to go down and see what it looked like," he says.

Despite working underground with a cast and crew, he admits that the experience was a spooky one. "In the back of your mind," he says, "you're sort of like, some weird stuff definitely took place here about 40 to 50 years ago."

Along with the inherent creepiness of the set, Lower Bay features horror movie legends, including the executive producer of The Ring and scream queen Rose McGowan.

Beyond producing Lower Bay, Ungar is stepping outside of his comfort zone in his latest writing projects. He's currently working with director Dominic Sena (Swordfish, Gone in 60 Seconds) to pen an adaptation of the New York Times best-selling romance novel Ugly Love.

Yet, he doesn't mind that it's a departure from his usual fare. "At the end of the day, I love movies and I appreciate a good story with great characters and resonance," he says while describing how he chooses his projects.

He's also pleased to working with Glover and Lloyd, two of his own movie heroes. "Within the span of a year, getting to work with these two old-timers that I really look up to and respect was really cathartic, it was a really neat experience."

As The CJN previously reported, Ungar spent some time in Los Angeles while taking a break from his undergraduate studies at York University. For now, he's eager to continue working in Toronto.

"I want to stay here," he says. "I think we have so many incredible resources, so many talented people. If I could stay here for the rest of my life and make movies, nothing would make me happier." ■

The wartime pope and his successors

NORMAN RAVVIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Pope-watching is a challenging business these days. Pope Francis, like John Paul II, asserts his position on pressing issues of political and social importance. Last month in Nairobi, Francis toured urban slums and spoke out against what he called "new forms of colonialism, which would make African countries parts of a machine, cogs on a gigantic wheel."

While he spoke out against the threat of "faceless private developers" encroaching on slum playgrounds, he criticized countries that "adopt policies typical of the culture of waste, like those aimed at lowering the birthrate."

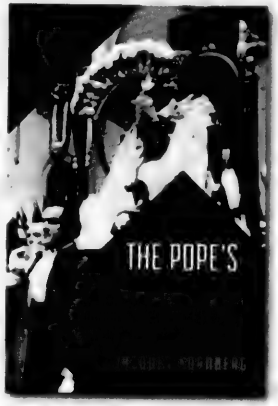
Without the full transcript of Francis's Nairobi speech, it is impossible to guess at how a "culture of waste" would be propelled by a lower birth rate. But certainly, inveighing against birth control in a developing country places him in the company of all the modern popes, including the socially conservative Pope John Paul II, reaching back to Pope Leo XIII, whose papacy began in 1878. In its foreign policy, the papacy has been unremittingly guided by the belief that religious principles trump all other forms of political idealism.

The repercussions of this phenomenon are the focus of The Pope's Dilemma: Pius XII Faces Atrocities and Genocide in the Second World War. One understands Francis's public performance after reading Kornberg's detailed study of Pope Pius XII's response to the German destruction of European Jewish communities. Jacques Kornberg develops his comparative approach by examining the equally passive responses of Pius's predecessors to human catastrophes in Belgium, Armenia and Ethiopia.

Pius XII ascended to the papacy in March of 1939, with Europe well under the shadow of war. Before this, he played a key role as the Vatican Secretary of State – in this position he was known as Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli. It was Pacelli, in 1933, who negotiated the Concordat between the Church and Hitler. This agreement reflected the popularity of Nazism among German Catholics, and it was aimed, above all else, at preventing moves by the German Reich to further dismantle German church authority, educational institutions, and the rights of religious marriage.

This Concordat between the Vatican and the Nazi Reich – now a historical detail that is largely overshadowed by wartime events – encapsulates the Vatican's guiding principles with regard to the rise of Nazism in competition with the Christian faith. It would stand, too, as a set of guiding principles by which to respond to atrocities perpetrated by Catholic Nazis, as well as to knowledge of widespread dispossession and mass murder of Jews in occupied Europe.

Kornberg highlights the Vatican's unwillingness to voice direct opposition to wartime events by singling out the rare European cardinal or bishop who wrote, often privately and in great agitation, to ask the pope to speak out. In Hungary, Apostolic Nuncio (or ambassador) Angelo Rotta publicly petitioned Hungarian ministers in response to the deportation of Hungarian Jews to Auschwitz. In Poland the church was a direct target of German persecution. Kornberg tells the tale in numbers. In one archdiocese – that of prewar Posen – there were "681 secular priests, and 147 in religious orders, making 828 prior to the occupation. By October 1941, of these, 74 had been executed or had died in concentration camps, 41 were in jail or concentration camps, and 120 had been deported to other parts of Poland .... Of 441 churches in the archdiocese, 396 were sealed shut by the authorities or expropriated for other uses, leaving 30 churches for Poles to worship in and 15 for ethnic Germans."



The Pope's Dilemma: Pius XII Faces Atrocities and Genocide in the Second World War
By Jacques Kornberg

University of Toronto Press

In response to this devastation the pope did not encourage Poles to actively resist German occupation, and offered little in response to "a barrage of pleas from Polish bishops and the Polish government-in-exile." The most outspoken among these was Archbishop Sapieha of Krakow, Poland's senior wartime cleric. Sapieha's secretaries were sent to a concentration camp, while Sapieha was tailed by the Gestapo. In the Vatican's view, in light of these events, appeasement of the German regime remained tantamount, since the "salvation of souls required pastoral care, the churches open, bishops in authority, priests available, and the sacraments at hand." Opposition, in the Vatican's view, would threaten "the church's role in the care of souls."

In the course of Kornberg's wide-ranging argument, which addresses prewar efforts and wartime in numerous European countries, he reiterates this equation as he examines Vatican foreign policy, the background discussions underlying this policy, as well as Pius XII's leadership.

The Pope's Dilemma paints a dark picture of the depiction of Jews in Vatican sources before and during the war. Europe's Jews were consistently characterized as perpetrators of deicide and as a threat. In the late 1930s, a characteristic piece in the Jesuit journal Civiltà Cattolica argued that Jews undermined Christian society. Upon the fall of Italian dictator Benito Mussolini, in 1943, the Roman Church did not call for the abrogation of the Italian anti-Jewish decrees modelled on the German Nuremberg Laws. Rather, an exemption was added for Catholics of Jewish descent from the decrees' far-reaching goal of excluding Jews from civil society.

The reader's experience of Kornberg's detailed argument is akin to a weaker fighter at the hands of Muhammad Ali. Each new fact, scenario, anecdote is like a blow against which one has no argument or defence. The overall effect is one of defeat – Kornberg calls it "moral failure" – the absolute absence of anything redeeming in the historical tableaux.

Pope Pius XII "adhered," Kornberg tells us, "to the mainline Catholic theology of his time, which required that he avoid condemning Catholics complicit in Axis crimes, so as not to alienate them from the Church." His priorities, Kornberg adds, "were spiritual."

What can one say in response to this moral equation? Primo Levi's formulation was that morality should not be understood as laws handed down from on high, but instead, as rules of behaviour derived from actual experience and action.

When the present Pope looks out over a crowded Nairobi slum and inveighs against the "colonial" character of birth control, one might think a translator has somehow failed the journalist of record. But upon reading Kornberg's record of Pius XII's response to German genocidal acts, one understands Francis's logic in terms clear and astonishing. ■

WRY BREAD

Lights, not sabres

David Levine

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Schwartz and Evan,

I'm writing to bring you up to date on Evan's recent report about Chanukah, A Light of Hope in the Darkness. While it was clearly the product of a great deal of effort, it seems that Evan remains confused about the important role Chanukah plays in his heritage – despite the many hours we've dedicated to the holiday in class. I wanted to make you aware of my concerns so that we can work together toward a solution before things get out of hand.

Evan's class spent two weeks learning about Chanukah – we made latkes, played dreidel, lit the chanukiyah, and learned about the history of the holiday: about Judah leading the Maccabees to victory over a powerful enemy and the miracle of the oil that lasted eight days. The students were then asked to write a short report, putting themselves into the Chanukah story as soldiers in Judah Maccabee's army.

We all know that Evan is a creative child – it's part of what makes him such a pleasure to have in class. This report, however, seems to be a garbled product of that creativity, combining his excitement for Chanukah with his excitement for a certain inescapable secular holiday that's just around the corner.

Below are my notes on Evan's report. Please take some time over the holidays to review them together with him:

• The Middle East is not in "a galaxy far, far away."

• The Maccabees were a rebel army that used guerrilla tactics to win back their rights from an evil empire – but they did not have a "rebel base," or a "fleet."

• The menorah was a holy object, and it would never have been used as a weapon.

• While it is true that Chanukah is the "Festival of Lights," and that the Maccabees used swords in their battles, the term "light sabre" is not a part of the holiday story.

• Jews are not "reform Jedis."

• The Seleucids from the Chanukah story may well have been an evil empire – but the territories they controlled were all on the planet Earth, and real.

• (Most rabbinical sources agree that) the emperor did not have "super powers" of any kind.

• Judah (or Yehudah) the Maccabee was a heroic leader of a rebel army – but he was a human being of average size and normal complexion, who spoke with proper syntax and did not disappear into thin air when he died.

• Hoth is not a month on the Hebrew calendar.

• (Most rabbinical sources agree that) Judah did not perform "Jewish mind tricks" in order to defeat Antiochus – who did not "explode" after Judah lit the menorah – which he did not do with a flamethrower.

• God's name is not interchangeable with "The Force."

• No Jewish prayers include the word "Chewbacca" (Rabbi Gold was not happy).

I applaud the skill behind Evan's illustrations. He clearly put a lot of time and effort into them. I'm happy to put them up on the bulletin board with the rest of the students' work, but I think everyone involved would be happier if Evan's drawings more closely resembled those of his classmates, and were a shade less blasphemous. Maybe over the holidays you can work on drawings that contain more of the Chanukah stories and games we learned about in class, and fewer images of robots being decapitated in the Holy of Holies.

While Evan's confusion might be understandable, I think it's important that we work quickly to correct it by reinforcing at home the message we've been delivering in school: that this December, millions of people around the world will gather with friends and relatives to celebrate a cultural (and, for many, spiritual) experience greater than themselves, and to retell those tales of bravery and rebellion that still define so much of our culture and so many childhood memories. Could a movie do all that?

Happy Chanukah, and all the best!
Mrs. Gildenblick ■

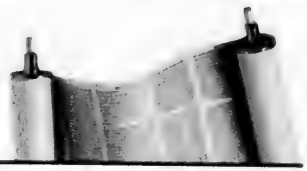
Vayigash | Genesis 44:18-47:27



Rabbi Aaron Katchen explains Judaism's vision of two messiahs
Rabbi Michal Shekel studies Jacob's struggle for autonomy and identity
Rabbi Howard Morrison reflects on the modern mandate of Jewish education

Aaron Katchen

"Then Judah drew near him [Vayigash]..." (Genesis 44:18).

Judaism speaks of two messiahs (Mashiach means "anointed one"). The more common is Mashiach ben David, the one who follows the Davidic line (originating from Judah) and will return the kingship. The lesser known one is Mashiach ben Joseph. Interestingly, Judah is the brother who had sold Joseph into slavery and now reacquaints himself with Joseph in this week's parshah.

Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, the first chief rabbi of pre-state Israel, highlights that the selling of Joseph into slavery fractured the two paths of Jacob's family. Rabbi Kook indicates that Judah represents the path of particularity and Joseph represents the path of universality. The brothers' rift splits these two elements in Jacob's lineage.

The brothers' reconciliation began when Judah drew near Joseph (Genesis 44:18). But the unification of these two paths was not complete, an outcome of which we feel until today. By divorcing the universal from the particular, the Jewish experience has tilted to one side or the other. There are many Jews for whom Judaism is a singular experience, and all that matters is within Judaism and the Jewish community. There are also many Jews who forsake Jewish values and instead look to universal values as the guiding expression of their Judaism. These two paths continue to grow further from each other.

The messianic message indicates that we must reconcile and unify these two competing values. We cannot deny our place as global citizens, nor can we ignore the grand message of the Jewish mission in the world. In the end, if we desire messianic peace, we must heed the words of Hillel the Elder (100 BCE), "If I am not for myself, who will be for me? But if I am only for myself, what am I? If not now, when?" ■

Rabbi Aaron Katchen, who is based in Toronto, directs Ask Big Questions Canada in partnership with Hillel.

Michal Shekel

Where to live as we age is a question we all must face. Perhaps a warmer climate, or closer to the grandchildren. Sometimes the decision is dictated by events, illness or finances. Sometimes the decision is made for us.

In Vayigash, Jacob fearfully sets out on such a journey. It is God who reassures him: "Fear not to go down to Egypt, for I will make you there into a great nation. I Myself will go down with you to Egypt, and I Myself will also bring you back; and Joseph's hand shall close your eyes" (Genesis 46:3-4).

Jacob is a seasoned traveller, but the journey to Egypt is beyond his control: "The sons of Israel put their father Jacob and their children and their wives in the wagons that Pharaoh had sent to transport him" (Genesis 46:5). In contrast, when his long-lost son comes to greet him, Joseph ordered his chariot and went to Goshen to meet his father Israel. (Genesis 46:28) Patriarch he may be, but Jacob is no longer in charge.

Commentators describe Jacob's fear as a concern for his descendants' ability to maintain their identity in Egypt. Additionally, Jacob's fear may have less to do with the unknown future and more about the very clear present and his own identity. How much autonomy is he giving up and how much is being wrested from his grasp?

The struggle for autonomy and identity faced by the patriarch is one we all eventually face both as parents and as children. What provides a measure of comfort to Jacob is "God's promise that Joseph's hand shall close your eyes" (Genesis 46:4). Joseph will still fulfil the teaching of not forsaking his father in old age. Thus, Joseph's anticipated actions reassure Jacob and serve to inspire us. ■

Rabbi Michal Shekel is the executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis and spiritual leader of Har Tikvah Congregation in Brampton, Ont.

Howard Morrison

After the reconciliation between Joseph and the rest of his family, Jacob advises Judah to go ahead and set up the town of Goshen as a place for the family to reside. "And Judah he [Jacob] sent to point the way to Goshen." Rashi explains that the Hebrew word for "point the way" – l'horot – literally means to teach. Thus, Rashi understands that the first priority Judah was sent to fulfil was to establish a place of learning, a Talmud Torah. In other words, as the first Diaspora Jewish family was about to design its communal structure, an institution for religious learning stood as a top priority.

Are our children receiving the highest quality of Jewish education possible? As The CJN has reported on numerous occasions, many of the fine institutions of Jewish learning are struggling on many levels. Are we participating with the community at large to revitalize and strengthen the structures for making Jewish education affordable, accessible and meaningful?

As adults, are we showing the way for the next generation by continuing our own Jewish education? Most synagogues as well as other Jewish organizations offer all kinds of learning with a variety of levels and topics.

In our Jewish community today, is Hebrew truly our second language of excellence and comfort? Are there not increasing numbers of Jews who cannot read Hebrew? For those who can read, how many understand Hebrew? For those who can read and translate, how many can participate fluently in a Hebrew conversation?

While contemporary Jews are well versed in a wide array of humanities and sciences, how many are aware and conversant in primary sacred Jewish texts such as the siddur, Tanach, Talmud, Torah commentaries and the like?

In this week's parshah, the first mandate given to the first Diaspora Jewish community is to set up a place for serious Jewish education. Now, four thousand years later, what is our first mandate? ■

Rabbi Howard Morrison is senior rabbi – Mara D'Atra at Beth EmethBais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto.

Certificate for winning from Pope Francis

This is not a joke: Pope Francis has a new honorary comedic adviser, and he's a rabbi.

Earlier this fall, Vermont Rabbi Robert "Bob" Alper won a contest called Joke With the Pope. Rabbi Alper was one of more than 4,000 people from 47 countries who submitted jokes to the contest, which was designed to promote engagement with the pontiff leading up to his recent visit to the United States.

Along with the unofficial title and a certificate, Rabbi Alper was awarded $10,000 (US) to donate to charity. His choice was House the Homeless in Ethiopia. He was also given two tickets to The Tonight Show with Jimmy Fallon.

A native of Providence, R.I., Rabbi Alper was ordained at Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati in 1972 and was the first Jew ever to earn a doctorate from the Princeton Theological Seminary. He has served congregations in Buffalo and Philadelphia. In 1986, he entered a Jewish Comic of the Year contest in Philadelphia and came in third. He's been on the comedy circuit ever since and continues to serve as a rabbi.

The winning entry?

"My wife and I have been married for over 46 years, and our lives are totally in sync. For example, at the same time I got a hearing aid, she stopped mumbling."

He spoke to The CJN recently by telephone.

What made you enter the contest and why was it so last-minute?
Rosalie Fox.

Your wife?
No, a lady in town I know, a friend. A few weeks ago, she said, "Bob did you hear about this joke-with-a-pope contest? You gotta enter it." I blew her off. I don't enter contests. I've never bought a lottery ticket. I guess about a week and a half later, I ran into her at the farmer's market. She said, "Bob, did you enter the contest?" I said no. She said, "The deadline was three days ago and you gotta do it." I said, "Rosalie, leave me alone," and I bought my bread and tomatoes. Then I went home, my wife was out somewhere, and I was sitting on the back porch. So I took out my cellphone and took a video of myself telling a joke, and I sent it in. A week later, I got an email saying, "Congratulations, you've won."

Has the Pope called to thank you?
He hasn't called, but I have a certificate from him. And the Pope was in on it. He actually wrote to the priest who ran the contest and endorsed it. It has a lovely quote about how he values humour and laughter, which they put on the certificate they gave me.

> The only Jewish humour I do is poking fun at Jews behaving in silly ways.

This is the kind of joke the Pope himself could tell.
Yes. They really wanted something that was appropriate. They liked the joke because, first, it was funny. It reflected family. When I say, "My wife and I have been married for 46 years," that's a pretty significant statement. I'm very proud of that and love to share it. Second, they felt it was slightly and humorously self-deprecating. In other words, I wasn't making fun of someone else, not even my wife. I was making fun of me.

And the joke is better because it's true.
It's absolutely true! I got the hearing aid in early June, and in late June, my wife and I went to Cape Cod for a week. On the way down, I was playing with the idea.

To write a joke, it just doesn't come out. You play with it, you tweak it, you write it and cross it out. And then you try it out over and over. I had a show in Cape Cod, so I did the joke and it just killed. So when it came time to send the joke to the Pope – I know millions of jokes – that was the newest and a good one to use.

Have you encountered congregants who say humour from the pulpit is unbecoming?
Never, which is interesting. Maybe they just don't want to insult me. Maybe it's because I'm able to use it appropriately. A good example is, years ago, when I was three or four years into my rabbinate, in Buffalo, I officiated at the funeral of a woman. I told some funny stories about her. I remember saying, "Lilian remained in character until the very end. On the day before she died, her niece came to her and said, 'Aunt Lil, is there anything you'd like?' She said, 'Yes, a comb, some candy, and a stack of 50s.'" And everyone laughed. She was a hard-nosed person and they loved her. But it got a good laugh, a cathartic laugh. It was an appropriate use of humour.

I use the model of the Talmud, of a fellow named Rabbah. He started every lesson with a joke and then the students relaxed and could take in the serious nature of the lesson.

A lot of Jewish comics poke fun at their own Jewishness. Does that make you uncomfortable?
Yeah, because they often cross a line. That's why, for example, I don't do bris jokes. That's an easy target, and it's a sacred ceremony. So the only Jewish humour I do is poking fun at Jews behaving in silly ways.

An example, if you don't mind?
It's not a true story. "When I was in Israel in the late '60s, long before cellphones, I had to make a call from Jerusalem to Tel Aviv. I dialed the number and heard a voice say, 'Please deposit eight tokens.' I said, 'Gee, I only have seven.' The voice said, 'all right, I'll take seven.'"

Or, on an incredibly hot day, and an outdoor wedding. Everyone was miserable. The bride looked at me and said, "Rabbi, can you please make it a short ceremony." I said, "Do you both want to be married?" They said yes. I said, "You are."

Are you and Vermont senator and U.S. presidential candidate Bernie Sanders Vermont's Jewish community?
Actually, the biggest event in Vermont is the annual "I-Didn't-Know-You-Were-Jewish Potluck" dinner. I met [Sanders] a couple of times. Watching his stump speech in an elementary school in our town, I thought, "I wish I had a video of him to show the confirmation classes so they would know what a biblical prophet looks and sounds like."

Do you think he could use some humour?
No, and the reason is, he does have some humour. But I think his message is such a strong message of compassion for people, that I think if he resorts to sound bites and stand-up comedy, it would dilute the message I think is so important. I wouldn't tamper with it.

Will you be notified if the Pope ever tells your joke, and do you get royalties?
[Laughs]. I don't think so. I kind of doubt he's going to tell it.

Because it involves a wife?
That would be one reason. ■

A shoichet, Yiddish journalist and Jewish philosopher

Backstory

IRA ROBINSON
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In the early 20th century, the Jewish community in Montreal created its own religious, cultural and intellectual space, including synagogues, schools, a Jewish public library, and a Yiddish language daily, the Keneder Adler. Behind these institutions was a group of remarkable men, both Orthodox and secular, who collectively built a Jewish community of considerable cultural creativity.

One of the most interesting of these men, though hardly the most famous, was Rabbi Chaim Kruger (1875-1934). Kruger, who came to Montreal in 1907, was a shoichet, one of a group of men who insured that Montreal Jews were daily supplied with reliably kosher meat. However this "day job" hardly defined him. Many of his colleagues from the slaughterhouse affiliated with specific congregations as rabbis or cantors, and Rabbi Kruger did serve as a cantor. This also did not define him.

Beside these pursuits, Rabbi Kruger was a Talmud teacher (rosh yeshiva) in the Yeshiva of Montreal (known also as the Hebrew Academy), which was one of the first attempts outside New York City to transplant advanced talmudic learning to North America. The Montreal yeshiva, which did not survive the economic crisis of the 1930s, and of which we know precious little, was affiliated with the United Talmud Torahs and located at 412 Avenue Henri Julien.

However by no means did the slaughterhouse, synagogue, or yeshiva exhaust Rabbi Kruger's energies. He was also a mainstay on the staff of the Keneder Adler for decades, and he did many things for that newspaper. It was he who regularly translated world news into Yiddish for the newspaper's front page. He also created a number of features, wrote a regular column entitled "A Mirror of Life" – A shpigel fun lebn, and even tried his hand at a serialized novel.

Beyond these pursuits, he was a serious scholar of Jewish history and especially of medieval Jewish philosophy. Rabbi Kruger shared his love of such subjects as the Kabbalists of Safed, Philo Judaeus, Judah Halevi, Saadia Gaon and Maimonides with the readers of the Keneder Adler every Friday through much of the 1920s and the early 1930s. His columns on Maimonides were collected into a book Der Rambam, zayn leben un shafn (1933), which came out only shortly before he died at the very beginning of 1934.

Kruger's book on Maimonides was taken seriously as scholarship, to the extent that it was reviewed in the Jewish Quarterly Review, one of the relatively few works in Yiddish to merit notice in the then journal of record of Jewish studies in North America. The book tells us a number of interesting things about Rabbi Kruger. The first is that he had mastered the technicalities of medieval Jewish philosophical concepts. He even attempted to explain these concepts in his newspaper columns, even though his explanations likely went way over the head of the average Adler reader.

The second is that Rabbi Kruger's attempt to understand Maimonides' philosophy impelled him to evaluate it in light of modern philosophy. Readers of his columns would have seen him compare and evaluate Maimonides with writings of modern philosophers such as Kant (Rabbi Kruger, like his contemporaries Hermann Cohen and Rabbi Joseph Baer Soloveitchik, found much harmony between the thought of Maimonides and Kant) and Nietzsche.

Whenever I think about Rabbi Kruger, I marvel at one thing in particular that marks an essential difference between his time and ours. In the early 20th century, the scholarly study of Judaism and Jewish history was normally pursued outside the university, in Jewish institutions of various sorts. While in Montreal in Rabbi Kruger's time it was possible to study biblical Hebrew and Semitics at McGill University, there were then severe limitations to McGill's receptivity to the academic pursuit of Jewish studies.

In our time, Rabbi Kruger might well have become a university professor of Judaic studies, but not then. Constrained by the realities of his day, he slaughtered animals for a living, pursued his love of Torah in the Montreal yeshiva, and his love of Jewish studies in the columns of the Keneder Adler. ■

Remembering an iconic Jewish hoopster, and Amazon's Nazi items

Legendary NBAer dies

Dolph Schayes, a Jewish basketball player who was voted one of the 50 greatest in NBA history, died Dec. 11 of cancer in Syracuse, N.Y. He was 87. The 12-time all-star was the first NBAer to score 15,000 points and led the Syracuse Nationals to a championship in 1955. In 1966, he was named NBA coach of the year with the Philadelphia 76ers. More than a decade later, he coached the U.S. team at the Maccabiah Games to a gold medal. Schayes was inducted into the Basketball Hall of Fame in 1973.

B'nai Brith seeks products' removal

B'nai Brith Canada has renewed its efforts to get Amazon to remove hate-related paraphernalia from its U.S. and Canadian websites, which it says violate the online retail giant's own intolerance policy. "B'nai Brith brought this issue to Amazon's attention more than two years ago," B'nai Brith CEO Michael Mostyn said this month. "It is extremely disappointing that Amazon has chosen to selectively self censor their catalogue. While flags and paraphernalia of the Islamic State appear to be banned, there are dozens of items emblazoned with hate iconography including swastikas, Nazi imagery and the logos of banned terror organizations such as a Hezbollah baby outfit 'for Hezbollah lovers.'" When contacted by CBC News, Amazon declined to comment on the items.

Sandler likes Stern's rolling of Waters

Adam Sandler criticized ex-Pink Floyd front man Roger Waters and the movement to boycott Israel on The Howard Stern Show last week. "I'm disgusted they single out Israel," the Jewish actor said Dec. 15 on Stern's Sirius satellite radio show. "That [they say], 'We can't play Israel.' All these f---ing nice Israeli people are getting a 'f--- you' from Roger Waters. I'm very pro-Israel and when someone says sh-- about Israel, I know people say sh-- about Israel and they f---ing won't play there ... and when you go off on Roger Waters I love that you do that," Sandler said. In October, Stern ripped Waters, a vocal supporter of BDS, in a seven-minute expletive-laden rant after Waters criticized fellow rocker Jon Bon Jovi for performing in Tel Aviv Oct. 3. ■

Welcoming Syrian refugees

How should Canada's Jewish community welcome Syrian refugees (Question of the week, Dec. 10)? With compassion, understanding and respect. Once again, it is our responsibility to demonstrate to the world our foundational belief of tikkun olam.

Rabbi Hillel conveys this message far better than I ever could, "If I am not for myself, then who will be for me? And if I am only for myself, then what am I? And if not now, when?"

Estella Cohen
Toronto

As the child of immigrants from Poland and Russia I am grateful to the various Canadian governments in welcoming and integrating refugees and other newcomers to Canada.

I have one serious reservation with respect to the newly arrived and soon to arrive Syrian refugees. Since 1948, Syria and Israel have been in a state of war. The Jewish population has either fled from Syria or was driven out without compensation for their property. For all the years since the creation of the State of Israel, Syrians have been taught to hate Israel and Jews. I wonder to what extent the Syrians now arriving in Canada have been vetted with respect to any anti-Semitic feelings.

Obviously, as a matter of self-preservation, they would not admit to that, but it is a concern that they bring such attitudes to Canada. Am I naive to believe that if they harbour such feelings towards Jews that by simply settling in Canada their feeling towards Jews will change?

Bert Raphael, president, the Jewish Civil Rights Association
Toronto

The cost of progressives

Mira Sucharov wants rabbis to denounce far-right Zionism (The CJN, Nov. 26). She gives as an example the policy to retain all of Judea and Samaria on the part of the Jewish Home party.

I, too, disagree with this policy as outlined by leader Naftali Bennett, but this is politics, and I don't think that rabbis should go there, unless there are serious moral issues, for example, recommending expulsion of Arabs from their land.

She refers to left wingers as "progressives." This is not uncommon, but, in my view, it's a rather odious term implying all those who disagree are "regressives." In fact, the label progressive was often adopted by Communists during the McCarthy era, since their old name had such bad connotations.

Now that we understand that left wingers are just those with another point of view, if indeed rabbis were to denounce far-right Zionism, then I would have them denounce far-left Zionism too. By that I mean those "Zionists" who support the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement to convince Israel to leave Arab territories or who denounce Israel every time, in reacting to the unprovoked rocket attacks from Gaza, it kills some of the civilians that Hamas routinely uses as shields.

How that could be "progressive" Zionism escapes me completely.

Ken Frankel
Montreal

The real enemy Israel faces

In the letter to the editor "We refuse to be enemies," (The CJN, Nov. 26), the letter writers do this noble and important idea a disservice through obfuscation, equivocation and inaccuracy.

Just one example is their regrettable assertion that radical Islamist terror stems from regional conflicts, including in "Palestine," a country that does not and never has existed.

This is not only a swipe at Israel, but a fundamental mis-characterization of Islamist ideology and motivation.

Islamists, which are really who Israel is fighting with the Palestinian Authority, PLO and Hamas, are not like the Irish Republican Army, a terror group that, though ruthless and murderous, had a limited geographic goal.

Anyone with any common sense and understanding of Islamism and jihad knows that if Israel and all its Jews were to be gone tomorrow, there would still be an ISIS, an Al Qaeda, an Iran, or another Islamist group working even harder than they are now to violently establish a caliphate over the rest of the globe.

Brotherhood (and sisterhood) between peoples is something we all need to work for, but it is only sustainable to the degree that truth is mutually embraced.

RABBI-2-RABBI

Travel can be a sacred mission

Like Judaism, it lets us explore the unfamiliar, thereby opening ourselves to parts of our inner landscape we've never known before

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Splansky: Many Jewish travellers make a point to seek out synagogues when they are far from home, even if they are not "regular shul-goers." Why do we do this?

There is nothing more affirming than to walk in a strange city, where people speak a foreign language, and enter an unknown space, only to be greeted as family. Such a welcome affirms that we are, despite how we often treat one another, am echad, one people.

Rabbi Fishman: We may find ourselves miles from home, but we still experience the familiar – and that goes to show just how connected we are. I recall travelling to Florence, Italy, and participating in a Friday night service. The tune that was sung to Lecha Dodi was the same as my synagogue.

And yet, travel also allows us to explore the unfamiliar, and thereby open ourselves up to aspects of our inner landscape that we have never known before. I believe this is one of the fundamental themes in our religion, and why Abraham and Sarah were known as travellers. The sense of constant exploration, openness to new possibilities and the vulnerability that comes from being an outsider are all part of the complex spiritual DNA of Jewishness.

Rabbi Splansky: A childhood friend served in rural Chile with the Peace Corps. In anticipation of Yom Kippur, she researched the seven-hour bus ride she'd need to take to reach the synagogue in Santiago. When she finally arrived, security was so tight they would not let her in. What could she do but sit down on the front steps and cry?

It wasn't long before the rebbetzin came out and said: "Someone told me there's an American girl crying on my steps. We can't have that here. Come inside."

Rabbi Fishman: "I am a stranger and a resident." These were Abraham's words to the residents of Canaan, and they continue to resonate today.

We are not from here. We are visitors. We are just passing through. And yet, simultaneously, we belong. This, too, is home. We too have our roots and our future right here.

The Jewish way is to be both a stranger and still feel at home. To somehow always see ourselves as on the move and not really settled and satisfied with the status quo, and yet, at the same time, to build, to plant wherever we may find ourselves at any given moment.

The prophet Jeremiah tells the exiles after they have been expelled from their land: "Seek the peace and prosperity of the city to which I have carried you into exile. Pray to the Lord for it, because if it prospers, you too will prosper." We cherish our particularism, but never forget that we, too, have a responsibility to better the situation of the cities we travel and settle down in.

Rabbi Splansky: Rabbi Nachman of Bratslav famously said: "Wherever I go, I go to Jerusalem." I don't know exactly what he meant. Is it that every trip should be pursued as a sacred mission? That it's not the destination that matters, but the journey?

I write these words from Barcelona. I came for the art and architecture, the good food and wine. We will take a day trip to the medieval Jewish city of Gerona and find the Reform congregation for Shabbat.

But I've also come with my husband in celebration of our 20th wedding anniversary. The long walks through winding streets and slow conversations over coffee may be what I really came for.

Wherever people travel this winter, may they go in peace and return fulfilled.

Rabbi Fishman: Sounds wonderful. Walking through the streets of Jerusalem (and perhaps Barcelona) can have a magical effect on even the most hardened of people. Jerusalem is a city of mystery, of complexity and of the enchanting sense that greatness can be achieved when we work together.

That is how I understand Rabbi Nachman's statement – that all our experiences, our cultural familiarities and our collective wisdom can be channelled into a beautiful whole. Everything we do, each act we complete, each new alleyway we explore, can join together to become "a complete city," where immigrant and native can truly feel at home. ■

My favourite cover stories, part 2

Last week, I listed six of my favourite CJN cover stories from the first six months of 2015. Here are six more from the second half of the year. You can revisit these stories right now at cjnews.com.

1. The isolation of infertility, July 23: Most of us know someone who has experienced fertility challenges. It's a difficult topic to discuss, and one that needs to be approached with the utmost sensitivity. That was our aim when we explored the physical, mental, social and cultural stresses of infertility. Alongside Sheri Shefa's reporting, we published two essays from people who have experienced fertility challenges personally.

2. Is there anybody out there? Aug. 6: With more and more Jews identifying as atheist or agnostic, Jodie Shupac explored the growing trend of religious observance without accompanying faith in God. Meanwhile, Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner and Mark Brender debated whether Judaism requires faith in God, with the former arguing that the search for God is the core of Jewish history, and the latter countering that being an atheist hasn't stopped him from adopting Jewish values.

3. Paying for praying, Sept. 17: As an increasing number of shul-goers appear unwilling, or unable, to pay dues, Lila Sarick wondered whether the traditional pay-to-pray financial model is sustainable. "It's difficult to find [money for dues] in your household budget, and joining a synagogue isn't a given anymore," Cindy Joseph, chair of the membership committee at Toronto's Beth Radom Congregation, admitted. And that has led many synagogues to search for alternative income sources.

4. In their own words, Oct. 15: Less than a week before the federal election, The CJN published interviews with Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau, Conservative Leader Stephen Harper and NDP Leader Tom Mulcair. (We interviewed Green party head Elizabeth May a few weeks earlier.) Securing one-on-one talks with the main prime ministerial candidates was a first for this publication, and it gave our readers an opportunity to hear first-hand what the leaders had to say on a number of important issues for the Jewish community.

5. Orthodoxy and female rabbis, Nov. 26: Native Ottawan Lila Kagedan is the first Orthodox woman to adopt the title "rabbi." In the wake of a resolution issued by the Rabbinical Council of America rejecting female ordination, Rabbi Kagedan explained why she chose to take that moniker and argued that women's ordination in Orthodoxy is alive and well. "We have a long way to go," she wrote, "but I am optimistic."

6. Alberta's Jews feel the pinch, Dec. 3: With the price of oil declining, Paul Lungen investigated how Albertan Jews were being affected. As he discovered, the economic slump has led to an uptick in economic stress within the Jewish communities of Calgary and Edmonton, where many wonder whether the worst is yet to come. But not everyone was feeling so pessimistic: "It's a cyclical economy. Up and down," Calgary lawyer Gordon Hoffman told Lungen. "This is the engine of the country. We'll be busy again," he said.

As we sign off for 2015, I want to thank you for your readership and support this year. We're looking forward to bringing you a host of compelling, thoughtful and original stories in 2016. — YONI

Looking back at 2015

Terrorism, Trudeau and a young man named Tyler made waves

DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
dwolgel@thecjn.ca

Not surprisingly, 2015 was an eventful year in the Jewish world, one marked by violence, anti-Semitism, political rancour, and debates about Jewish identity.

As it began, Canadians and Canadian Jews rallied in solidarity with France after two Islamic gunmen stormed the offices of satirical newspaper Charlie Hebdo, killing 11, including a Jewish cartoonist and a Jewish columnist, and two days later, four Jewish men were killed by an Islamic gunman in a siege at a kosher supermarket in Paris.

Rabbi Adam Scheier, spiritual leader of Montreal's Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, visited Paris and said Canada must do more to help French Jews immigrate here.

An Islamic threat of a different sort hung over Jewish politics as U.S.-led talks to limit Iran's nuclear program – a deal was reached in July – became one of the issues dividing Jews in the recent Canadian election campaign.

The deal loomed large when, in an unprecedented move, the Jewish Defence League picketed the home of Toronto Jewish businessman Barry Sherman when he hosted a fundraiser for Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau. The JDL claimed key Trudeau advisers were critical of Israel, backed the Iran deal and favoured engagement with the Islamic Republic. (One adviser, new Mississauga Centre MP Omar Alghabra, recently was named parliamentary secretary to the minister of foreign affairs, responsible for consular affairs, causing his statements on the Middle East and his past as head of the Canadian Arab Federation to come under greater scrutiny.)

The campaign also marked the retirement of MP Irwin Cotler in Mount Royal, which saw a hard-fought race to replace him. Anthony Housefather ultimately retained the riding for the Liberals, joining six other new Jewish Liberal MPs.

In Toronto, Canada's first Jewish finance minister, Tory Joe Oliver, was defeated in the Liberal sweep, as was York Centre MP Mark Adler, but not before Adler faced controversy for erroneously claiming to be the first child of a Holocaust survivor ever elected to Parliament and mentioning it in campaign materials.

Our most popular stories on the web

dkoren@thecjn.ca

While the Internet is normally a fickle beast, it was almost predictable that many of the stories to go viral in 2015 were preceded by events that rocked the local or international community, including the tragedies that unfolded in Paris, the ongoing terror attacks against civilians in Israel, and the Canadian federal election.

CJN readers took to social media and the comment section of our recently relaunched website to debate important issues or to comment on stories we reported throughout the year.

The most meaningful and impactful articles published in 2015 are also some of The CJN's most-read stories of the year. They are listed below, in no particular order.

For the full versions, search for these headlines at www.cjnews.com.

Peterborough shul helps mosque

Barely 24 hours after the attacks in Paris that left at least 130 dead, arsonists targeted Peterborough's only mosque, prompting the local Beth Israel synagogue to offer its support. The move was shared by thousands on social media, with many CJN readers commending the shul for "building bridges instead of walls." Muslim worshippers were thankful to have been given a space to pray, and the two communities even held a dinner party together. "We may be different religions, but we're all one people, and in times like this, we have to stick together," Beth Israel president Larry Gilman told The CJN.

What can Jews expect from Trudeau?

Immediately following Justin Trudeau's election win, The CJN spoke to a slew of local leaders, analyzing comments made during the campaign. Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) CEO Shimon Fogel said Trudeau has been clear that his government's policies "will entirely reflect the positions staked out by the previous government."

Remembering an iconic Jewish hoopster, and Amazon's Nazi items

Legendary NBAer dies

Dolph Schayes, a Jewish basketball player who was voted one of the 50 greatest in NBA history, died Dec. 11 of cancer in Syracuse, N.Y. He was 87. The 12-time all-star was the first NBAer to score 15,000 points and led the Syracuse Nationals to a championship in 1955. In 1966, he was named NBA coach of the year with the Philadelphia 76ers. More than a decade later, he coached the U.S. team at the Maccabiah Games to a gold medal. Schayes was inducted into the Basketball Hall of Fame in 1973.

B'nai Brith seeks products' removal

B'nai Brith Canada has renewed its efforts to get Amazon to remove hate-related paraphernalia from its U.S. and Canadian websites, which it says violate the online retail giant's own intolerance policy. "B'nai Brith brought this issue to Amazon's attention more than two years ago," B'nai Brith CEO Michael Mostyn said this month. "It is extremely disappointing that Amazon has chosen to selectively self censor their catalogue. While flags and paraphernalia of the Islamic State appear to be banned, there are dozens of items emblazoned with hate iconography including swastikas, Nazi imagery and the logos of banned terror organizations such as a Hezbollah baby outfit 'for Hezbollah lovers.'" When contacted by CBC News, Amazon declined to comment on the items.

Adam Sandler is "very pro-Israel."

Sandler likes Stern's roiling of Waters

Adam Sandler criticized ex-Pink Floyd front man Roger Waters and the movement to boycott Israel on The Howard Stern Show last week. "I'm disgusted they single out Israel," the Jewish actor said Dec. 15 on Stern's Sirius satellite radio show. "That [they say], 'We can't play Israel.' All these f---ing nice Israeli people are getting a 'f--- you' from Roger Waters. I'm very pro-Israel and when someone says sh-- about Israel, I know people say sh-- about Israel and they f---ing won't play there ... and when you go off on Roger Waters I love that you do that," Sandler said. In October, Stern ripped Waters, a vocal supporter of BDS, in a seven-minute expletive-laden rant after Waters criticized fellow rocker Jon Bon Jovi for performing in Tel Aviv Oct. 3. ■

Welcoming Syrian refugees

How should Canada's Jewish community welcome Syrian refugees (Question of the week, Dec. 10)? With compassion, understanding and respect. Once again, it is our responsibility to demonstrate to the world our foundational belief of tikkun olam.

Rabbi Hillel conveys this message far better than I ever could, "If I am not for myself, then who will be for me? And if I am only for myself, then what am I? And if not now, when?"

Estella Cohen
Toronto

As the child of immigrants from Poland and Russia I am grateful to the various Canadian governments in welcoming and integrating refugees and other newcomers to Canada.

I have one serious reservation with respect to the newly arrived and soon to arrive Syrian refugees. Since 1948, Syria and Israel have been in a state of war. The Jewish population has either fled from Syria or was driven out without compensation for their property. For all the years since the creation of the State of Israel, Syrians have been taught to hate Israel and Jews. I wonder to what extent the Syrians now arriving in Canada have been vetted with respect to any anti-Semitic feelings.

Obviously, as a matter of self-preservation, they would not admit to that, but it is a concern that they bring such attitudes to Canada. Am I naive to believe that if they harbour such feelings towards Jews that by simply settling in Canada their feeling towards Jews will change?

Bert Raphael, president, the Jewish Civil Rights Association
Toronto

The cost of progressives

Mira Sucharov wants rabbis to denounce far-right Zionism (The CJN, Nov. 26). She gives as an example the policy to retain all of Judea and Samaria on the part of the Jewish Home party.

I, too, disagree with this policy as outlined by leader Naftali Bennett, but this is politics, and I don't think that rabbis should go there, unless there are serious moral issues, for example, recommending expulsion of Arabs from their land.

She refers to left wingers as "progressives." This is not uncommon, but, in my view, it's a rather odious term implying all those who disagree are "regressives." In fact, the label progressive was often adopted by Communists during the McCarthy era, since their old name had such bad connotations.

Now that we understand that left wingers are just those with another point of view, if indeed rabbis were to denounce far-right Zionism, then I would have them denounce far-left Zionism too. By that I mean those "Zionists" who support the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement to convince Israel to leave Arab territories or who denounce Israel every time, in reacting to the unprovoked rocket attacks from Gaza, it kills some of the civilians that Hamas routinely uses as shields.

How that could be "progressive" Zionism escapes me completely.

Ken Frankel
Montreal

The real enemy Israel faces

In the letter to the editor "We refuse to be enemies," (The CJN, Nov. 26), the letter writers do this noble and important idea a disservice through obfuscation, equivocation and inaccuracy.

Just one example is their regrettable assertion that radical Islamist terror stems from regional conflicts, including in "Palestine," a country that does not and never has existed.

This is not only a swipe at Israel, but a fundamental mis-characterization of Islamist ideology and motivation.

Islamists, which are really who Israel is fighting with the Palestinian Authority, PLO and Hamas, are not like the Irish Republican Army, a terror group that, though ruthless and murderous, had a limited geographic goal.

Anyone with any common sense and understanding of Islamism and jihad knows that if Israel and all its Jews were to be gone tomorrow, there would still be an ISIS, an Al Qaeda, an Iran, or another Islamist group working even harder than they are now to violently establish a caliphate over the rest of the globe.

Brotherhood (and sisterhood) between peoples is something we all need to work for, but it is only sustainable to the degree that truth is mutually embraced.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Travel can be a sacred mission

Like Judaism, it lets us explore the unfamiliar, thereby opening ourselves to parts of our inner landscape we've never known before

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Splansky: Many Jewish travellers make a point to seek out synagogues when they are far from home, even if they are not "regular shul-goers." Why do we do this?

There is nothing more affirming than to walk in a strange city, where people speak a foreign language, and enter an unknown space, only to be greeted as family. Such a welcome affirms that we are, despite how we often treat one another, am echad, one people.

Rabbi Fishman: We may find ourselves miles from home, but we still experience the familiar – and that goes to show just how connected we are. I recall travelling to Florence, Italy, and participating in a Friday night service. The tune that was sung to Lecha Dodi was the same as my synagogue.

And yet, travel also allows us to explore the unfamiliar, and thereby open ourselves up to aspects of our inner landscape that we have never known before. I believe this is one of the fundamental themes in our religion, and why Abraham and Sarah were known as travellers. The sense of constant exploration, openness to new possibilities and the vulnerability that comes from being an outsider are all part of the complex spiritual DNA of Jewishness.

Rabbi Splansky: A childhood friend served in rural Chile with the Peace Corps. In anticipation of Yom Kippur, she researched the seven-hour bus ride she'd need to take to reach the synagogue in Santiago. When she finally arrived, security was so tight they would not let her in. What could she do but sit down on the front steps and cry?

It wasn't long before the rebbetzin came out and said: "Someone told me there's an American girl crying on my steps. We can't have that here. Come inside."

Rabbi Fishman: "I am a stranger and a resident." These were Abraham's words to the residents of Canaan, and they continue to resonate today.

We are not from here. We are visitors. We are just passing through. And yet, simultaneously, we belong. This, too, is home. We too have our roots and our future right here.

The Jewish way is to be both a stranger and still feel at home. To somehow always see ourselves as on the move and not really settled and satisfied with the status quo, and yet, at the same time, to build, to plant wherever we may find ourselves at any given moment.

The prophet Jeremiah tells the exiles after they have been expelled from their land: "Seek the peace and prosperity of the city to which I have carried you into exile. Pray to the Lord for it, because if it prospers, you too will prosper." We cherish our particularism, but never forget that we, too, have a responsibility to better the situation of the cities we travel and settle down in.

Rabbi Splansky: Rabbi Nachman of Bratslav famously said: "Wherever I go, I go to Jerusalem." I don't know exactly what he meant. Is it that every trip should be pursued as a sacred mission? That it's not the destination that matters, but the journey?

I write these words from Barcelona. I came for the art and architecture, the good food and wine. We will take a day trip to the medieval Jewish city of Gerona and find the Reform congregation for Shabbat.

But I've also come with my husband in celebration of our 20th wedding anniversary. The long walks through winding streets and slow conversations over coffee may be what I really came for.

Wherever people travel this winter, may they go in peace and return fulfilled. ■

Rabbi Fishman: Sounds wonderful. Walking through the streets of Jerusalem (and perhaps Barcelona) can have a magical effect on even the most hardened of people. Jerusalem is a city of mystery, of complexity and of the enchanting sense that greatness can be achieved when we work together.

That is how I understand Rabbi Nachman's statement – that all our experiences, our cultural familiarities and our collective wisdom can be channelled into a beautiful whole. Everything we do, each act we complete, each new alleyway we explore, can join together to become "a complete city," where immigrant and native can truly feel at home. ■

When my husband died suddenly, my whole world stopped. I didn't even know where to begin with the arrangements. It was 2am. I called Benjamin's. To my surprise, Michael Benjamin himself answered the phone. They took care of every imaginable detail. They even had umbrellas for guests when it rained at the gravesite. I will never forget their wonderful care.

"They thought of everything."

My favourite cover stories, part 2

Last week, I listed six of my favourite CJN cover stories from the first six months of 2015. Here are six more from the second half of the year. You can revisit these stories right now at cjnews.com.

1. The isolation of infertility, July 23: Most of us know someone who has experienced fertility challenges. It's a difficult topic to discuss, and one that needs to be approached with the utmost sensitivity. That was our aim when we explored the physical, mental, social and cultural stresses of infertility. Alongside Sheri Shefa's reporting, we published two essays from people who have experienced fertility challenges personally.

2. Is there anybody out there? Aug. 6: With more and more Jews identifying as atheist or agnostic, Jodie Shupac explored the growing trend of religious observance without accompanying faith in God. Meanwhile, Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner and Mark Brender debated whether Judaism requires faith in God, with the former arguing that the search for God is the core of Jewish history, and the latter countering that being an atheist hasn't stopped him from adopting Jewish values.

3. Paying for praying, Sept. 17: As an increasing number of shul-goers appear unwilling, or unable, to pay dues, Lila Sarick wondered whether the traditional pay-to-pray financial model is sustainable. "It's difficult to find [money for dues] in your household budget, and joining a synagogue isn't a given anymore," Cindy Joseph, chair of the membership committee at Toronto's Beth Radom Congregation, admitted. And that has led many synagogues to search for alternative income sources.

4. In their own words, Oct. 15: Less than a week before the federal election, The CJN published interviews with Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau, Conservative Leader Stephen Harper and NDP Leader Tom Mulcair. (We interviewed Green party head Elizabeth May a few weeks earlier.) Securing one-on-one talks with the main prime ministerial candidates was a first for this publication, and it gave our readers an opportunity to hear first-hand what the leaders had to say on a number of important issues for the Jewish community.

5. Orthodoxy and female rabbis, Nov. 26: Native Ottawan Lila Kagedan is the first Orthodox woman to adopt the title "rabbi." In the wake of a resolution issued by the Rabbinical Council of America rejecting female ordination, Rabbi Kagedan explained why she chose to take that moniker and argued that women's ordination in Orthodoxy is alive and well. "We have a long way to go," she wrote, "but I am optimistic."

6. Alberta's Jews feel the pinch, Dec. 3: With the price of oil declining, Paul Lungen investigated how Albertan Jews were being affected. As he discovered, the economic slump has led to an uptick in economic stress within the Jewish communities of Calgary and Edmonton, where many wonder whether the worst is yet to come. But not everyone was feeling so pessimistic: "It's a cyclical economy. Up and down," Calgary lawyer Gordon Hoffman told Lungen. "This is the engine of the country. We'll be busy again," he said.

As we sign off for 2015, I want to thank you for your readership and support this year. We're looking forward to bringing you a host of compelling, thoughtful and original stories in 2016. — YONI

Looking back at 2015

Terrorism, Trudeau and a young man named Tyler made waves

DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
dwolgel@thecjn.ca

Not surprisingly, 2015 was an eventful year in the Jewish world, one marked by violence, anti-Semitism, political rancour, and debates about Jewish identity.

As it began, Canadians and Canadian Jews rallied in solidarity with France after two Islamic gunmen stormed the offices of satirical newspaper Charlie Hebdo, killing 11, including a Jewish cartoonist and a Jewish columnist, and two days later, four Jewish men were killed by an Islamic gunman in a siege at a kosher supermarket in Paris.

Rabbi Adam Scheier, spiritual leader of Montreal's Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, visited Paris and said Canada must do more to help French Jews immigrate here.

An Islamic threat of a different sort hung over Jewish politics as U.S.-led talks to limit Iran's nuclear program – a deal was reached in July – became one of the issues dividing Jews in the recent Canadian election campaign.

The deal loomed large when, in an unprecedented move, the Jewish Defence League picketed the home of Toronto Jewish businessman Barry Sherman when he hosted a fundraiser for Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau. The JDL claimed key Trudeau advisers were critical of Israel, backed the Iran deal and favoured engagement with the Islamic Republic. (One adviser, new Mississauga Centre MP Omar Alghabra, recently was named parliamentary secretary to the minister of foreign affairs, responsible for consular affairs, causing his statements on the Middle East and his past as head of the Canadian Arab Federation to come under greater scrutiny.)

The campaign also marked the retirement of MP Irwin Cotler in Mount Royal, which saw a hard-fought race to replace him. Anthony Housefather ultimately retained the riding for the Liberals, joining six other new Jewish Liberal MPs.

In Toronto, Canada's first Jewish finance minister, Tory Joe Oliver, was defeated in the Liberal sweep, as was York Centre MP Mark Adler, but not before Adler faced controversy for erroneously claiming to be the first child of a Holocaust survivor ever elected to Parliament and mentioning it in campaign materials.

Our most popular stories on the web

dkoren@thecjn.ca

While the Internet is normally a fickle beast, it was almost predictable that many of the stories to go viral in 2015 were preceded by events that rocked the local or international community, including the tragedies that unfolded in Paris, the ongoing terror attacks against civilians in Israel, and the Canadian federal election.

CJN readers took to social media and the comment section of our recently relaunched website to debate important issues or to comment on stories we reported throughout the year.

The most meaningful and impactful articles published in 2015 are also some of The CJN's most-read stories of the year. They are listed below, in no particular order.

For the full versions, search for these headlines at www.cjnews.com.

Peterborough shul helps mosque

Barely 24 hours after the attacks in Paris that left at least 130 dead, arsonists targeted Peterborough's only mosque, prompting the local Beth Israel synagogue to offer its support. The move was shared by thousands on social media, with many CJN readers commending the shul for "building bridges instead of walls." Muslim worshippers were thankful to have been given a space to pray, and the two communities even held a dinner party together. "We may be different religions, but we're all one people, and in times like this, we have to stick together," Beth Israel president Larry Gilman told The CJN.

What can Jews expect from Trudeau?

Immediately following Justin Trudeau's election win, The CJN spoke to a slew of local leaders, analyzing comments made during the campaign. Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) CEO Shimon Fogel said Trudeau has been clear that his government's policies "will entirely reflect the positions staked out by the previous government."

Shwarma war is no laffa-ing matter

Traditional Middle Eastern fare like falafel and shwarma has long been a staple in Jewish Toronto.

Democracy means individuals can choose

Mira Sucharov

The sublime thing about liberal democracies is that they are based on the rights and responsibilities of individuals rather than groups. Unlike the kind of sectarian societies imploding in civil war in the Middle East, in a liberal democracy, it is the individual who chooses to go to the ballot box (or abdicate) or to attend a protest (or go to the movies), and it is the individual who must abide by the law or face punishment.

In robust multicultural societies like Canada's, individuals are given another opportunity – to identify as an ethnic, religious or cultural group. And those groups are considered a boon to the fabric of society. But ultimately, all rights and responsibilities rest solely with the person.

Which is why the recent call for Muslims in Canada and the United States to publicly denounce acts of terrorism committed by the Islamic State (ISIS) and others inspired by them, is understandable – but ultimately wrong.

Here's where it's understandable. Terrorism – defined as the targeting of civilians for political ends – is morally distasteful. When committed by a fellow citizen, the action is especially corrosive, leading to distrust and paranoia. When an act of terrorism is committed by a person or group claiming to act on behalf of a particular religion, it's tempting to want everyone else from that religion to denounce the action.

But here's where it's wrong. As a Jew, I regularly urge my fellow Jews to stand up for injustice as Jews, to stand up against an array of Israeli policies that I find objectionable. I encouraged my JCC (where I was then a board member) to undertake staff training around LGBTQ awareness, thus enabling it to declare itself an "LGBTQ safe zone," as facilitated by the Jewish LGBTQ organization, Keshet. As a Jew, and as a Jewish columnist in the Jewish press, I stand up for religious freedom in Israel, for human rights, for an end to the occupation and for racial and ethnic equality.

But let's recall an incident last summer with Jewish pop singer Matisyahu. Organizers attempted to ban Matisyahu from performing at a music festival in Spain unless he denounced the Israeli occupation. Matisyahu is an American, not an Israeli. His only association with the Jewish state is that he himself is Jewish. It was a distasteful act of political theatre on the part of the organizers precisely because they drew a faulty line of logic: Israeli occupation is morally objectionable – all Jews (or at least famous ones) must take a public stand because they are Jews. (After a public outcry, the festival organizers backtracked.)

In a liberal democracy, whatever collective identities we hold – sexual, religious, ethnic and so on – are the domain of the private sphere unless we choose, as individuals, to act otherwise. So while I hope my fellow Jews will take a stand against an array of social ills, and am aware that some don't, I would be disgusted and disturbed if, say, a work colleague or a politician or a journalist in a local or national daily were to demand that I, because I happen to be Jewish, denounce one thing or another.

The upshot? Community conversations about dynamics relating to that community are crucial to have. But they are just that: community conversations. We must leave members of synagogues, mosques, churches, JCCs and other organizations to debate amongst themselves whether and how to publicly denounce actions committed in their name. The pages of the Canadian Jewish News may indeed be one useful forum among many for these tough conversations.

And perhaps the Jewish community, being more integrated, prosperous and secure than the Muslim community in North America, may even serve as a model. But demanding that sort of stand-taking by others in a civic forum violates the delicate multicultural balance that is intrinsic to a liberal democracy where the individual is the only meaningful object and subject of political action. ■

Ensuring a Jewish future through education

Mordechai Ben-Dat

Some 18 months after the end of the war in Europe in May 1945, the full extent of the ghoulish slaughter of European Jewry was already known. The full extent of the shock, however, had not yet been absorbed. Nor has it been, truly, even today.

In finding their place in the postwar world that blew clear from the cinder and ash of the battlefields – and, it must be said, from the crematoria – Jews around the world had little time then for memorials and monuments. The needs of the hour were too pressing.

Foremost among them was rallying in defence of the Yishuv, the Jews in Mandatory Palestine striving to bring forth a sovereign Jewish state in the face of murderous hostility from surrounding Arab nations.

But other urgent causes wrought by the war also stirred the hearts of Jews around the world. A.M. Klein, the brilliant Montreal-based writer, poet, scholar and advocate for the Jewish People wrote of one such cause in an editorial in the Canadian Jewish Chronicle on Jan. 17, 1947.

"With the destruction of [European] Jewry a great, an important, a vital link in the chain [of our cultural tradition] was broken," he lamented. "The paramount question of Jewish culture today is: shall North American Jewry, free, vigorous and conscious of its responsibilities both to the past and the future, step in and fill up the breach? Shall North American Jewry now play the role which both position and duty impose upon it?"

But having posed these fundamental questions, Klein dismissed them as merely rhetorical. He could not imagine that the Jews whom the Nazis did not reach – some two-thirds of the 17 to 18 million who comprised world Jewry in 1939 – "could possibly contemplate the spiritual suicide that must follow from indifference" to the preservation of Jewish life, or as Klein called it, Jewish cultural tradition.

For Klein the answer was obvious.

He had no doubt Jews worldwide would immediately tend to the survival of a Jewish future even as they would tend to the healing of the survivors and the protection and defence of a sovereign Jewish home. The way to achieve the survival of a Jewish future was equally obvious to Klein. He tells us in typically elegant prose.

"Whether we are a People of the Book is not merely a matter of destiny but of will, and that will is best manifested, both in our own personal respect for the treasures of our heritage and in the support which we give to our cultural institutions. Such a key institution is the Talmud Torah [Jewish education]... It is here that [the students and the graduates] first catch hold of those strands which must forever knit them to their past and here that they forge those minds and those wills of which their people today so grievously stand in need."

The situation and issues that confront the Jewish People in January 2016 are not those that confronted us in January 1947. But nor are they so different, either.

The State of Israel, now in its 68th year, though imperfect, thrives in so many respects that were unimaginable in 1947. But not even for one day since its birth has its existence been accepted by the Arab world. Moreover, as the historian Joshua Muravchik recently noted, "hatred of Israel is the most deadly thing facing the Jewish People since Hitler."

And what would Klein say of the way in which we have tended to the survival of the Jewish future? The cultural institution that for him was the chief guarantor of that survival – Jewish education, in all its manifest forms – has become shamefully beyond the financial reach throughout North America for most of the grandchildren of his 1947 readers.

Klein would feel sad, concerned, angry and then, like many individuals across the grassroots of Diaspora Jewry today, determined to solve the crisis of the unaffordability of Jewish education. ■

We gain strength by giving

Rabbi Jay Kelman

As Canada begins welcoming 25,000 Syrian refugees, we should think of the flourishing Jewish community that once existed in Syria. The Jewish world owes a tremendous debt of gratitude to Judy Feld Carr who, at great personal risk, rescued over 3,000 Syrian Jews. They were remnants of a once great and glorious community dating back thousands of years.

Among that earlier group of Syrian refugees was 11-year-old Elie Horn, who fled with his family to Brazil in 1944. He has built a successful real estate company, and most recently was the first Brazilian (and as far as I can tell the first shomer Shabbat Jew), together with his wife, Susy, to sign The Giving Pledge. This initiative begun by Warren Buffet and Bill and Melinda Gates asks the world's billionaires to contribute at least one-half of their wealth to charity, either during their lifetime or in their will. To date, some 141 billionaires have done so.

> Doing what's good is a great investment.

One can be forgiven for having missed Horn's pledge, as it was given on the same day that Mark Zuckerberg pledged to donate 99 per cent of his shares in Facebook during his lifetime, an estimated $45 billion (US). He and his wife, Priscilla Chan, signed The Giving Pledge in honour of the birth of their first child.

In explaining his decision to give, Horn said, "As human beings, we will carry nothing with us to the other world – the only things we shall take are the good deeds that we accomplish in this world. We are in this world to be tested, and each one of us must grant the fruit of his abilities. Doing what's good is a great investment. That's so obvious."

It is obvious – in theory. But as we know, theory and practice often diverge. While it may be hard to understand how one can amass so much wealth and not agree to donate at least half (perhaps invest would be a better word), it is equally clear that for most people – billionaires or not – helping others with their wealth is tragically hard for them to do. The Forbes list of billionaires of March 2 had 1,826 names on it. In other words, just over 92 per cent of the world's billionaires have yet to pledge to donate half their wealth to charity. The fact that 141 billionaires have agreed to do this is most gratifying and will go a long way to making this world a better place. Whatever they may have achieved in business pales in comparison to the true legacy of their lives. Imagine how much more could be done if the other 92 per cent joined in. And imagine what might happen if just a small fraction of corporate wealth went to charity. In its latest quarter, Apple reported cash on hand of $205 billion.

Under the new Liberal government, Canadians earning over $200,000 will be subject to an increased tax rate on that income from 29 per cent to 33 per cent. At the same time, donations made on any income above that $200,0000 threshold will see their donation credit also increased to 33 per cent, making donations even more beneficial from a tax perspective.

Our Jewish community in Canada is blessed with a good number of billionaires. We eagerly wait for them to join Elie and Susy Horn in sharing their blessings with others. Horn has announced that his focus of giving will be on "secular and religious education." Let us hope that this Syrian refugee's initiative will benefit both the Jewish and the general communities.

Here are his words of inspiration: "I make my pledge with pleasure, and the good feeling that I tried my best to give meaning to my mission in this world (my late father gave 100 per cent of what he had). The more we give, the more meaningful and stronger we shall become." ■

You can't go back to yesterday

Norma Baumel Joseph

Alice in Wonderland proclaims: "I can't go back to yesterday because I was a different person then!"

Uncanny what comes out of the mouths of young people. Even fictionalized young people!

Obviously, I think it is a most valuable insight that many of us could benefit from. We often muse, if only I had done it this way. Or if only I could go back and fix things, or speak to mom, or ask forgiveness from dad. Immigrants speak of the home country with all its beauty and richness, forgetting the harshness and the realities of today. Older people always want to go back to their youth. The desire to relive or go back seems so natural and ever present, yet so unrealistic.

We all know we can't go back. We know the impossibility and the rules of physics. But we think (or dream) that if there was a time machine, we could go back and enjoy it. We neglect the truths of Alice's wisdom.

The fact is we simply are not the same people today that we were then. We cannot go back for we are not the "we" we were then. How totally and wonderfully confusing. Just right for Alice's world, but also just right for our self-understanding. Human growth is not just a haphazard event; it is a necessary and sufficient condition of human reality. Without change and growth, there is no life. If we stagnate in our education, relationships and patterns of interactions, if we have no growth in our cultural, social and educational lives, then we are not alive. We are not the same today as we were yesterday. What is amazing is that we manage to keep friends, family and co-workers as we flourish.

Our lives parallel the movement of the planets. Earth constantly rotates, yet we feel it not. We change, yet we feel it not. The moment the earth stops rotating around the sun, life, as we know it ends. The moment humans stop moving and growing, life ends. Our cultural and physical evolution is of necessity continuous. Our task then, the only matter under our control, is to ensure the direction of change – that it is healthy, precious and constructive.

> Don't go back to relive. Look back to learn and appreciate.

One important caveat: we cannot live in the past, we cannot be what we once were. But we cannot and should not ignore or forget the past. Our heritage, our wisdom is all buried there. So we must look to the past, not to live there, not to re-experience it, but to learn from it. We can treasure it as the source of our present accomplishments (or problems). We can see the contexts of our reality in history.

There are valuable lessons to be learned there. Why deny them? That would not be the path of wisdom Alice sets us on. But looking through the looking glass is not an experiment in going back in time to live there. It opens an opportunity to see things in different modes of existence, to express new ways of seeing and being, so that we can learn from our past mistakes and past successes. But we are not what we were yesterday. Our sightlines shift. We might see more clearly, or poorly, as through a veil, or through a microscope, focused but enlarged beyond all reality.

Alice's lesson then is look we must, but accept the difference in you. Don't go back to relive. Look back to learn and appreciate.

I have had many opportunities of late to look back and think of times gone by. Times of health and happiness, when I imagined I had all I wanted and plenty of time to be me. I cannot go back. I am different now. I appreciate the me of now, and look forward to the new me of tomorrow. Strangely, as I think of Alice's quote, I am grateful, thankful and glad. ■

Jews part of group sponsoring Syrian peace advocate

plungen@thecjn.ca

All things considered, Aboud Dandachi picked a bad time to return to Syria.

For a good part of his life, he lived in Jordan and Saudi Arabia, where he studied, and went on to work in the IT field in the Gulf states. In 2011, he returned to his hometown of Homs, where he bought a house and got engaged – the kind of stuff you do when you're expecting to begin a normal life.

Syrian dictator Bashar Assad had other plans. Not long after Dandachi's return, Assad launched his bloody campaign against the Syrian people. Homs, a rebel stronghold, was bombed mercilessly, and Dandachi, like other Syrians, found himself on the move. He now lives in Istanbul as a "guest" of the Turkish government, with no legal status and no way to ensure he is not forced to leave again at any time.

Dandachi's plight has touched a small group of Jewish, Christian and Arab Canadians who have mobilized to bring him to Canada as a sponsored refugee.

They have approached Jewish Immigrant Aid Services(JIAS) to handle the paperwork and legalities of sponsoring Dandachi, and they've launched a fundraising campaign that has collected nearly $11,000 toward the minimum $12,760 required to sponsor a single refugee. The Indiegogo component has raised more than $2,100 (US) toward a $4,000 goal.

They hope to have the paperwork in place and the full sum raised by the end of the year so that Dandachi can come to Canada as soon as possible, perhaps in as little as six months, said Lynne Teperman, spokesperson for the local sponsorship group.

Teperman has been familiar with Dandachi since January, when a friend showed her his blog site. She was impressed that at the time of the Hyper Cacher massacre in Paris, he had defended the Jewish community. She later saw him interviewed by the BBC and other news outlets and was impressed that he was friendly to Israel, against anti-Semitism and against Islamic extremism. "He's your incredible Arab liberal," she said.

Susan Oppenheim is also part of Dandachi's Canadian sponsorship group. She's been in contact with him for months, sending him articles about Canada and assimilation issues. She's confident he'll fit right in to Canadian society, given his fluency in English and professional qualifications. What's more, "He's a good person," she said. "He has nowhere to go if the Turkish government decides they don't want Syrians there."

A third member of the sponsorship group who wants to remain anonymous said she was impressed by Dandachi's blog reports that lauded Israeli efforts to help wounded Syrian civilians. He's written openly and favourably about Israel, and it would be suicidal for him to return to Syria, she said.

The sponsorship group consists of "private people who've come together around a particular person, because as Jews and supporters of Israel, for someone to have taken up our cause at personal risk, we have a moral obligation to help," she said.

Dandachi said he's grateful and a bit overwhelmed by the response of Canadian Jews to his plight and that of other Syrian refugees. "So many Jewish Canadian communities are helping Syrians, it's astounding to me," he said.

Aboud Dandachi

Speaking by phone from Istanbul, Dandachi, 39, told The CJN he spent his formative years in Saudi Arabia, where he went to high school, and attended university in Jordan. In Saudi Arabia, he was taught Jews are "treacherous. Jews tried to kill Muhammad," that they're a source of "never-ending enmity" and that "Jews are an evil entity who forever has to be feared and fought."

It was much the same in Syria and Jordan. It took a long time to change his attitude. There was no "Paul on the road to Damascus" moment when another perspective dawned on him, he said, but a key part of it was learning about Israel's medical aid for wounded Syrians. "That didn't fit" with what he'd learned, he said.

At the same time, he saw Hezbollah and Iran support Assad, who was slaughtering his own people. "The people who we were told are our friends were killing us. The people who we were told are our enemies were helping us," he said.

He felt Israelis' medical assistance was provided "out of deep human decency" that required a response from the Arab side. "We are not destined to be enemies" he said.

He began to express his views online, promoting good relations with Jews and Israel and criticizing extremism.

In July 2014, he condemned an incident in Calgary during a pro-Gaza demonstration, which turned ugly when a group of "pro-Palestine thugs," as he called them, held a "lynching" of a small group of pro-Israel counter-demonstrators, knocking one unconscious and attacking the others.

"On that day, it wasn't just a small group of Jews who were assaulted; it was the very core and definition of the values of Canadian society that were so blatantly and viciously violated," he wrote.

His writing on Israel and Jews didn't win him friends among other Syrians, including his own family. His relatives have seen him on Israeli TV and they're concerned. They told him, "People will hold it against us," Dandachi recounted.

He has lived in Istanbul for two years working as an online project manager for a Canadian firm, and has only good things to say about Canadians. His employer is accommodating, and he's been in touch with longtime friends in Calgary who "stood by me when they didn't have to. I won't ever forget that."

As he awaits word on moving to Canada, he knows that as a single male – his engagement broke apart during the war – he'll be flagged as problematic for security concerns. "As a refugee," he said, "you learn to ration your hope." ■

Victoria shul raising funds to sponsor Syrian family

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT

Rabbi Harry Brechner

It's been just over three weeks since Victoria's Congregation Emanu-El approved a motion to sponsor a Syrian refugee family and already $24,000 has been raised.

"About half of that is from the Jewish community and the other half is from the Victoria community," said Jean Dragushan, chair of the congregation's refugee sponsorship steering committee. The committee hopes to raise $50,000 and expects to sponsor a Syrian Muslim family.

"As we cannot forget our oppression and persecution over millennia, we also count our blessings for living in freedom and comfort in Canada," said the synagogue spiritual leader, Rabbi Harry Brechner.

"Jewish ethics enjoin us to reach out to others to help end their suffering. The concept of tikkun, or repair, is central to Jewish belief, in that it is our duty to try to fix what is broken in this world."

The 153-year-old Conservative shul is Canada's oldest synagogue in continuous operation. It has about 220 member families in a city with about 2,500 Jews.

The Intercultural Association of Greater Victoria, which offers services for immigrant and refugee newcomers, will help Congregation Emanu-El with the sponsorship process and the identification of a family to sponsor, likely one that already has relatives on the island, Dragushan added. The timeline for the family's arrival is anywhere from a few months up to a year.

Congregation members have been mostly positive about the sponsorship initiative, and if any concerns have been raised, they've been mostly about fear of the unknown, Dragushan said.

"It's a massive effort bringing as many refugees to Canada as are coming in now," she reflected. "We haven't seen so many people displaced by war since the 1930s."

Dragushan said the committee has invited a couple of other Jewish organizations on the island to participate in the sponsorship, but has not yet received a response. The initiative has attracted interest from the media on Vancouver Island, specifically CBC. Dragushan said she was interviewed by a reporter about the dynamic of a Jewish community sponsoring a Muslim family.

"The family we sponsor will need to know they've been sponsored by a Jewish group and be comfortable with that," she said. "But the Intercultural Association told us it's highly unlikely to be a problem." ■

CORRECTION

The article "Vancouver Jews rally to help Syrian refugees" (Dec. 10) stated incorrectly that Rabbi Howard Siegel is spiritual leader of Beth Israel Synagogue in Richmond, B.C. In fact, he is spiritual leader of Richmond's Beth Tikvah Synagogue, while Congregation Beth Israel is located in Vancouver. The CJN regrets the error.

Montreal Jews and Muslims join to help Syrian refugees

Temple was first local Jewish organization to raise funds and now hopes to sponsor three families

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Jews and Muslims can find common cause in assisting Syrian refugees, and in doing so, appreciate the similarity of their religious values.

That was the message conveyed at a meeting of members of the two communities addressed by Rabbi Lisa Grushcow, senior rabbi of Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom, and Shaheen Ashraf, secretary of the Canadian Council of Muslim Women, Montreal chapter.

About 50 people attended the event at the Atwater Library on Dec. 15, convened by the new Jewish-Muslim Forum of Montreal.

It was the first open event of the group, which is an initiative of the New York-based Foundation for Ethnic Understanding (FFEU), in partnership with CRARR (Centre for Research-Action on Race Relations), a local non-profit organization that has been combating discrimination for more than 30 years.

Since 2008, FFEU has fostered Muslim-Jewish dialogue around the world, including in Toronto, organizing "twinning" events annually in November and December. This year, such events took place in more than 30 cities, said Walter Ruby, director of the program.

The temple was the first Montreal Jewish group to commit to sponsoring refugees. It announced in September that it would sponsor at least one family and undertake to raise a minimum of $30,000.

Rabbi Grushcow said the congregation is now hoping to sponsor three families. All the paperwork has been done for the first family and most of it for the second, she said. The temple is now trying to identify a third family to sponsor. As is the norm, the temple does not know when the families will arrive, and temple members may be given as little as 24 hours notice.

The response from the 900-member Reform congregation was beyond expectations. Officially launched on the first day of Rosh Hashanah – a Monday – the project raised $25,000 by that Friday and more than $40,000 by Yom Kippur, Rabbi Grushcow said. At the end of the month, the total was close to $70,000.

Moreover, temple members are eager to lend their expertise, including immigration lawyers David Berger and David Cohen, or volunteer in other ways during the year after the refugees arrive, a process that's part of the sponsorship commitment.

Sponsors must identify specific people they want to assist. Rabbi Grushcow said the temple's refugees were found through relatives living in Montreal. For their security, she did not want to publicize details about them, but it can be made known that they are coming from refugee camps in Jordan and Lebanon. One family has five children. There is a pharmacist and a French teacher among the parents. And they are Muslim.

Rabbi Grushcow said the congregation never made religion a consideration, but the attitude outside has not been so open.

"People quietly ask, 'Are they Christian or Muslim? Christians are a minority and are being persecuted, and are you sure Muslims want to be sponsored by a synagogue?'"

> This welcoming gesture will give Canada a good name again in the world, especially the Middle East, where it is sorely needed.

Others have been less polite, even Islamophobic, she has found. "They hate us, they may be dangerous – are you sure you want to do this?" she quoted some as saying.

"My response is that the only relevant question is that we are people of faith, and the Torah calls upon us to welcome the stranger," Rabbi Grushcow said, and this crisis speaks to our common humanity.

She added that this is an opportunity to build relationships with Muslims and get beyond stereotypes.

Ashraf said Islam also teaches that its adherents must help the stranger, especially those who are the victims of oppression.

"This welcoming gesture will give Canada a good name again in the world, especially the Middle East, where it is sorely needed," she said, adding that Canada has shown "political courage and vision at a time when xenophobia in Europe and the United States is growing."

Muslims and Jews, as "children of Abraham," should "be in step with each other." Ashraf said she is already pitching in with some Jewish individuals who are sponsors.

This event served as a chance for those involved with refugee relief to get to know each other.

In practical terms, Rabbi Grushcow said Jews and Muslims can begin by sharing their expertise, for example in legal matters, and co-ordinating their efforts.

The other participants included Bilal Hamideh, a board member of the Canadian Muslim Forum and Canadian Alliance for Syrian Aid steering committee member; and Karen Mock of Toronto, representing the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims, which works with the FFEU.

An unscheduled intervenor who was warmly welcomed was Muhamad Al Bukaai, who identified himself as a Syrian refugee who arrived three months earlier. He thanked everyone for what they are doing to help other refugees.

Ruby also congratulated Canadians generally for their "human decency" in contrast to the "anti-Muslim demagogy" in the United States.

"That you are welcoming 25,000 refugees is mind-boggling, when my country can't even get it together to take 10,000," he said.

Elsewhere in the Jewish community, the Reconstructionist Congregation Dorshei Emet is trying to raise $30,000 to qualify as a refugee sponsor and has begun the process of selecting individuals or a family, as required by the federal government.

The modern Orthodox Adath Israel Congregation has been collecting clothing and personal care products to donate to Syrian refugees in Jordan. Rabbi Michael Whitman said an individual he can vouch for will take the goods directly to Jordan for distribution. ■

Rabbis, bishops highlight danger facing Christians

plungen@thecjn.ca

Bishop Douglas Crosby

Not long ago, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl was speaking to an acquaintance who's originally from Mosul, Iraq. The man had been in touch with relatives back home and relayed disturbing news. They told him people from ISIS had scrawled the Arabic letter nun on the door of their house.

Nun is the first letter in the word "Nazarene" and was used to identify the family as Christian, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said.

Contemplating what he'd heard, the rabbi wondered "what it would be like if in Canada in 1939, '40, '41, '42, I got a call from a relative in Europe. How would I feel?"

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, however, is not without resources. As co-chair of the Canadian Rabbinic Caucus and active in multifaith dialogue, he joined with Most Rev. Douglas Crosby, head of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, to write a letter to Foreign Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion, hoping to focus the minister's attention on the issue.

The letter calls on the federal government to "make a priority of advocating for at-risk Christian communities throughout the Middle East and Africa, and likewise explore new and effective ways of providing diplomatic and humanitarian assistance to alleviate their suffering." Rabbi Frydman-Kohl is hoping to follow up the letter with a personal meeting with Dion.

The letter cites a report that "between 200 million and 230 million [Christians] face daily threats of murder, beating, imprisonment and torture, and a further 350 million to 400 million encounter discrimination in areas such as jobs and housing." It further cites findings by the Pew Research Center that "Christians around the world face more persecution, restrictions, hostility and harassment than any other religious group."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said he began to take more of an interest in the issue after a meeting late last winter hosted by the then-minister of immigration and attended by local representatives of minority Middle East religions.

In attendance were spokespeople from Eastern Christian churches – Christianity's earliest churches – as well as Yazidis, Roman Catholics, Anglicans and the United Church. The focus of the meeting was refugee relief and how to preserve indigenous Middle Eastern religious groups. Soon after, Canada announced it would welcome 10,000 Syrian refugees.

"I became more sensitized to their plight, and I began to do my own reading," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said.

He learned the ancient churches were facing persecution in the region. Jews, too, had faced discrimination and danger, and 850,000 were forced to abandon their communities in the Middle East and North Africa. The vast majority settled in Israel, the Jews' ancestral homeland, but for the members of the churches, "this is their historic homeland… They want to remain. They don't want to re-settle in Canada. They want to remain close to their communities."

By bringing their concerns to Dion's attention, the religious leaders are adding their "moral voice" to the issue, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said.

Bishop Crosby said the idea for the joint letter arose at a meeting of the Catholic-Rabbinic Caucus dialogue."We want the Canadian government to be aware, first of all," he said. "It's a new government. I think the idea is that if the two of us sign [the letter], it might capture the attention of the minister and demonstrate we're aware of this."

Bishop Crosby told The CJN that grave reports are filtering out of the region. "The Christian community in the Middle East is diminishing, because people are fleeing. They fear for their lives," he said.

The situation for Christians in Iraq and Iran is particularly dire, but there are also Christian refugees from Syria fleeing the conflict there, he added.

Rev. Karen Hamilton, general secretary of the Canadian Council of Churches, representing 25 Christian denominations, applauded the letter for highlighting the plight of Christians. "People are being persecuted for their religion in a region that is the birthplace of Christianity," she said.

She said Dion should invite Rabbi Frydman-Kohl and Bishop Crosby to discuss the issue, and she suggested other steps to highlight the plight of Christians in the Middle East and North Africa: promote it for discussion at the United Nations; make it an agenda item when faith leaders meet and when world leaders meet; and continue to welcome refugees, among them Christians. ■

B.C. Jewish MP enjoys bringing people together

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT

Dan Ruimy

If there's one thing Dan Ruimy is good at, it's getting people together and promoting dialogue.

Ruimy is the new Liberal MP for the riding of Pitt Meadows-Maple Ridge in British Columbia, a suburban-rural district a half hour from Vancouver. He won the riding last fall with 34 per cent of the vote, beating his Tory and NDP rivals in a tight three-way race. Its predecessor riding had been held by the Conservatives since 2004 and before that was a Reform/Canadian Alliance stronghold. The Liberals ran a distant third in the district in 2011.

Ruimy is also the 53-year-old son of Jewish Moroccan immigrants to Canada.

In the mid-1950s, Ruimy's parents Andre and Jacqueline moved to Montreal's Côte-des-Neiges neighbourhood, where they raised their five sons and ran Cantor's Bakery in Côte-des-Neiges, as well as a grocery store in Habitat 67. Dan attended synagogue with his family on the High Holidays. Later, a 27-year career in the food and beverage industry led the unmarried Ruimy all over the country as he filled positions at McDonald's, A&W and Quiznos.

All that traveling took its toll, and by 2011, he was ready to settle down, get grounded in one community and find a place to call home. He chose Maple Ridge and purchased a second-hand bookstore that sold loose-leaf tea. Today, he's still the owner of Bean Around Books & Tea, and credits the tea and coffee shop as having played a pivotal role in his decision to enter politics.

"At Bean Around, I saw what happens when you include people in your community," he reflected. "Having spent my life in the hospitality industry, my personality is all about social contact. At the tea shop, I saw there was a craving for that, so I'd introduce people to each other and help make connections. It's quite an amazing thing to watch a 15-year-old engaging an 86-year-old in dialogue. When I started thinking about running for public office, I realized that this is what I could do for my community: create dialogue, bring people together and help people find solutions for the challenges they encounter every day."

Ruimy feels strongly about community and what comprises it.

"The Syrian refugees are a perfect example," he said. "By including them we become a stronger community. Isn't that what Canada is all about? We're a nation built on immigration. We shouldn't shun people. We should welcome them with open arms, because that's our future as well."

> I hope to be an agent of change and bring those opportunities to young people.

Since being sworn in as a member of Parliament in November, Ruimy has hired extra staff for his shop to accommodate a busy schedule commuting to and from Ottawa.

But while he's no stranger to traveling for work, it's different this time, he said.

"This is my home base now. I have a community to come back to. In the past, I'd come back to an empty place where I didn't know my neighbours and wasn't involved, but for the first time in my life, I can actually say I'm coming home."

He plans to open a constituency office in his riding by next month. It's "tough" to be Jewishly affiliated in Maple Ridge, he said, given that there are few Jews living there. But in Ottawa, he's joined the Canada-Israel Interparliamentary Group.

"Having those roots is important to me, and I think we lose sight when we're not involved in that part of our community," he said.

Ruimy said the key issues he'll be working on are homelessness, affordable housing, helping struggling seniors, and providing assistance to youth trying to find jobs.

"There's lots of opportunity in Canada, but for some reason people have difficulty finding the programs," he said. "I hope to be an agent of change and help bring those opportunities to young people."

The most exciting moment of his parliamentary career to date was attending the first sitting of the new House earlier this month. "For the first time, you're seeing the 334 people who got elected, and at that moment it sunk in how lucky I am to have been given this opportunity. It's a privilege, really, and I feel proud that people sent me here to represent them, that they put their trust and confidence in me." ■

Nursing home raises funds to improve quality of life

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT, WINNIPEG

The Saul and Claribel Simkin Centre, Winnipeg's Jewish nursing home marked Giving Tuesday recently with birthday parties for six of its oldest residents and a pitch to supporters to contribute to the institution's campaign to raise $147,000 by the end of March for quality-of-life enhancements for its 199 residents.

"Ninety per cent of residents at the Simkin Centre suffer from a dementia-related illness, and many have barriers to mobility or communication," said Laurel Hogan, the facility's fundraising officer. "As a result of advances in health care, we have people coming to us with very complex health issues.

"While the Winnipeg Regional Health Authority [WRHA] provides for our core funding needs, it doesn't cover spiritual care, volunteer services, therapeutic recreation, end-of-life care, Shabbat and holiday services, along other programs like music therapy, special events, and our concert series."

Hogan said the seniors residence has been offering music therapy for six years.

"We piloted the music program for iPods two years ago," she said. "The one-on-one music therapy program with iPads and iPods helps to stimulate people with cognitive disabilities and dementia to be able to interact better socially."

> The one-on-one music therapy program with iPads and iPods helps to stimulate people with cognitive disabilities and dementia to be able to interact better socially.

One of the goals of the current campaign is to raise $7,000 to purchase 10 more iPads and five more iPods, Hogan said.

She noted that $250 will buy one iPod plus accessories, $750 will buy one iPad plus accessories, and $60 pays for one art or music therapy session for a resident.

"We also hope to raise funds in support of art therapy sessions and regular massage therapy," Hogan said. "We would require an additional $12,000 for massage therapy and $3,000 more for regular art therapy. The total cost [for massage, art and music therapy] would be about $75,000."

The Simkin Centre has one major fundraiser a year – an annual fundraising walk in the spring that brought in $23,000 last year, Hogan said, adding that interest from several endowment funds under the auspices of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba will also help the cause.

"We're sending letters out to members of the community [this month] asking for donations," she said. "As of Nov. 30, we raised $103,000 in donations and grants."

"We are also working on building a new database to make fundraising more efficient, and we're in the process of forming a new foundation."

Giving Tuesday is a global day of charitable giving that happens each year after Black Friday and Cyber Monday. It's a time when Canadians, charities and businesses come together to celebrate giving and participate in activities that support charities and non-profits, Hogan said. ■

Supermarket mogul was revered in community

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Arnold Steinberg

His name was synonymous with the supermarket chain of which he was chief financial officer, but most of Arnold Steinberg's life was devoted to higher education and health care, especially associated with his beloved alma mater, McGill University.

Steinberg, who was McGill's 18th and first Jewish chancellor, died suddenly on Dec. 11 at age 82. Steinberg was also founding chairman of the board of the McGill University Health Centre.

"Arnold was a prince of a man," said former principal and vice-chancellor Heather Munroe-Blum, who worked closely with Steinberg during his five-year term, which ended last year. "He shaped McGill, Montreal and Canada in deeply progressive and positive ways – uniquely, indelibly.

"He influenced everyone he met through his gracious warmth, joyous optimism and incisive intelligence."

His chancellorship capped 60 years of service to McGill. At his death he held the title of chancellor emeritus. Steinberg was also revered in the Jewish community for leadership and philanthropy. In September, he was named man of the year by the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal. He served on the executive committee of Federation CJA and the foundation's investment committee.

Among the many organizations he supported, in close collaboration with wife Blema, were the Jewish Public Library, Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors, Mount Sinai Hospital and YM-YWHA.

Although Steinberg was destined for a career in the family business after graduating from McGill in 1954 with a bachelor of commerce (a Harvard MBA followed), he always had a keen interest in improving public health.

In the 1960s, as a senior Steinberg's executive, he partnered with the Montreal Children's Hospital's Dr. Charles Scriver to campaign for adding vitamin D to milk as an effective way to prevent rickets, then still rampant in Quebec. Steinberg's major milk supplier refused to add the vitamin, so Steinberg issued an ultimatum: do it or lose the contract with the province's largest supermarket chain. It worked and rickets became a scourge of the past in the province.

Steinberg would go on to serve as chairman of the board of governors of the McGill University-Montreal Children's Hospital Research Institute for 19 years, and later 10 years on McGill's board of governors.

In the past decade, one of his and his wife's key philanthropic interests has been McGill's Steinberg Centre for Simulation and Interactive Learning, the first health-care training facility of its kind in Canada when it opened in 2006. In October, the Steinbergs donated an additional $7.5 million for its expansion and to upgrade its technology. The funding will let it bring together education and research and, in the near future, patient and community education, under one roof. The gift brought the couple's total donations to McGill to more than $17 million.

Another activity that absorbed him in latter years was, until 2010, chairing the board of Canada Health Infoway, a joint federal-provincial-territorial initiative to develop electronic health information systems in Canada. The work complemented his responsibilities with the Canadian Institutes for Health Research, the largest of the federal government's funding agencies.

Steinberg was the son of Nathan Steinberg, one of the children of Ida Steinberg, who founded the grocery store in 1917, which grew into Quebec's first modern supermarket chain. After the family sold the business in 1989 (it folded three years later), Steinberg became co-owner of the investment holding firm Cleman Ludmer Steinberg Inc.

McGill principal Suzanne Fortier said: "Arnold's five-year tenure as chancellor of McGill University was extraordinary… he brought to the job a boundless curiosity and focused intelligence."

Among other honours, Steinberg was named a member of the Order of Canada in 1993, he received an honorary doctorate from McGill in 2000 and the Université de Montréal in 2009, and was made an officer of the Order of Quebec in 2013.

Besides Blema, a McGill professor emeritus of political science, Steinberg is survived by their children, Margot, Donna and Adam, and five grandchildren. ■

Canadian Sephardim mull Spanish citizenship offer

Montrealers seem more eager than Torontonians to go through complicated and expensive application process

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

When it comes to a new Spanish law that allows descendants of Jews expelled during the Inquisition to seek Spanish citizenship, Sephardi Jews in Toronto appear to be less enthusiastic about it than their Montreal counterparts.

According to Simon Keslassy, the president of the Communauté Juive Marocaine de Toronto (CMJT), there don't seem to be many Sephardim who are eager to take advantage of the opportunity.

"Even people from CJMT, they are not very hot on this, because I heard from people that there are a lot of procedures to do this application, and it's a long process. It's not very easy," Keslassy said, adding that he didn't see much benefit to applying for Spanish citizenship.

"I'm not interested in having a Spanish passport. There may be some people who want to do it, because Spain belongs to the European Union, and once they have a Spanish passport, they'll belong to the European community... Otherwise, it's not advantageous for anything."

But Raphael Assor, the director of government relations for the Communauté Sépharade Unifiée du Québec (CSUQ), said there are many Jews in Montreal who are interested in the opportunity.

Although it is too soon to know how many people are applying, Assor said he suspects the number could be anywhere from 100 to 300.

He said that after the Spanish citizenship law passed in October, the CSUQ held a meeting with the consul general of Spain in Montreal that was attended by about 150 people.

Currently, fewer than 5,000 Sephardim, out of an estimated 3.5 million worldwide, have sought citizenship since the law was passed two months ago. Spain has one of the smallest Jewish communities in the European Union, with only about 50,000 Jews out of a total population of about 47 million.

According to Soeren Kern, a senior fellow at the Gatestone Institute, a non-profit international policy council and think-tank, there are so many hurdles to obtaining Spanish citizenship that most of those who might qualify would be deterred from following through.

Spain's King Felipe VI

He wrote that among some of the many provisions required to obtain citizenship, applicants must prove their Sephardi background through their ancestry, surname and spoken language – either Ladino, a medieval Jewish-Spanish language, or Haketia, a mixture of Hebrew, Spanish and Judeo-Moroccan Arabic.

For younger hopefuls, most applicants would be disqualified from the start because of the language requirement, since both are dying languages spoken mostly by elderly Latin Americans, Moroccans and Turks.

In addition to the language requirement, applicants living outside Spain must have their heritage verified and certified by Jewish associations or rabbinical authorities in their home countries, and then they must be validated again by the Madrid-based Federation of Jewish Communities.

An applicant is also required to travel to Spain at their own expense to write two exams that demonstrate basic Spanish language proficiency and an understanding of the Spanish Constitution, culture and society.

Late last month, Spain's King Felipe VI honoured Sephardi Jews at a ceremony recognizing the new law and thanked them for "having kept like a precious treasure your language and your customs that are ours, too. Thank you, too, for making love prevail over rancour and for teaching your children to love this country. How we have missed you."

The law was passed in an effort to rectify the damage done to Spain's Jewish community during the Spanish Inquisition in the 15th century, when 400,000 Jews were expelled and tens of thousands more were either forced to convert to Catholicism or executed.

But Yehuda Azoulay, founder of the Toronto-based Sephardic Legacy Institute, whose goal is to preserve Sephardi heritage, said the new law elicits more questions rather than provides closure for Sephardim.

"Why all of the sudden is the Spanish government giving citizenship to Sephardi Jews? What are the benefits? What is the real intention behind the scenes in the Spanish government? Do Sephardi Jews need this citizenship?" Azoulay asked.

Jon Iñarritu García, a Spanish congressman, challenged the government's new law in an address to Spain's Parliament last June.

"We want to express our disappointment, because this law, which was supposed to restore justice, has become increasingly complicated. If we observe the procedures, the prerequisites, the number of documents to be submitted, the certified translations, the fees, the language and culture exams and the need to travel to Spain, we cannot but wonder about the reason for all of these hurdles," he said, adding that the cost for each applicant could be up to $6,700 (US).

Azoulay said that he hasn't heard of anyone who intends to follow through with the process.

"No one really talks or cares about it... I spoke to the Canadian ambassador [to Spain], and he seemed to have very little interest," Azoulay said.

"It is vague and unclear, therefore, in my humble opinion it is all a waste of time."

Assor, whose parents come from Spanish-speaking cities in Morocco, said he'll seek citizenship and suspects many in Montreal will do the same.

While some have expressed dismay and have been deterred by the complicated process, he receives daily calls from people who are eager to begin their applications.

Assor said most have no plan to go back to Spain, "because our lives are here, but we appreciate the recognition. It is very important that after more than five centuries they recognized the expulsion."

Keslassy, also a Moroccan Jew, agreed that the acknowledgement from the king is important to the community.

"One thing I'm happy about is that the king of Spain had a meeting with the Jewish community in Spain... he asked for forgiveness for what happened in 1492 and he welcomed all the Sephardi, Spanish-speaking Jews to come to Spain. It was a good thing. But for a passport, I'm not interested," he said. ■

Jewish restaurants have long history in Toronto

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Get a group of people together socially and more often than not the conversation will veer towards food. Usually the topic is restaurants. For foodies the talk may be culinary trends, and for young men, craft beer is all the rage.

Any discussion about Jewish food in Toronto often leads to the inevitable bagel debate. Montreal, Gryfe's, Bagel World – everyone has their favourite. And that was no different for the six people who met for brunch at United Bakers Dairy Restaurant in Lawrence Plaza.

They had gathered for an event that focused specifically on Jewish food – a presentation on the history of Jewish restaurants in Toronto by Ellen Scheinberg, president of Heritage Professionals. They were taking part in a brunch that was a Heritage Toronto silent auction prize won by Irving Himel and his son, Andrew.

The Himels were the highest bidders for breakfast with Steve Paikin, host of TVO's The Agenda; Toronto Star food writer, Corey Mintz; Toronto City Councillor and TTC chair, Josh Colle, and Scheinberg, a co-editor of The Ward (Coach House Books 2015) and the facilitator of the morning's discussion. She and Andrew Himel are both board members of Heritage Toronto.

Also on hand to talk about their restaurant were Philip and Ruth Ladovsky, the brother and sister team who run United Bakers. The 103-year-old establishment is one of the longest running family-owned restaurants in the country.

United Bakers was founded in 1912 by Philip and Ruth's paternal grandparents, Aaron and Sarah Ladovsky, Polish immigrants from Kielce. Sarah and Aaron both had baking backgrounds. Their marriage united the two baking families, hence the bakery's name.

As the brunch group consumed a sumptuous meal of scrambled eggs, blintzes, latkes, bagels, vegetarian chopped liver and United Bakers' signature pea soup, Ruth Ladovsky gave a brief history of the restaurant.

Its original location was on Agnes Street in the Ward, an immigrant neighbourhood in downtown Toronto bounded by University Avenue and College Street, and Queen and Yonge streets. In the first decade of the 20th century, the ward was 80 per cent Jewish, Scheinberg said.

In 1920, United Bakers relocated to Spadina Avenue when the Jewish community moved to the Kensington Market area. Ruth said that Yiddish authors Sholem Asch and Isaac Bashevis Singer had both eaten at the restaurant.

In fact, in Singer's trilogy, Love and Exile, United Bakers was supposedly the inspiration for a fictional restaurant, where > Everyone spoke Yiddish and knew one another

"everyone spoke Yiddish and knew one another," she said.

Scheinberg pointed out that the first kosher restaurant was actually JS Goldenberg's, which opened on Terauley Street in 1908. His brother, William Goldenberg, ran a kosher restaurant across the street.

The Goldenberg restaurants also moved to Spadina Avenue, which became a prime strip for Jewish eateries. W. Goldenberg continued operating until the mid '50s.

Daiter's Fresh Market, which closed its doors this year after more than 80 years, began as a dairy restaurant on Kensington Avenue in 1937. The establishment moved to Bathurst Street in 1959, following the migration of the Jewish community from downtown to the Bathurst Street corridor in the '50s and '60s.

Shopsy's opened on Spadina Avenue in 1921. Down the block was Switzers, which started in the 1940s and remained at that location until 1991. United Bakers moved from Spadina Avenue to Lawrence Plaza in 1986.

Irving Himel, noted that pastrami and corned beef were more common in Toronto than smoked meat, which he said was a Montreal delicacy.

Mintz spoke about Caplansky's Deli, a delicatessen on College Street, which opened in 2007. He said owner Zane Caplansky, who changed his name from Caplan to the original Jewish name, epitomizes a trend called reverse assimilation. Rather than lose their heritage and assimilate, people market their ethnicity, Mintz explained. ■

2015: the year in review

Jews also weighed in on both sides of controversial election issues, such as wearing niqabs at citizenship ceremonies and how many and which Syrian refugees Canada should allow into the country.

Near the end of the year, as Trudeau renewed his pledge to resettle 25,000 refugees, Jewish groups and shuls across Canada stepped forward to help, even as some Jewish voices urged caution in vetting the newcomers to weed out Islamist elements.

In November, in the first test of Trudeau's election pledge to be as strong a friend of Israel as former prime minister Stephen Harper had been, Canada voted against an annual raft of Arab-sponsored UN resolutions targeting the Jewish state.

Other international stories that hit home this year included news last month that a former Bnei Akiva shaliach and teacher at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Rabbi Ya'acov Don, 51, was killed in a West Bank terror attack, part of ongoing violence in Israel marked by shootings, stabbings and car-rammings.

In June, Auschwitz-born Montrealer Angela Orosz-Richt told former SS guard Oskar Groening at his trial in Germany that she can never forgive him. Groening was sentenced to four years in prison for his role in murdering 300,000 Hungarian Jews in the camp.

On issues of identity and education, The CJN took a deeper look at camps' role in fostering Jewish affiliation and day schools' struggles to attract students as tuition fees rise inexorably.

In the most interesting of these stories, Tyler Weir, 13, of Richmond Hill, Ont., was barred from Camp Solelim, a Young Judaea camp in Sudbury, because he's not Jewish. He'd attended Camp Shalom, a Solelim feeder camp, in 2014. The story touched off a debate in the Jewish community and beyond. Some argued the camp made a PR blunder in rejecting Tyler, while others defended the camp's faith-based mission to inculcate Jewish values among teens at a key age.

Other notable stories from 2015:

• In March, The CJN uncovered online real estate ads for houses in Brampton, Ont., with the tagline, "You don't have to be Jewish to buy this house." The agent named in the ads said a third party posted them and he didn't know the slogan had been used. When contacted, the Philippines-based firm that wrote the ads said it wasn't anti-Jewish and blamed the error on a new hire who innocently thought "Jewish" means "rich."

• In June, B'nai Brith Canada said it plans to sell its Toronto headquarters. A short time later, it began seeking a buyer for its dementia residence in the city. The home opened in 2013, but has never been more than half full. B'nai Brith's financial situation is a story we'll be watching in 2016.

• Also in June, the Jewish National Fund of Canada cancelled former Arkansas governor and U.S. Republican presidential hopeful Mike Huckabee's keynote address at JNF Ottawa's Oct. 15 Negev Diner after objections about his comments on gays and lesbians.

•In late spring, we reported on a scaled-down plan to rebuild Toronto's Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. In 2007, before the recession, the new facility was forecast to cost $100 million. The revised smaller project will cost $65 million and construction won't start for two more years, community officials said.

• In August, Steve Maman, the Montreal businessman who gained global attention for claims he was rescuing Christian and Yazidi women and girls from ISIS, said he was suing Yazidi leaders and others who demanded he prove his claims. He said he'd crowd-funded more than $387,000 and negotiated to free more than 120 captives.

• After a long-simmering debate, the 16-member choir at Beth Tzedec Congregation, North America's largest Conservative shul, resigned en masse this month when the synagogue demanded that every member of the group, comprising Jews and non-Jews, affirm their Jewish identities. Spiritual leader Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl said the change to the membership requirements is in line with Conservative practice. ■

Laffa, however, is a rather recent addition, thanks in part to Dr. Laffa, which introduced many of us to the thick flatbread that's giving pita bread a run for its money. In July, patrons noticed that two doors down from Dr. Laffa's Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue location stood a new laffa eatery, Famous Laffa. The CJN learned that the partners who owned the former, Yoram Gabay and Sason (Sasi) Haba, had actually split up over legal issues.

Stamp features rabbi, imam, bishop

In a year plagued with Islamophobia and anti-Semitism, stories that highlighted people working together to foster a united religious front were scarce, and CJN readers relished the opportunity to learn about a forthcoming new stamp in Belgium adorned with the faces of the country's Chief Rabbi Albert Guigui, Imam Khalid Benhaddou and the Bishop of Antwerp Johan Bonny.

Former CHAT teacher killed

Since the recent wave of violence against Israeli civilians began more than three months ago, each assault has touched us all deeply, though none hit as close to home as the death of Rabbi Ya'acov Don, who spent four years in Toronto as a Jewish studies teacher. Rabbi Don, along with two others, was killed on Nov. 19, when a Palestinian opened fire on cars near the West Bank settlement of Alon Shvut. Torontonians mourned him through heartfelt tributes, including a former colleague who told The CJN that "his passion for Israel was contagious, and he had a real influence on students and staff."

Disabled teen's SickKids bar mitzvah

CJN readers were moved by the touching story of Jacob Trossman, the first-ever 13-year-old to celebrate his bar mitzvah at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto. Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation, called Jacob's simchah an example of the importance of promoting an inclusive Jewish community.

Canada votes against UN resolutions

For Canadian Jews, the election was undoubtedly the most widely discussed event of the year. Conservatives and Liberals came out with political guns blazing, with Conservatives claiming that Trudeau would not maintain Stephen Harper's staunch support for the Jewish state. Since taking office, Trudeau has silenced his critics (for now), after his government voted against a raft of Arab-sponsored UN resolutions targeting the Jewish state. Canada voted against all of the six resolutions adopted.

Actress strikes it rich in Netflix

Twenty-one-year-old Brooke Wexler is something of a local hero, after Netflix cast her to play a robot maid in a live-action TV adaptation of celebrated comic book character Richie Rich. The CJN spoke to Wexler about the series, which she described as fun for the whole family.

10 best Jewish Instagram accounts

With over 400 million active users, Instagram has proven the most popular social media platform after Facebook. Naturally, there is a wide array of Jewish-themed accounts focusing on anything from quirky Jewish memes to delectable kosher foods. After scouring the depths of the photo-sharing app, The CJN found 10 Jewish accounts deserving of praise, most of which will likely inspire laughter or awaken your appetite for lox and cream cheese bagels.

On the niqab, where are the Jews?

The CJN published several articles on the niqab debate prominently included on the Canadian election trail, but none struck a chord with readers as much as Danielle Kubes' piece likening Zunera Ishaq's struggle to wear a niqab during her citizenship ceremony to a legislator who was kicked out of Parliament in 1808 after displaying his Jewish faith. "When we support Ishaq's freedom, we support our own. And if we do not fight for Ishaq, who will be left to fight for us?" Kubes asked, a question that several CJN readers answered. "Speaking as a Jewish woman, I feel that we should stand up for our Muslim sisters," one Facebook user wrote. ■

Shin Bet lashes out at Jewish terror groups

JUDAH ARI GROSS
JERUSALEM

The usually taciturn Shin Bet security service lashed out against Jewish terror organizations on Dec. 17, saying the groups display "extremist, anti-Zionist ideology" and bear responsibility for the current unrest in Israel and the West Bank.

In recent weeks, the Shin Bet and police have arrested a number of far-right Jewish Israelis believed to be members of one such extremist Jewish group, under the suspicion that they carried out "grave terror attacks," the Shin Bet said in a statement, referring specifically to the killing of three members of the Dawabsha family in a firebombing attack this summer.

"These terror attacks, which are suspected of having been carried out by the organization, led to the murder of three innocent Palestinians, which destabilized the area and negatively influenced the security situation," the Shin Bet said.

Eighteen-month-old Ali Saad Dawabsha and his parents were killed in the firebombing of their home in the Palestinian village of Duma on July 31. The couple's then-four-year-old son was the sole survivor of his immediate family.

A Star of David and the words "revenge" and "long live the messiah" were also spray-painted on a wall near the family's small house.

Since the deadly attack, Palestinians have often highlighted the firebombing and lack of progress in the case as one of the causes of the ongoing wave of knife, gun and car-ramming attacks targeting Israelis that has swept through the country since mid-September.

The Shin Bet accused the suspects of using "violent means to bring about a change in the government in the State of Israel."

Earlier in the day, the suspects' attorneys accused the Shin Bet of "outrageous physical violence" against their clients.

"The Shin Bet investigators are allowing themselves to abuse and strike the youth. I understand that the investigators want to arrive at their goal, but there's a limit," the lawyers, all from the Honenu organization, which principally handles cases of Israelis accused of nationalistic crimes, said during a press conference.

The Shin Bet, however, claimed in a statement that the suspects were not tortured, but were rather "interrogated in an intensive way with regards to the suspicions against them."

The groups, which often do not recognize the authority of the Israeli government and army, have been blamed for both serious violence, as with the Dawabsha killings, and petty vandalism against Palestinians, Christian holy sites and Israeli military property.

News broke earlier this month about the arrests of several Jewish extremists, following widespread rumours of a "dramatic development" in a major case, though most of the information related to the case, including the identities of the suspects, remains under an official gag order.

This week, Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon told Army Radio that security services knew who carried out the attack, "but we do not have enough proof yet to try them."

Right-wing figures have come out harshly against the Shin Bet and other legal authorities for their investigation.

Jewish Home party Knesset member Bezalel Smotrich even denied that the murder of the three Dawabsha family members was a terror attack, saying in a newspaper column that attacks by Jewish youths were "serious crimes," which may be nationalistically motivated, but should not be equated with attacks by Palestinians.

Apparently referring to the Duma investigation, the ultra-conservative lawmaker further claimed the Shin Bet had "crossed all red lines" in apparent regard to the Duma investigation. Smotrich even appeared to break a gag order on the probe, referring to specific suspects that had been taken in for questioning.

Joining Smotrich, the leader of the anti-Arab Lehava organization, Bentzi Gopstein, denounced the Shin Bet in a tweet for "the harsh tortures" that suspects in the case were subjected to. Gopstein also broke the gag order, revealing the age of one of the suspects.

"We are sending a message to these youth that they are the enemy. What a shame. It will only lead to difficult things, unfortunately. Someone mature and responsible is needed to calm down the Shin Bet," he wrote.

Those condemnations of the Shin Bet, from both official figures like Smotrich and fringe radicals like Gopstein, did not go unnoticed by the security service.

"Unfortunately, since carrying out the arrests, the Shin Bet has recognized a proactive and ongoing effort whose goal is to slander the agency and its workers, and disrupt our operational activities," the security service said.

"This attempt deserves all manner of condemnation and will not weaken the hands of the Shin Bet going forward in its actions, as it fights for the citizens of Israel under our national values," the Shin Bet said. ■

OPINION

Resilient Israelis starting to bounce back

Yair Lootsteen

December is my favourite time of year. Chanukah is a great family holiday and the weather is cool. In Jerusalem, where I live, evenings can be downright cold. Stone-tiled floors, laid with our summers in mind, make for extra indoor heating challenges.

Between much needed rainy periods, the warm sunny days are splendid. I don't know why, but when it finally comes down, it doesn't just rain here, it literally pours, the torrents cleansing our streets of the grime that accumulates during a half year or more with no precipitation.

And nature, being nature, takes its path. Rain and sunshine set a metamorphosis in motion. Dry, dull and yellowing, end of summer flora is supplanted by revitalizing green vegetation.

We're told by weather forecasters – a non-prophet livelihood if there ever was one – that precipitation this winter will be just above average. Till now, central and southern regions of the country have received rainfall above average for this time of year, but the north, with the Sea of Galilee and other important reservoirs still to be filled, is well below the standard, although we have till mid-March to catch up, and those prophets say we might.

You must be thinking: "Why is he writing about this when so many security related dramas and tragedies are taking place where he lives? Daily stabbings, shootings, pedestrians run over by terrorists. Doesn't he have something better, more important to write about?"

That's just the point. We Israelis are a resilient people. No, there's no remarkably good news yet. Peace is not upon us. The terrorism we're experiencing will continue. Not enough tourists; businesses still suffering. The rift between right and left continues to broaden and expand.

And while I'm not certain it's something we can pride ourselves on, or rather another force of nature, human nature, once again we seem to be bouncing back. Just a bit. I feel it in my own surroundings. Kids, including my 15-year-old, taking buses again. People sequestering themselves less in their homes. On the fifth night of Chanukah, I joined hundreds at a wonderfully hopeful candle-lighting ceremony at Jerusalem's First Railway Station complex. Each candle lit by Jews together with Arabs, Christians and Muslims. Men and women. Young people and adults. Music. East meeting West.

During my workout the other day on the Haas Promenade overlooking the Old City from the south, I was delighted to see large groups of tourists. Two, in particular. Christian visitors from Nigeria colourfully decked out. Another from Indonesia. Women covered in hijabs. Men donning traditional head coverings. Muslims. Having their photos taken with an incredible backdrop. Can you believe it? Nearly 30,000 Indonesians – yes 30,000 – visited Israel in each of the past few years, and we don't even have official relations with that most populated of Muslim nations.

And with all the talk of boycotting, divesting and sanctioning Israel, it's refreshing to see it's not really working. At least not yet. On Dec. 11, FIBA, the international basketball federation, announced that Israel will be one of four venues to host the 2017 EuroBasket championships, and earlier this month, Netanya hosted the 2015 European Short Course Swimming Championships, where we won three medals – two silvers and a bronze. Look for swimmers Yakov Toumarkin and Gal Nevo at the Rio Olympics next summer, along with our world class judokas and windsurfers.

Back to winter. For as long as I can remember, Israelis have been following daily reports of rainfall levels, anticipating drier days and ominous water shortages. No more. With Israel's desalination capabilities soon to reach 70 per cent of our domestic consumption needs, dependence on rainwater has greatly declined.

Witnessing these water concerns recede, we can now more easily enjoy the cleansing, transformative effects rain has on our surroundings.

Wouldn't it be wonderful to find a similar elixir to purify us of our even more existential woes? Despite this season's vitality, I'm afraid neither man nor metaphysical will comes up with that potion any time soon. ■

ANALYSIS

The demise of the PA is only a matter of time

Avi Issacharoff
JERUSALEM

Young Palestinian protesters throw stones at Israeli security forces (not seen), during clashes at the Hawara checkpoint, south of the West Bank city of Nablus, on Oct. 11. Nablus has been a flashpoint for violence. FLASH90 PHOTO

Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas tried last week to explain the motives behind the unprecedented phenomenon – referred to by many as the "third intifadah" – that we have been witnessing over the past 2-1/2 months.

To date, more than 130 terrorists have taken part in attacks or attempted attacks against Israeli targets. If you add the number of terrorists who have carried out attacks to those who were arrested pre-emptively by the Palestinian Authority and the Israeli security services, you get to a quick estimate of around 200 to 250 Palestinians who were ready to die in order to kill Jews – in the short period of 75 days.

This works out to a rough average of around three terrorists a day – a figure that is both unimaginable and deeply dangerous. Abbas has claimed that despair about the Israeli occupation and the dashed prospects of a two-state solution brought these youngsters to do what they did; Israel blames incitement.

Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu rushed to attack Abbas last week and quoted surveys carried out in the West Bank that show the Palestinian public's opposition to a two-state solution. He did not note that the PA itself prevents attacks of all kinds against Israelis almost every day.

The problem is that neither Abbas' explanation ("the occupation") nor Netanyahu's ("the incitement") fully sheds light on this sick phenomenon. It may also be that through our western eyes, we can never really understand how hundreds of youngsters are willing to die without a second thought in order to stab Israelis.

Taha Katnani, the father of Ashrakat, a 16-year-old terrorist who last month tried to stab Jewish passersby at the Hawara checkpoint near Nablus (she was run over by Gershon Mesika, who was passing by chance, and then shot dead by security forces), is a known figure in the Islamic Jihad terror group. In recent years, he's been the imam of one of the mosques in the Askar refugee camp on the outskirts of Nablus.

In an interview with a Palestinian TV station identified with Islamic Jihad, he said that his daughter had told him before she died that in the event she was killed ("martyred"), "if the occupiers try to barter with my body, don't agree to it."

He went on to describe a subsequent meeting he had with Israeli security officials at Hawara. "They tried to understand if there had been a crisis, if she had been in a crisis, or I had, or [Aunt] Yassin… In other words, they tried to understand the motive.

"But the occupiers don't understand," the father added, tearfully. "They're deluded. Ashrakat lived in her home, with a high standard of living, doing what she wanted. Whoever knows us – everyone knows the warm relations between my self and my children. Everyone is moved when they see my approach and my relationship with them."

In short, Ashrakat presumably grew up in a home and an environment profoundly hostile to Israel, but did not have family or psychological problems.

Many commentators had warned of a blowup, but none of them predicted the way this "third intifadah" would develop. Certainly not the Israeli political echelon, which continues to exist in its bubble, waiting for the storm to pass – and it is refusing to pass. The withholding of terrorists' bodies, and the threat to destroy their families' homes, are supposed to prevent the next terror attack. But these techniques don't stand up to the reality test.

The flood of attacks isn't letting up for a moment. It's emphatically not always related to family crises, or to what emerges as a psychological problem. It is at least partly an expression of despair and frustration, as Abbas said, but it also relates to the PA and all the Palestinian factions, and even to the older generation in general, which has disappointed the younger generation.

A large majority of the attackers have not belonged to any kind of organization, were not known to the security services, and had not received an order to carry out their attack.

Most of these young people come from the Palestinian cities, some are more religious and some less, most are single. They are not simply fed incitement from the social networks, and certainly not only from the PA's official media networks. They also get their hatred almost intravenously, in the Internet cafes, the mosques, the billiard clubs, from the family – in almost every place.

And for such a phenomenon, it's difficult to find one single convincing explanation – or a solution that will stop the epidemic.

On the Israeli side, there is no credible plan for calming the tensions. During a meeting between senior Israeli and Palestinian security personnel, the Palestinians demanded a "political road map" that they argued would bring about calm on the streets. The Israelis demanded that the PA first stop the violence.

Dramatic political moves may be essential to achieve long-term calm. But what are the Palestinians demanding within the framework of a "road map" ahead? A freeze in settlement building and an agreement in principle to negotiate on the basis of creating a Palestinian state within the 1967 borders. These are unrealistic in light of the current coalition makeup in Israel and the policy of the person at its head. It's an impasse: the PA isn't capable of calming the street without dramatic political steps that Israel has no intention of taking.

What does this say for the PA and Abbas? That in all likelihood, they're living on borrowed time. Or, as a senior figure from the Authority said in his office in Ramallah, "The game is over." Does this mean the dismantling or crumbling of the PA in the near future? It seems so.

Security co-operation is wearing thinner with each passing day – after each Palestinian terror attack and each Israeli security operation in the field (such as the operation Dec. 15 in the village of Qalandiya, during which Israeli forces looking for terrorists killed two Palestinians who, in separate incidents, tried to ram their cars into Israeli soldiers). It's like a countdown whose end is hard to predict but that will clearly stop at some point. Thus the demise of the PA is a question of when, not if.

On the Palestinian side, too, there are also no real plans.

There has been much talk in recent weeks about the PLO committee that is supposed to convene to discuss halting security and economic co-ordination with Israel. Will Abbas gather the PLO leadership by the end of the year and lead it to a dramatic about-face decision on relations with Israel or security co-operation? In the run-up to the next Fatah Day on Jan. 1, commemorating the anniversary of Fatah's first terrorist attack against Israel in 1965, senior figures from the movement will doubtless try to take a step of one kind or another to bring Fatah and the Palestinian agenda back to the global forefront.

Saeb Erekat, general secretary of the PLO, has been scattering threats right and left in recent days, talking repeatedly about cancelling the recognition of Israel and the Oslo accords.

It's not clear whether this will happen. But it has to be said that many of Erekat's unsuccessful recommendations over the past year – e.g., joining the International Criminal Court in The Hague last year, on the anniversary of Fatah's founding – were warmly received by the president. ■

Medics told to treat attackers the same as victims

STUART WINER
JERUSALEM

Medics at terror sites must treat the wounded according to the severity of their injuries, even if that means helping an attacker before his victims, the Israeli Medical Association (IMA) said in rules published last week.

The new rules, formulated by the IMA's Ethics Bureau, replace an earlier directive based on the principle of "charity begins at home," which enabled medical professionals to treat victims first, the Hebrew-language Israel Hayom newspaper reported Dec. 16.

The decision to change the directive was made during a heated meeting last week held at the request of Physicians for Human Rights, which appealed to the bureau, claiming the previous rules contradicted accepted medical ethics and international humanitarian laws.

Senior doctors in the IMA told Israel Hayom that the change in guidelines was not publicly announced for fear of a political backlash amid almost daily Palestinian attacks for the past three months.

While Israeli doctors and medical staff see it as an ethical duty to attend to the injuries of terrorists and treat them the same as victims, until the recent change they could give priority when doing triage to victims rather than perpetrators.

Tammy Karni, who heads the ethics panel, said the previous rules required doctors to verify who was an attacker and who was a victim, a sometimes impossible task.

"Doctors are not judges. The implication of leaving the [previous] directive was that the doctor needs to investigate who was responsible and punish him by not giving him treatment," she told Israel Hayom.

According to the report, the Ethics Bureau is the only body that decides ethical standards for Israeli medical staff and its rulings apply to doctors, paramedics, emergency services and nurses.

There have been a number of cases of innocent people being attacked amid the chaos in the aftermath of a terror attack. In October, an Eritrean national was mistakenly shot, beaten and only later attended to after a terror attack in Be'er Sheva. Doctors said the delay may have contributed to his death.

Palestinians have alleged that Israeli medics often ignore wounded assailants after attacks, which sometimes leads to their deaths.

The "charity begins at home" rule was laid down in 2008 by a group of doctors in the Ethics Bureau, including Pini Halperin, director of Emergency Medicine at Ichilov Hopsital in Tel Aviv, who lamented the change in orders.

"If there is, for example, a decision of life or death for the casualties, it is appropriate to first treat 'what matters to me,' that is to say the victims of terror, Jews and Arabs alike – and only after the enemy who is carrying out a terror attack," he told Israel Hayom.

Halperin added that the Ethics Bureau should instead have clarified the terms of the "charity begins at home" rule according to the rules for dealing with enemy forces rather than cancelling it altogether.

Leader of the Yisrael Beytenu party MK Avigdor Liberman slammed what he called a "disgraceful decision."

"This is a non-humanitarian decision, that testifies that those who made it simply don't live in reality," he wrote on his Facebook page. "Doctors must rise up against this decision and change it."

More than 20 Israelis have been killed in three months of near-daily stabbing, shooting, and car-ramming terror attacks by Palestinians targeting civilians and security forces.

More than 100 Palestinians have also been killed, a large proportion of them assailants shot as they carried out attacks, including some who were teenagers.

Other Palestinians have been killed during violent clashes with Israeli security forces. ■

Secret talks aimed at improved Turkish-Israeli relations

RAPHAEL AHREN
JERUSALEM

Turkish-Israeli relations may be on the verge of a dramatic improvement after years of disconnect, following a secret meeting Dec. 16 in Switzerland between senior Turkish and Israeli officials.

Among those attending the talks in Zurich, an official at the Prime Minister's Office said, were National Security Council chief Yossi Cohen (the incoming head of the Mossad spy agency), former foreign ministry director Joseph Ciechanover (who serves as Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's point man on Israeli-Turkish relations), and Feridun Sinirlioglu, the current director-general of the Turkish Foreign Ministry.

Understandings reached at the talks are intended to serve as the basis for an agreement on warmer ties, which was expected to be signed by the end of the year.

The agreement was reached days after Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan indicated that he would like to see bilateral ties revived.

Relations between Jerusalem and Ankara broke down after the Israeli Navy intercepted a flotilla led by the Mavi Marmara, which was seeking to breach Israel's security blockage on Hamas-run Gaza, in May 2010. The Israeli raid ended with nine dead Turkish activists and dozens wounded, after the naval commandos were attacked with clubs and poles as they boarded the vessel.

Tension between the countries, already high, escalated further, and Erdogan, then the prime minister, recalled his ambassador. Israel recalled its own ambassador in retaliation and Turkey also began legal proceedings against senior IDF officials, including then-IDF chief of staff Gabi Ashkenazi and then-Navy commander Eliezer Marom.

In 2013, U.S. President Barack Obama brokered an Israeli apology to Ankara, but hopes for a return to full normalization were not realized.

According to the PMO official, the agreement is to provide for both countries returning their ambassadors; a cancellation of pending lawsuits against IDF soldiers; the establishment by Israel of a fund for the welfare of victims of the 2010 Mavi Marmara incident; a Turkish commitment not to tolerate any "terrorist activities" on its sovereign territory; Turkey barring from its soil Salah Arouri, a Hamas operative who allegedly orchestrated the kidnapping and killing of three Israeli teens in the West Bank in June 2014; Turkey allowing Israel to lay down a gas pipeline on its soil; and the opening of immediate negotiations on the sale of natural gas from Israel to Turkey.

Foreign Ministry director-general Dore Gold already held secret meetings with his counterpart Sinirlioglu and other senior Turkish officials in June, in what many observers saw as a first sign of a pending thaw in bilateral ties. ■

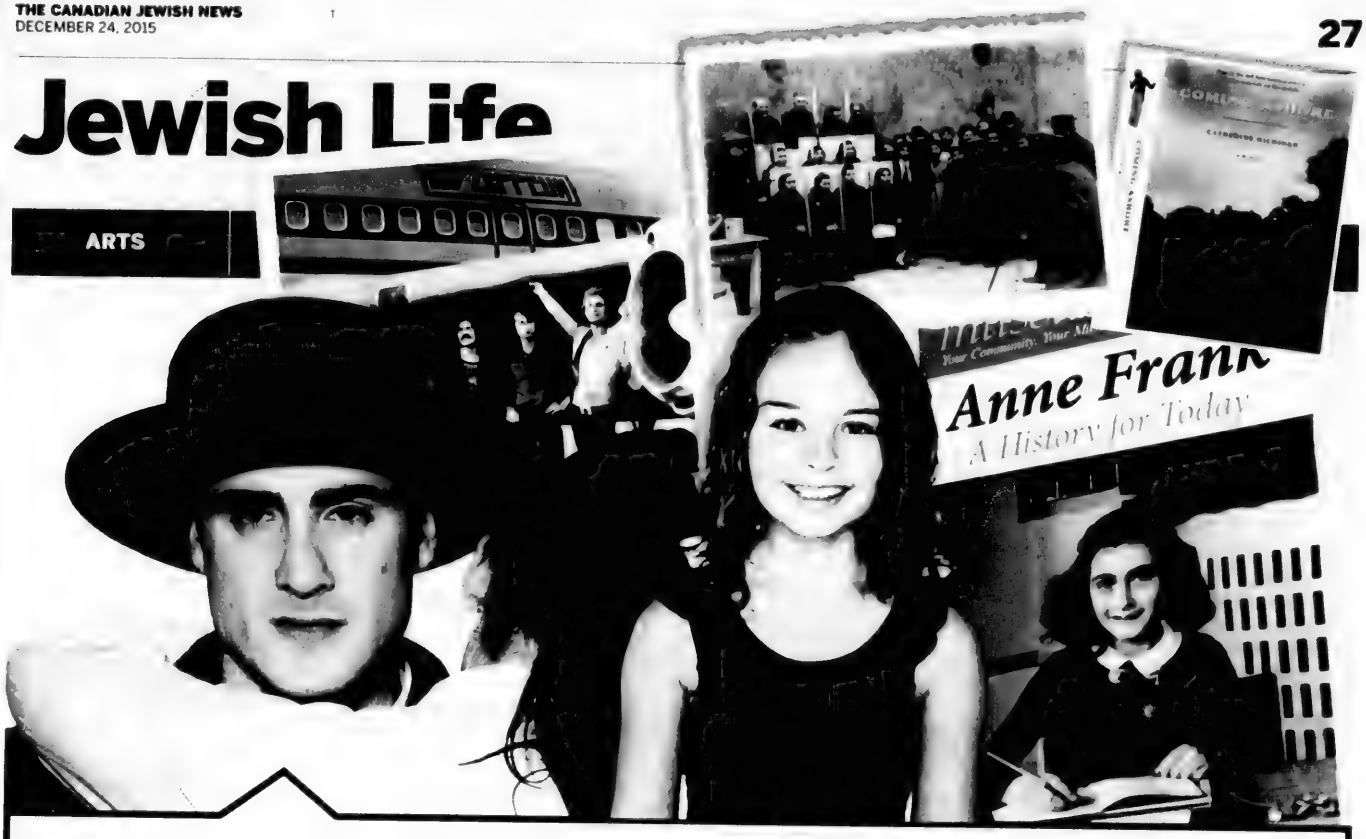
ARTS



Looking back at the year that was

JOSEPH SERGE
jserge@thecjn.ca

The Jewish Life section of the paper is a moniker we came up with to compartmentalize what in the publishing industry is often referred to as the "back of the book." In The CJN, this section is made up primarily of arts stories, but also contains book reviews, food stories, sports on occasion and the Social Scene and Backstory columns. Here are some of the highlights of 2015:

Arts:

On Jan. 26, Art Spiegelman, the storied cartoonist and creator of Maus, gave a lecture in Toronto discussing comics, free speech, his Jewish sensibilities and, in the wake of the Charlie Hebdo massacres, how perilous a craft cartooning can be. Ron Csillag covered the event for the Feb. 5 issue.

The images captured by the little Leica camera that Henryk Ross carried around the Lodz Ghetto from 1940 to 1944 may be black and white, but the stories they tell are vivid, beyond the iconic views of the Holocaust. So wrote Toby Saltzman in her Feb. 12 story about Memory Unearthed: The Lodz Ghetto Photographs of Henryk Ross, an exhibit that ran at the Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO).

It was fun to read Susan Minuk's Feb. 19 piece about Abby and Sarah Ginsburg. The pair of Toronto twins had flown to Los Angeles to perform Jason Mraz's song I'm Yours for Ellen DeGeneres on The Ellen Show.

Who can resist the allure of nine-year-old Skyler Wexler? The young actor is becoming a big player in sci-fi and horror flicks. She had a role as the young Carrie, in the recent remake of the Stephen King book, but most viewers might recognize her from her recurring role in the TV thriller Orphan Black, where she plays Kira, the daughter of one of the clones. Minuk sat down with her for our March 26 edition.

We'd written about actor Jake Epstein before, but I was fascinated to learn he was collaborating with his mother, Kathy Kacer, writer of such popular young reader Holocaust novels as Gabi's Dresser. Kathryn Kates wrote about how the two worked on a play, Therefore Choose Life, which premiered in Toronto on April 18.

We cover art stories of all forms, of course, but some seem especially unique. Jodie Shupac's May 14 piece on Ballad of the Burning Star, a one-man cabaret-style drag show that ran at The Theatre Centre in May was quite illuminating.

With the Stratford Festival running a production of The Diary of Anne Frank, the co-ordinator of Canadian Projects for Anne Frank House Amsterdam thought this would be a good time to host the exhibit Anne Frank: A History for Today. In her June 18 preview, Saltzman wrote about how Julie Couture was smitten by the farmhouse that became the Stratford Perth Museum, as the place to host this exhibit.

We don't get to cover classic rock much in these pages, and I was delighted last June to assign Ruth Schweitzer a July 2 story on Bob Gruen, the photographer who took iconic pictures of John Lennon, Led Zeppelin and Alice Cooper, among others.

It took Winnipeg filmmakers Daniel Eskin and Trevor Mowchun more than 10 years to finish their first feature, World to Come. Based on events surrounding an abuse allegation scandal that rocked Winnipeg's Jewish community in the late 1980s and 1990s, the film premiered at the AGO on July 11. Jordan Adler wrote about it in our July 9 edition.

Like it or not, we've all had our ears filled with Let It Go, the hit song from the film Frozen. Thus it was a highlight for us on Aug. 20 to run Marvin Glassman's interview with the ubiquitous song's singer Idina Menzel prior to her Canadian concerts.

To commemorate Frank Sinatra's birthday, Schweitzer wrote a thoughtful piece in our Dec. 10 edition about Ruth Lowe, the Toronto songwriter who launched the American popular singer's career.

The best stories of the year

Although The CJN misses Bill Gladstone's Eye on Arts column (the last of which ran in August) it was good to welcome several new columnists into the back pages. Chaimie and Leizer of YidLife Crisis' Dec. 3 spoof on the greatest Chanukah film never told was a fun read. Evelyn Tauben hit the nail on the head with her insightful Oct. 29 piece on how, over the course of history, forms, colours and symbols have gathered a potent meaning, and consequently we need to absorb imagery with a sensitive eye.

Food:

In the Feb. 5 paper, Shupac met with celebrity chef Susur Lee and Modern Kosher Catering owner Moishe Brown. The two discussed their creation of an exclusive line of kosher, Susur Lee-branded food, to be added to Modern Kosher's existing list of menu options.

Books:

In the Jan. 8 CJN, I was thrilled to review the last part of Catherine Gildiner's memoir trilogy, Coming Ashore. I'd been following the series for several years. In this one, the Toronto psychiatrist discusses her hippy days, describing encounters with a young Bill Clinton and Jimi Hendrix, and her time at Toronto's notorious Rochdale College.

Other book reviews we ran, which I didn't write but enjoyed reading, were Mordechai Ben-Dat's analysis of David Liss' The Day of Atonement (Feb. 5), and his review of Charles Belfoure's The Paris Architect (June 11); Gladstone's look at Yuval Noah Harari's Sapiens: A Brief History of Humankind (Feb. 26) and Catch the Jew by Tuvia Tenenbom (Aug. 13); Norm Ravvin's take on All the Light We Cannot See by Anthony Doerr (May 14); and Martin Lockshin's look at The Jewish Dog by Asher Kravitz (July 30).

Sports:

With the PanAm Games held in Toronto this summer, we profiled most of the Jewish athletes involved. Of particular interest to me were the pair of rhythmic gymnastics twins Anjelika and Victoria Reznik. Alan Hudes profiled them in our July 9 edition, before the twins went on to win medals.

Backstory:

I enjoy reading Backstory for its unique look at sometimes obscure events in Jewish history. Gladstone's April 23 piece about Rev. Shabetai Benjamin Rohold, the son of the chief rabbi of Jerusalem, who became a missionary Jew in Toronto in the pre-World War I era, was very informative.

On Feb. 26, Elran Harris wrote an interesting column about Emerson Swift Mahon, Canada's first black Jew. After coming to Canada in 1912 and converting to Judaism, he seriously considered becoming a rabbi at one point.

Social Scene:

I love reading David Levine's Wry Bread column each month, but some hit the spot for me more than others. I particularly liked his April 30 piece on GCGs Genuinely Curious Gentiles. "Can you spot the GCCs in your life? Use the real-life examples below to practise." The July 30 piece on Donald Trump was also hilarious – and still topical. And who can forget his Aug. 27 take on paying shul dues? ■

The Enlightenment as seen through a woman's writings

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Haskalah (Enlightenment) of the mid-19th century was like a deluge washing across the Jews of Europe, sundering centuries of strict traditionalism, social seclusion and intellectual constraints.

Some Jews, swept up by the new, heady sense of openness and putative freedoms, severed the roots of their past and soon washed away from their people. Some planted their traditions even deeper into the soil of the ancient ways, seeking security in calcifying clay that they believed protected them from change.

Most Jews however, tried to absorb the torrent's strong, creative force to attach and adapt modern ways onto their traditions and sense of peoplehood. They did not always succeed in creating a sheltering structure: some found sanctuary in the new hybrid way of life, while others became estranged.

It was in the world of culture, letters and the arts that the Jews' struggles to find their way and their compromise with modernity was most evident. And it was in the myriad journalistic publications among the Jews of Europe at this time – newspapers, pamphlets and magazines – that their struggles found voice.

In a masterful essay titled The Silenced Voice of a People, published in the landmark work The Jewish Press that Was (1975), the late Israeli editor and journalist Yehuda Gotthelf noted that the world of Jewish media in Europe came alive during the Haskalah. It was a time when all of European culture, it seemed, underwent an intensive intellectual ferment.

In Gotthelf's words: "Despite stress and poverty, there sprang up in those days hundreds of associations, clubs, libraries and political parties, and on top of them all – a Jewish press. The world between the two world wars was beset by a feverish ideological and public awakening: hopes kindled by the Balfour Declaration, disappointments generated by the violent, political upheavals in Russia, and the many isms that attracted Jews of all kinds – Bundism, Socialism and Zionism."

Toward the end of the 19th century, but especially between the two world wars, Jewish life experienced a cultural outpouring of energy, daring and self-assertion. The Jewish newspaper was, in many respects, the key manifestation of that effusion.

Jewish newspapers were printed throughout Europe in the local languages, in Hebrew – the language that was just then being revived – and in the language most spoken among the Jews of continental Europe: Yiddish.

Records at the academic institution YIVO, the Yidisher Visnshaftlekher Institut, established in 1925 and now headquartered in New York, show that before World War II, there were some 230 Yiddish-language periodicals in Poland alone. Twenty-seven were dailies, 100 weeklies, 24 bi-weeklies and 58 monthlies.

A Jewish periodical could be found in almost every town in Poland where Jews lived. At one point, there were five daily Jewish newspapers in Warsaw alone. Jewish journalists in Europe even had their own professional association. Its premises at 13 Tlomackie St. in Warsaw were known throughout the Jewish and non-Jewish world of journalism as an exciting centre of discussion and debate.

The Jewish press was vibrant all through Europe – in the then-Soviet Union, the Baltic countries, Lithuania, Germany, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, France, the Netherlands, Belgium, Italy, Romania, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Salonika and Scandinavia. More than 800 Jewish newspapers existed in Europe before the outbreak of World War II.

Professors Carole Balin and Wendy Zierler, both at Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in New York College, combine their expertise in Jewish history and in Jewish literature and feminist studies respectively, to provide a new, unique, powerful insight into the vanished Jewish life and Jewish press of Europe.

To Tread on New Ground: Selected Hebrew Writings of Hava Shapiro, edited by Carole B. Balin and Wendy Zierler (Wayne State University Press, 2014)*

The lens through which they shine that view is the mostly unknown life of Hava Shapiro, a maskilah (student of the Enlightenment), Zionist activist, journalist, literary critic, short story writer and diarist who wrote entirely in Hebrew.

Like many of her contemporaries who were at that time pioneering their lives in Mandatory Palestine, Shapiro was a bold and innovative pioneer planting seeds in the newly flowering soil of Hebrew literature in Europe.

Balin and Zierler are effusive in their assessment of Shapiro's significance for the modern reader. "That a woman was regularly writing good, readable Hebrew prose in the Diaspora in the early 20th century is notable in and of itself. Equally significant, however, is the historical content of Shapiro's writing. As one would expect of an Eastern European whose life spanned 1878 to 1943, Shapiro bumped up against cataclysmic world events and thus chronicled publicly in the press, and privately in her diary and letters, the Russian Revolution and both world wars as well as critical episodes in the Jews' past, including pogroms, mass migration, ruptures in traditional Jewish life and the development of Zionism."

One of the many strengths of the book is its organization. Balin and Zierler have compartmentalized Shapiro's writings into four categories: Fiction; The Diary 1900-1941; Letters; Reportage, Literary Criticism and Essays. They add a fifth section comprised of essays about Shapiro. At the beginning of each of the different sections, Balin and Zierler provide extensive commentary about the material they have gathered. These introductory mini-essays by the editors are impressively substantive and informative. But the diadem in the crown of this work is the eclectically diverse, compelling, poignant, moving writing of Hava Shapiro.

The light of notoriety and celebrity shone very little upon Shapiro during her life. Even during the Enlightenment, male writers cast too long a shadow for equally skilled and talented women writers such as Shapiro to be noticed.

Shapiro often wrote under the pseudonym Eim Kol Hai (Mother of All Living), a play upon her name Hava, which is the biblical name of the first woman, Eve.

Balin and Zierler provide a moving explanation for this: "Shapiro regarded her perspective – namely a woman's perspective – as critical to the birthing process of modern Hebrew literature… In the case of the modern Eim Kol Hai, it is she, Shapiro, who casts herself as a partner to the male progenitors of modern Hebrew literature and urges them in the strongest terms possible to consider and embrace her viewpoint."

The Holocaust took Shapiro's life. Thanks to Balin and Zierler, today, more than 70 years later, we can still hear her voice. ■

A dark imagining of concentration camp life

DANIEL HOROWITZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Few Holocaust films successfully reconcile their duty – and inability – to realize the atrocities of the concentration camps. Even fewer manage to capture the darkest imaginings of our macabre curiosities. Son of Saul is the closest I've seen to accomplish this, perhaps closer than I'm comfortable, or qualified, admitting.

It is October 1944, and Auschwitz-Birkenau is at the height of its operating efficiency. The titular Saul, played by Géza Rohrig, is a member of the sonderkommando, work details of Jewish prisoners.

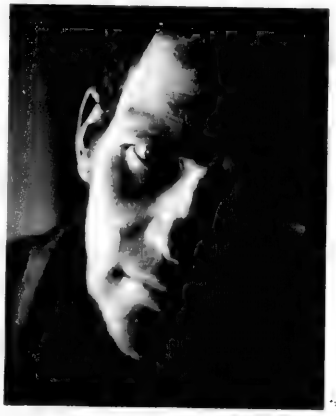
The film's opening scene is a brutal introduction to their daily life. After Saul escorts unsuspecting transports of Jews and other "undesirables" to their deaths in the gas chamber, their screams and battering against the door reaches an unbearable climax of sound. Even though it's off-screen, the panic is palpable. It's an unforgettable first impression, which is not only true of the scene, but Hungarian director Laszlo Nemes, making his feature debut.

After "processing" the transport, the sonderkommando rifle through the victims' clothing for valuables and shovel their cremated ashes. For all intents and purposes, this is the seventh circle of hell.

While clearing the gas chamber of bodies, or "pieces," as the Nazis call them, Saul finds a corpse he claims to be his son. The rest of the film follows Saul, quite literally and closely, as he attempts to give his presumed son a dignified burial in the least dignified place on Earth.

Son of Saul is a difficult watch, and not for the reason you think. Subject matter aside, Saul is a frustrating protagonist. Single-minded in the pursuit of his son's body and a rabbi to say the mourner's Kaddish, Saul often acts against his own self-interest and that of his fellow prisoners, much to their annoyance – and the viewer's.

At roll call, another prisoner accuses Saul of having "failed the living for the dead." The line is not only a startling reminder of how aggressive prisoners could be to one another, but a telling characterization of Saul, who, perhaps, sees no distinction. This might explain Saul's risky behaviour and apparent flagrant disregard for his life.



Géza Rohrig as the titular character Saul.

Indicting Saul as "frustrating" might sound like heresy. To be fair, viewers of Holocaust cinema have become so accustomed to seeing Jews cast as victims, we easily forget that some prisoners were active managers of their own fate, however futile their attempts. Saul's struggle unfolds against the planning and execution of the Auschwitz prisoner uprising.

Saul's subjectivity is another source of frustration. The title is a misnomer, as Nemes never firmly establishes the titular child is Saul's. Again, we rely solely on the word of Saul himself, who believes his son was born out of wedlock.

With a constant focus on Saul's face and hypnotizing tracking shots, it's not clear when a scene begins and another ends.

> Saul is a frustrating protagonist.

The entire film is a blur. It's a matter of moments and minutes between the solitude of the sonderkommando's cavernous dwellings and the woodland inferno where Jews are stripped naked and shot point blank into an amorphous pit.

While many consider Schindler's List to represent the essence of Holocaust cinema, Son of Saul, which won the Grand Prix at Cannes, sets a new standard for its visceral tour of camp life, that is, death. Spielberg throws in everything and the kitchen sink. Nemes, however, makes a startlingly bold choice to relegate the Holocaust's indelible imagery to the blurry background, following the weary face of Saul in shallow focus. While the close-up has long been associated with intimacy and familiarity, its use has never been so tense and austere. It's no coincidence that Auslander, Saul's surname, is German for "alien."

The Holocaust needs documentary, although I have never doubted a fictional film's potential to elicit a strong emotional effect. Even if its premise is contrived, Son of Saul is excruciatingly real.

Son of Saul opens in Toronto on Dec. 25 and in Vancouver and Montreal on Jan. 15. ■

Cook a pot of winter comfort food

EILEEN GOLTZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

I like to cook stews and soups in the winter months so meals are easy and hearty.

Burgundy beef stew-ish (aka beef bourguignonne)

- ❑ 1 leek
- ❑ 4 stalks parsley
- ❑ 3 sprigs thyme
- ❑ 1 bay leaf
- ❑ 3 lb. beef stew meat (you can cut up a roast in big-ish bite sized pieces
- ❑ 1 large onion diced fine
- ❑ 3 carrots, chopped
- ❑ 2 cloves garlic, chopped fine
- ❑ 1 bottle good red burgundy
- ❑ 6 oz. pastrami, diced
- ❑ salt and freshly ground black pepper
- ❑ 1/3 cup flour
- ❑ 2 cups water
- ❑ 1 lb. small white mushrooms, stems trimmed and caps peeled

Put leek, parsley, thyme, bay leaf, beef, onions, carrots, garlic, in a large bowl and add wine. Mix to combine making sure everything is coated then cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate for 12 to 24 hours.

Remove the beef from marinade (save the marinade), and pat the beef dry with paper towels. Fry the pastrami in a large pot until crisp, about 5 minutes. Season the beef with salt and pepper. Add the pieces to the pot and sear on all sides (5 to 7 minutes). Sprinkle the flour over the beef and cook, stirring constantly, for 2 to 3 minutes. Add the marinade and water. Mix to combine and bring to a boil over high heat, scraping up the bits from the bottom of the pan. At this point you can pour the whole mixture into a crock pot, put on low cover and cook for 4 to 6 hours or reduce the mixture to a simmer in the pan, cover, and cook 3 to 4 hours. Add mushrooms and cook for 30 minutes more. Before serving remove the bay leaf, leek, parsley and thyme. Serves 4 to 6.

Beef and beer stew

- ❑ 2 1/2 lb. beef, cut into cubes
- ❑ kosher salt and freshly ground black pepper, to taste
- ❑ ¼ cup flour
- ❑ 4 tbsp. olive oil
- ❑ 4 slices beef fry chopped
- ❑ 2 tbsp. chopped garlic
- ❑ 3 large onions, thinly sliced
- ❑ 2 cups dark ale or beer
- ❑ 1 cup beef or vegetable broth
- ❑ 2 tbsp. brown sugar
- ❑ 2 tbsp. apple cider vinegar
- ❑ 3 sprigs thyme
- ❑ 3 sprigs parsley
- ❑ 2 sprigs tarragon
- ❑ 1 bay leaf
- ❑ 3 potatoes, cut into quarters

In a bowl combine the beef with the flour and season with salt and pepper. Mix to coat. Heat 2 tbsp. oil in a fry pan and working in batches, sear the outside of the beef pieces. When seared, place them aside on a platter and then cook the beef fry until crispy. Add the remaining oil, garlic, and the onions; cook until golden, about 25 to 30 minutes. Add 1 cup of beer; cook, scraping bottom of pot. Cook for about 5 minutes then add the beef, 1 cup beer, broth, brown sugar, vinegar, thyme, parsley, tarragon, bay leaf, and salt and pepper. Bring the mixture to a boil. Reduce heat to simmer, add the potatoes and cook, covered, until beef is tender approx. 1 ½ to 2 hours.

Root vegetable stew aka Tzimmis

- ❑ 3 to 4 tbsp. olive oil
- ❑ 3 lb. beef stew meat, cut into cubes
- ❑ salt and pepper, to taste
- ❑ 1 1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. nutmeg
- ❑ 2 large sweet onions, chopped
- ❑ 4 cups beef broth
- ❑ 4 large sweet potatoes, peeled and cut into cubes
- ❑ 4 oz. pitted prunes, halved
- ❑ 4 oz. dried apricots
- ❑ 2 carrots, peeled and cut into pieces
- ❑ 1 tbsp. honey

In batches, in a skillet heat the oil and sear the beef. Place the cooked meat in a crock pot. Season with salt and pepper. Add the cinnamon, nutmeg, and onions stirring to combine. Add the broth, potatoes, prunes, apricots and carrots. Mix to combine. Cover and cook on low for 6 hours or high for 4, uncovered, until tender, about 1 hour. Just before serving stir in the honey. Serves 6

Chicken stew

- ❑ 1 cup sliced celery
- ❑ 3/4 cup diced carrot
- ❑ 1/2 cup chopped onion
- ❑ 2 tsp. minced garlic
- ❑ 2 tbsp. olive oil
- ❑ 4 cups chicken broth
- ❑ 3 cups bottled marinara sauce
- ❑ 1 cup canned garbanzo beans, rinsed and drained
- ❑ 3/4 cup uncooked macaroni noodles (you can use your own favourite)
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. black pepper
- ❑ 1 lb. skinless, boneless chicken thighs, cut into 1/2-in. pieces

In an oven proof Dutch oven sauté the celery, carrot, and onion in the oil. Stirring constantly so it doesn't burn, cook until the vegetables are tender. Add the garlic, cook for 1 minute then add the broth, marinara, garbanzo beans, noodles and pepper. Bring the mixture to a boil and cook for 3 minutes. Reduce to a simmer and add the chicken. Mix to combine and cook 4 to 5 minutes until the chicken is cooked. Serves 4 to 6 depending on the size of the serving. ■

ASK ELLA

It's not easy being a Jew at Christmas or quitting smoking

Ella Burakowski
eb@thecjn.ca

Dear Ella,

I'm bombarded with Christmas. Walking through a mall with all the Christmas decorations, walking the dog past the houses with Christmas lights, surfing the radio for a normal song or the TV for a movie without a Christmas theme, and even buying a cup of coffee in a generic cup, I am in Christmas sensory overload!

People are also in great moods. So why am I so sad? As a Jew, I can't help feeling left out. I want to join in, too, but feel like my parents are admonishing me from their graves. I like the spirit of the holiday, not the religious aspect. It is a warm holiday at a very cold time of year. The point is, I feel guilty even thinking this way. I can't be the only one feeling excluded, can I?

Dear Feeling Left Out

Living in Canada, you will always experience this all-encompassing holiday season. It's the most lucrative time of year for businesses, so it's very aggressively marketed.

The results are exactly as you describe. Everywhere you turn, Christmas is in its full glory. So what are you supposed to do? Nothing. Stop feeling guilty. There is nothing wrong with enjoying a beautifully decorated house. It's pretty. The shows on TV are usually good and heartfelt, often with a family theme or a message. As for the tunes, they're often toe-tappingly catchy. Unless you hibernate in your home without outside stimulus, you cannot avoid this season. Enjoying pretty lights doesn't make you a bad Jew.

Jews everywhere experience the same feelings. Even Kyle from South Park has a song called A Jew at Christmas. Chanukah usually falls around the same time of year, and we have the same feelings of gift giving and family spirit through our very own holiday. Lighting candles, family get-togethers, community programs, parties, latkes and gifts will satisfy this warm spirit you are missing. Don't fight your way through this season. Live through it, enjoy the spirit of the season, and stop feeling guilty.

Dear Ella,

I'm a hard-core smoker and have been for 35 years. I've tried to quit many times, but I barely make it through one day.

Logically I know the horrifying data. Our government has made it extremely inconvenient and expensive for me to smoke, and my kids are angry with me for being so selfish. The icing on the cake? My dear friend Barb just passed away. She had lung cancer and was a smoker, like me. I was physically sick and an emotional wreck dealing with the guilt of "I may be next." So how do I handle this? I have a cigarette! If this wasn't the kick in the pants I needed, how am I ever going to get out of this?

Addicted

Dear Addicted

Smoking is a complex habit. It is so much more than a physical addiction. There is a strong emotional component. It is therapy for some, as well as an association with daily routines and a nicotine dependence. A smoking addiction has tentacles that hold on tight to your body and your mind.

Sure, there may be all kinds of help out there, and your friends and family will jump for joy and support you, but the buck stops with you. You are the one who has to walk the walk and not have a cigarette after a meal, or after a phone call, or with a coffee. You need to get through this tough part and be prepared to put in the work – and make no mistake, it is work.

On the bright side, there is help and support available. Most smokers desperately want to be rid of this dangerous habit and the hold it has on them.

This is your decision alone. Once you make it, you don't have to go it alone. Tell people. It will make it more real and force you to be accountable. Get help from your doctor, and seek out reading material, online support groups and patches. Whatever it takes, you will never regret your decision. ■

Ella's advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

SeeJN | Kotel bar mitzvah

Thanks to an initiative by Toronto Jewish community leader Max Benaim, 70 underprivileged children from the Israeli cities of Jerusalem, Haifa, Or Yehuda, Ashkelon and Kiryat Arbah celebrated their bar and bat mitzvahs at the Kotel this past fall. The funds were raised through the Estrella Benaim, Z'L' Foundation, and joined by a delegation of 50 Canadians, each child was symbolically twinned with a fallen hero from the Gaza War in 2014. The children and their parents arrived at the Kotel to collect their personalized tfillin, tallitot, and siddurim, and were treated to a reception at a banquet hall in Jerusalem.

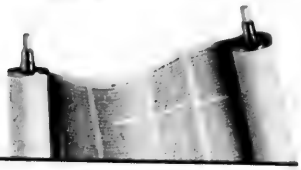
Parshah

Vayechi | Genesis 47:28-50:26



Rabbi Ilan Acoca says unity means respecting other opinions, even if we might disagree with them
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl explains the importance of Viddui, the deathbed affirmation of faith
Rabbi Catharine Clark suggests that we heal our relationships right now, while we still have time

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

This week's parshah describes the end of Jacob's life. The verse says: "Jacob lived in the land of Egypt 17 years." (Bereshit 47:28) The Talmud (Taanit 5b) teaches in the name of Rabbi Yochanan that Jacob did not die, because as long as his seed is alive, he is considered to be alive.

In order to understand this teaching, let me quote another piece of Talmud. Berachot 18a says that the righteous people are considered alive even when they are dead.

What this means is that as long as we continue propagating the teachings of the righteous people, they are considered to be alive. As long as Jacob's descendants walk in the footsteps of their ancestor, his spirit continues to live.

Much has been written about the importance of Jewish education, but for me, such teaching is a boost for continuing with my foremost priority, which is proliferating Sephardi education.

In a recent exchange with one of my Ashkenazi colleagues, he dismissed a certain Sephardi custom that I posted. I wrote him an email with all the sources, and he finally accepted the fact that Sephardim have a different custom.

This incident triggered mixed feelings. On the one hand, I was happy to educate, but on the other, I was sad about how quick we are to dismiss information without further questioning it before doing so.

People often ask me why am I so passionate about teaching others about Sephardi Judaism. The answer I give is that I owe this to my ancestors. If my Sephardi colleagues and I don't do this, we will be dismissing the Sephardi chachamim, sages, of every generation.

As Jews, we have to promote unity. Unity does not mean conforming to the majority but rather respecting each other's opinion even though it is not the same as ours.

May HaShem give us the wisdom, understanding and knowledge to respect each other's differences. Amen! ■

Rabbi Ilan Acoca is rabbi at Congregation Beth Hamidrash in Vancouver.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

Although the Torah portion Vayechi begins by mentioning the life of our forefather Jacob, it actually details the loving loyalty (chesed ve'emet) of family at the time of death. We witness, through the lens of Torah and time, the passing from this world of Jacob and Joseph (and in the prophetic Haftorah reading, the last hours of King David).

The Talmud teaches that, "If one falls sick and life is endangered, the person is instructed to offer confession, for all who are sentenced to death make confession." The tradition of a deathbed affirmation of faith, Viddui, may have developed as a personal ritual paralleling the martyrdom of Rabbi Akiva, who went to his death proclaiming the singularity of the One God. Elements of the final Viddui are incorporated into the concluding moments of Neilah on Yom Kippur.

Phillipe Aries, in his magisterial study, The Hour of Our Death, explored changing attitudes toward death in western culture. In the Middle Ages, the focus on "dying well" grew in importance as a way to gain some control over, and come to terms with, personal mortality. During Renaissance times, the acknowledgment of personal failings (sin) and profession of faith became a public ritual. In the modern world, the medical-biological emphasis on preserving life dominates over the psychological, spiritual and metaphysical preparation for death.

Increased interest in hospice care may restore some attention to how the dying face death. Being Mortal, the recent book by Atul Gawande, suggests that five questions should guide this process: What is your understanding of where you are and of your illness? What are your fears or worries for the future? What are your goals and priorities at this point in your life? What outcomes are unacceptable to you? What are you willing to sacrifice and not? And later: what would a good day look like?

Certainly, the loving loyalty (chesed ve'emet) of family and friends remains as important now as it did in the Torah portion. ■

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl is senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

Rabbi Catharine Clark

In this week's parshah, Joseph is told, "Behold! Your father is ill." "Behold" is an odd touch, considering that Jacob is more than 100 years old. It can hardly be surprising that he is not in perfect health.

A midrash explains that his illness is indeed news. Jacob is the first person to be sick. Before him, people simply aged and then died suddenly. They would look older, but not feel or function any differently than they had in the prime of life. Jacob institutes a new situation, praying that God will grant him disease.

Such a prayer seems incomprehensible to many of us who struggle daily with health problems. What we would not give to live with the physical well-being of a 25-year-old until our very last breath in old age! Why would Jacob seek such a curse as illness?

The midrash answers this question, too.

Jacob understands that he has affairs to set in order before his death. He was a spectacular failure as a father, playing favourites and sending his sons on literal guilt trips to Egypt during the famine in his homeland. Jacob most certainly does need to repair some relationships before his death. In fact, much of Parshat Vayechi is Jacob's attempt to accomplish this task. He gathers his sons together and blesses each of them in turn.

It is sad, though, that Jacob needed illness to put him on his deathbed before he would try to correct his many parenting mistakes. His example is a cautionary tale for us, teaching us that we should heal our relationships now, without waiting for health problems to become so bad that we know there is no time left for delay. ■

Mayim Bialik: Supporting Israel and speaking Yiddish

DANIEL KOREN
ONLINE EDITOR

On Dec. 12, Mayim Bialik turned 40. A prolific writer, actor, neuroscientist, attachment parenting advocate and proud proponent of modern Orthodoxy, Bialik – like her great-grandfather's first cousin, Israeli national poet Chaim Nachman Bialik – she has accomplished a fair bit in a short time.

Most of you know her as Dr. Amy Farrah Fowler, her character on TV's popular The Big Bang Theory, or as the title character on the '90s sitcom Blossom.

But Bialik is also known for her lengthy statements on Judaism's role in contemporary society, her musings on attachment parenting and homeschooling, and her unwavering support for Israel.

As a contributor to the website Kveller, Bialik has shared her thoughts on poignant events such as the loss of her father, the Jewish connection to her vegan lifestyle, what Jewish women need to know about breast cancer, and the Hebrew prayer that brought her and her son closer together.

As the founder of GrokNation, she's been able to take her influence a step further, commenting on the recent statement by the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) against female rabbis, the Syrian refugee crisis, last month's Paris attacks, and other issues.

The CJN asked Bialik, who was recently in Montreal to film an episode of YidLife Crisis with Jamie Elman and Eli Batalion, about her thoughts on the RCA ruling, her grasp of the Yiddish language, and if an anti-Israel bias does indeed exist in the media.

So you recently tweeted to radio host Howard Stern to discuss your shared "unfashionable" views on Israel. Has he responded?
No, not that I've seen. I'm not constantly on Twitter. I actually haven't been on Twitter in a while. That came up on my news feed, and I figured why not. I was possibly taking a trip to New York, so I know that my publicist suggested to reach out to his people so it wasn't totally out of the blue.

Why do you use the word "unfashionable"? Do you think there is an anti-Israel bias in the media?
Obviously Howard was speaking about [calling out Pink Floyd frontman Roger Waters for urging rocker Bon Jovi not to perform in Israel]. When I was on Howard's show, we talked about it a bit. I mean, I've been very public about my support for a peace process and my support for people not calling for the destruction of the Jewish People, simply because I believe that Israel should exist, so I've seen a lot of that on my social media for sure.

And Roger Waters? Would you call him an anti-Semite?
I am not going to speak more about Roger Waters. I don't want to name-call. What's going on with Roger Waters and Howard Stern is what's playing out on the campus I went to university at in the '90s, UCLA, and it's playing itself out on every major campus pretty much all over the world.

How can we educate people like that on campus?
[Laughs] Israel needs a better publicist. I don't know.

You recently wrote a piece on GrokNation about your reaction to the RCA's ruling on female rabbis. Do you think there will ever be a time where female rabbis will be accepted within the Orthodox community?
Absolutely.

What can we do to get there?
I think we're doing it. There's a lot to be said for slow change, and Judaism is big on slow change. There have been a lot of things, literally, for the past at least 2,000, or 3,000 years of Jewish history, that were 'This is never going to happen' and then did. This is not a halachic challenge, it's a minhagim one. This is more about custom, history and culture than it is about legality, and for all of the people who don't believe that, you know, they can ask a different rabbi. It's actually not a halachic issue.

I'm not big on talking about the halachic changes I think need to happen to Judaism. I'm just an actress who happens to be Jewish. Because this is not a halachic issue, because we're dealing, again, more with bias and stereotyping, I think we're going to look back in 50 or 100 years and not even think twice. And you can say that for every great civil rights progress that's been made in the world and in the western world over the past 100 years.

How has the transition been moving from Kveller to GrokNation?
It's been good. I still write for Kveller, and I'm still part of the Kveller family, but I've found that I can have a broader reach and do more specific and targeted work at GrokNation, so I've been able to speak on a broader range of topics. We've also started doing videos, and we're thinking of starting more formal video and lecture-type conversations and things like that, so it's a different kind of format.

Mayim Bialik

I understand you were recently in Montreal to film an episode of YidLife Crisis and you've been to Toronto a couple of times, too. Do you see a difference between the Jewish community here and the one in Los Angeles and the United States?
You know, besides what I deem is the accent of Canadian Jews [laughs], there's honestly not a lot of difference. There's an east-coast flair to Toronto, just like there is an east-coast flair to the United States. Jews in Vegas are different from Jews in New York, but in a lot of ways, they're not, and so my experience with the Canadian Jewish community has been, really, a wonderful extension of the work that I do in this country with the Jewish community.

The stories are different. That's fascinating to me, to hear some of the stories. Obviously, when I worked with Eli and Jamie on their YidLife Crisis episode, I had never met French-speaking Jews who weren't in Paris. It's also really neat to hear the stories of eastern European Jews, because a lot of Canadian Jews are eastern European, but how different the trajectory was for them. My grandparents came to Ellis Island and worked in sweatshops and lived in the very poorest parts of the Bronx, and the stories of Canadian Jews are often very different, so it's really fascinating.

How was doing the episode of YidLife Crisis with Eli and Jamie?
They're really great guys. We met for the first time in Montreal. My editorial director, Esther Kustanowitz, who is a writer and social media presence, connected me with them. We emailed a bit and just filmed the episode a few weeks ago.

And you speak fluent Yiddish, right?
I was raised speaking Yiddish and I raised my children speaking Yiddish, and I took Yiddish in college. I wasn't raised with full proper grammar, but with a very large vocabulary, which was part of normal speech, meaning we didn't just whip it out when we needed to. It was part of our speech, and that's still kind of how I speak now.

When I speak to other Jewish people I try and tone it down when they don't speak Yiddish [laughs]. But I have a very large vocabulary, and my children have a sizeable vocabulary. I learned proper grammar in college, but I haven't spoken full Yiddish probably since I was a very, very young child or in college. So yeah, this was very different. I have enough of an understanding of the grammar to have been able to roughly make sense of the script, but it definitely took a little massaging.

So it wasn't hard to keep up with them?
Eli speaks a more refined and proper Yiddish, and Jamie and I were following along, but obviously they have more experience speaking fluently with it, which I have not done in quite some time. I speak short sentences with my children, and when I was in college, I was taking Yiddish and reading and watching Yiddish movies and things like that for class, but they are far more experienced speakers. I can catch some grammar things, but it was mainly me learning it and having it come out of my mouth at least relatively correctly.

Sounds like a fun experience.
It was. It was really fun.

Do you feel as someone who is vocal about supporting Israel that you've educated those around you, including your co-stars on the Big Bang Theory?
Well, three out of seven of us are Jewish [laughs], and if you extend out, four of the eight of us in our extended cast are Jewish. I don't talk about it a lot with our cast per se, but I think what's important about speaking out is that I don't even think of it as "speaking out." I don't think you should be ashamed to talk about your support for a country where Jews can have an autonomous existence. It's become such a dirty word to say the word "Israel," and that's really a shame, because although there are very, very difficult politics surrounding Israel, and I don't agree with everything the Israeli government or the people in the State of Israel do, it's not a dirty word to talk about a country amidst dozens of Arab countries in that region of the world. ■

Searching for Canadian ethical wills

Backstory

LESLEY SIMPSON
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When the Yiddish writer Sholom Aleichem died in 1916, his family discovered that he had created more than comedy. The writer, whose real name was Solomon Rabinowitz, had also penned what is known as an ethical will, part of a long-standing Jewish tradition, but not a well known one.

An ethical will can be thought of as a personal letter of wishes, written most often from parents to children. Unlike legal wills, these letters are not legally binding. The writer Emil Greenberg characterized ethical wills as being more about precept than property. Ultimately, ethical wills are not about material assets but about moral legacy.

Rabinowitz provided his family with a choice: they could recite the memorial prayer for the dead, the Kaddish, or they could gather each year on the anniversary of his death and read some of his most "merry" stories in a language understood by the listeners. His legacy would be illuminated in the laughter of his descendants. His family has subsequently organized a reading each year since his death, reading these comical stories for family and friends in English and Yiddish.

Rabbi Jack Riemer and Prof. Nathaniel Stampfer, co-authors of So That Your Values Live On: Ethical Wills and How to Prepare Them (Jewish Lights Publishing, 2010), collected examples of ethical wills – from traditional rabbinic wills to wills from the Holocaust, as well as wills from the State of Israel and contemporary examples. The ethical wills of public figures, including Theodor Herzl, Hannah Senesh and Edmond James de Rothschild, as well as those of ordinary folks, are gathered in the book.

To be clear, writing an ethical will is not necessarily an exercise for the elderly. Eldad Pan wrote a letter to his mother before he was killed in Israel's War of Independence in 1948. He was 20 years old. Other people write ethical wills when faced with life-changing events, ranging from the birth of a child, to diagnosis of a terminal illness, a coming war, a move to another country and many other circumstances.

> Ethical wills are not about material assets but about moral legacy.

To put the tradition in a wider context, the ethical will repertoire includes letters, single author books, such as Sharon Strassfeld's Everything I Know: Basic Life Rules from a Jewish Mother (New York: Scribner, 1998), as well as documentary films such as Hiding and Seeking: Faith and Tolerance After the Holocaust (2004).

Sometimes the trajectory of time is reversed, as in Katya Krausova and Yuri Dojc's documentary Last Folio, a film by about vanished Jewish life in Slovakia inspired by parents who are no longer alive but whose presence is palpable.

Some thinkers find precedent for the tradition of ethical wills in the biblical stories of Jacob's blessings (Genesis, 49) or Moses' address to the Israelites (Deuteronomy, 4), to name but two examples.

What is missing from the published collections of ethical wills I have read are Canadian voices.

When Riemer and Stampfer searched for material for their collection of ethical wills, they posted a query in the New York Times book section. I am issuing an invitation to Canadian Jews from coast to coast as part of my sleuthing to find the voices of Canadians we have not yet heard from. Ethical wills constitute a part of the inner lives of Jews in modernity. Canada is part of that tradition, but is not yet publicly represented in much of the literature. It is my hope to change that with future research.

These letters may be secular or religious, serious or funny, long or short. While a letter on paper is the most common format, an ethical will may also be an audio, a video or a multimedia file. If you have an ethical will in your family, I would be grateful to obtain a copy for future research. I hope to be able to ultimately edit a collection in the form of a book. Inquiries can be sent to jewishethicalwills@gmail.com. ■
